A "I construe the order to mean: (1) The plaintiff recovers all necessary costs of obtaining his relief against the defendant, Emil Korner. In practice under the present order, I am of opinion that the plaintiff should get: (a) his general costs of action, such as summons for directions, term fees, etc.; (b) all costs solely appertaining to his claim against Emil Korner; (c) such part of the fee for instructions for brief and counsel's fees on the brief as may be attributable to the plaintiff's claim against Emil Korner, as if Emil Korner had been the sole defendant. A taxation on these principles will, of course, entail a somewhat difficult question of apportionment for the taxing master. (2) If I am right in my construction of the order as regards the costs payable by the defendant, Emil Korner, it follows that the [successful] defendants will get (a) seven-eighths general costs of action, (b) any costs solely appertaining to their defences, (c) such part of the fee for instructions for brief and counsel's fees on the brief as may be attributable to their defences. This, of course, as in the case of the plaintiff's costs, will cause a difficult question of apportionment."

C In his answers to the objections lodged by the successful defendants, the taxing master said:

D "I can see no justification in the claim of these defendants to receive seven-eighths of the 'instructions for brief' and 'counsel's fees.' Although all the defendants, including Emil Korner, were represented in the action by the same solicitors, the [successful] defendants delivered separate defences. The main relief was sought and obtained by the plaintiff against Emil Korner. The relief sought against the other defendants was merely ancillary to the claim against Emil Korner."

In his judgment on a summons by the successful defendants for a review of taxation, WYNN-PARRY, J., was of opinion that the view of the taxing master was right. He said:

E "Without going so far as the learned taxing master in describing the relief sought against the other defendants as merely ancillary to the claim against the defendant, Emil Korner, I am of the opinion that the cause of action on which the plaintiff succeeded against Emil Korner was a different cause of action from that on which the plaintiff failed not only against Emil Korner but against the other defendants. It is clear from a perusal of the statement of claim and of the separate defences of the successful defendants (i.e., the defence of the first defendant, the company, on the one hand, and that of the remaining six defendants, on the other), that it was unnecessary for their defence that the plaintiff should fail in his main claim, the claim against the [second] defendant, for their defences proceeded on the basis that they knew nothing, at any material time, of the transactions between the plaintiff and the [second] defendant which were material to that part of the case on which the plaintiff succeeded."

H Six of the defendants, i.e., all the defendants except the company and Emil Korner, appealed against the order of WYNN-PARRY, J., and the appeal came before this court. As I have said, all the defendants were represented by the same firm of solicitors, though three separate defences were delivered. The claim of the successful defendants is that they are entitled to a taxation on the basis that they shall have seven-eighths, i.e., one-eighth each, of the items, "instructions for brief" and "counsel's fees," which form the most substantial items in the bill of costs. They base this claim (a) on that part of the judgment of ROMER, J., which reads:

"... and it is ordered that this action against the defendants other than the defendant Emil Korner do stand dismissed out of this court with costs other than their costs of the said motion to be taxed by the taxing master and paid by the plaintiff to the said defendants," and (b) on that which is described as a rule that, where a number of different defendants are represented by the same solicitors and some of them are successful, each defendant who is successful is entitled to an aliquot proportion of the costs of the defence.

This rule has been the subject of discussion in a number of cases since the year 1835, and in Ellingsen v. Det Skandinaviske Compani (1) this court said ([1919] 2 K.B. 570) that "it appears to be too well established to be disturbed by decisions of this court." The judgment of the court in that case was prepared by SCRUTTON, L.J., and delivered by ATKIN, L.J., and it contains this passage ([1919] 2 K.B. 569):

"KELLY, C.B., in Burridge v. Bellew (2) states that there is no difference between the practice in Chancery and at common law. If there has been a joint contract between the solicitor and his clients, each client is liable for the whole costs; and if there were separate contracts, each will be liable for his own portion of them; and as pointed out by AMPHLETT, B., in the same case, the fact that after separate retainers the defence is conducted jointly does not make the liability joint. As the principle of allowance of costs is that the successful party is to be recompensed the liability he has reasonably incurred in defending himself, if he is only liable to his solicitor for half of certain joint items he cannot be allowed the whole of them, even though by some separate agreement he has made himself liable for the other half, primarily the liability of another and unsuccessful defendant."

This rule, a rule of thumb, is, no doubt, convenient in an ordinary case, but I do not think it can be said that it must be applied in every case. Regard must be had to the nature of the case and to the nature of the defences raised to the claim. In the present case, there were three separate defences on the file, though at the trial the defendants were represented by the same solicitors and counsel. The main contest was between the plaintiff and the second defendant. That entailed a lengthy inquiry as to what was the agreement, and in regard to the questions raised by paras. 9 to 14 of the defence of the second defendant, in which defences of estoppel, waiver and the like were raised. Neither the defendant company nor any of the other successful defendants raised these matters. Their defences were, as counsel put it, more of a stone-wall in character. Yet, if the claim of the successful defendants is right, they will be each entitled to one-eighth of the fee allowed for instructions for brief and one-eighth of counsel's fees, though they did not raise the matters I have mentioned and though the plaintiff succeeded on them against the defendant who did raise them. This cannot be right. It is not disputed that it would result in injustice against the plaintiff. I do not know of any authority which compels the court to follow the rule in every class of case, even if to follow it would result in injustice. To do so would be to fly in the teeth of the generally accepted principle, as stated ([1919] 2 K.B. 569) in Ellingsen's case (1), "that the successful party is to be recompensed the liability he has reasonably incurred in defending himself." WYNN-PARRY, J., thought that the authorities in which the rule had been applied were all cases in which the plaintiff was pursuing the same action against all the defendants. That may be a somewhat narrow view. At the same time, I agree with him that the rule ought not to be extended. I regard it as something convenient to be applied in an ordinary or straightforward case. I do not think it apt in any degree for application to this case, having regard to the different defences which were raised and to the fact that the plaintiff succeeded on the main issue, an issue in which only one of the defendants was involved.

There is, however, another, and, perhaps, more compelling, reason for adopting this view, and that arises from the wording of the order itself. It is not right to look only at that part of the order which deals with the costs of the successful defendants. The order as a whole must be considered. When that is done, it becomes quite clear that ROMER, J., treated this case really as though there were two actions in one. I observe from the transcript of his judgment that sixteen and a half pages were occupied by the statement of facts and the learned judge's reasons for his judgment against the second defendant, and one page suffices to show why the other defendants are entitled to judgment against the plaintiff. The judgment itself decrees specific performance of the agreement by the second defendant, Emil Korner, and the order states:

"And it is ordered that the defendant Emil Korner do pay to the plaintiff his costs of the action against such defendant . . ."

That is intended to dispose of all the costs in the action between the plaintiff and the second defendant. It is not merely a case of judgment for the plaintiff against one defendant with costs, and judgment for the other defendants against the plaintiff with costs. The judge, having made the order that the second defendant pay to the plaintiff his costs of the action against such defendant, proceeded to provide for the costs of the successful defendants, and that part of the order must be read as limited by what has gone before. To my mind, the order, as drawn, is of itself sufficient to render inapplicable the rule relied on by the successful defendants. For these reasons, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

I would add a word. It is said that when the order has been drawn up there can be no further reference to the judge who made it, and this appears to be the position as stated by BYRNE, J., in Kelly's Directories, Ltd. v. Gavin and Lloyds (3). BYRNE, J., said ([1901] 2 Ch. 767):

"In the present case I have an order clearly directing the defendant Gavin to pay the plaintiffs their costs of this action, and I cannot mould or re-frame that order now; the proper time to ask for the insertion of some words distinguishing these extra costs, or to object to the form of the proposed order, was at the trial, or later, at the actual drawing up of the order, when the defendant, as I understand, attended; it is too late for any alteration now. In my opinion the taxing master has taken a correct view of what this order means, and I cannot interfere, and I therefore dismiss this summons with costs."

I cannot help feeling that, when one is dealing with an order as to costs, great trouble and expense would be saved if either party were able to go back to the judge, even after the order had been drawn up, if there appeared to be ambiguity or uncertainty in the terms of the order. It is not possible to have every eventuality in mind all the time and, after all, costs are, in general, in the discretion of the judge. It is more than two years since judgment was given in this case and the parties are still fighting as to the interpretation of the order as to costs and as to the basis on which those costs should be taxed. If it had been possible to refer the matter back to ROMER, J., the whole dispute might have been settled within ten minutes, and I have no doubt as to what the decision would have been. An alteration to bring about such a means of solving a question of this kind would remove what appears to me to be a burden on litigants, and it would simplify the task of taxing masters and of judges. In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

APPEAL by the wife from a judgment of Mr. Commissioner GRAZEBROOK, K.C., dated Mar. 13, 1950, dismissing her petition for divorce on the ground that the charges of cruelty made by her were not proved beyond reasonable doubt. The appellant contended that in so holding the learned commissioner misdirected himself in law as it meant that the standard of proof required was the same as in a criminal case. D

Tolstoy for the wife.

The husband appeared in person. E

BUCKNILL, L.J., referred to the evidence, said that the husband's conduct shortly before the wife left him was not such as to revive any acts of cruelty by him which had been condoned by the wife, and continued: On the point on which misdirection is alleged, the learned commissioner, in his judgment, said: F

“That is the evidence and in order to succeed the wife has to satisfy me that there has been injury to life, limb, or health, bodily or mentally, or reasonable apprehension of it, and she has to prove her case beyond reasonable doubt.”

In my opinion, that was a correct statement of law, and I adhere to what I said in Gower v. Gower (1) and in Davis v. Davis (2). In Gower v. Gower (1) I should, perhaps, have said: G

Subject to that, I stand by what I said then. I do not understand how a court can be satisfied that a charge has been proved—and the statute requires that the court shall be satisfied before pronouncing a decree—if at the end of the case the court has a reasonable doubt whether the case has been proved. To be satisfied and at the same time to have a reasonable doubt seems to me to be an impossible state of mind. I will add this. I regard proceedings for divorce as proceedings of very great importance, not only to the parties, but also to the State. If a wife is divorced, she not only has that stigma resting on her for the rest H of her life, but it may mean she will lose the maintenance to which she is entitled from her husband and the custody of her children. It may, indeed, mean ruin to her. If a high standard of proof is to be required because of the importance of a particular case to the parties and also to the community, divorce proceedings require that high standard. I think that this appeal fails.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree. With regard to the suggested misdirection,

A I do not think that the commissioner in the sentences quoted by BUCKNILL, L.J., misdirected himself, and I desire to express my agreement with what has been said on that matter by BUCKNILL, L.J., today and what was said by him in Davis v. Davis (2). I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: The difference of opinion which has been evoked about

B the standard of proof in these cases may well turn out to be more a matter of words than anything else. It is true that by our law there is a higher standard of proof in criminal cases than in civil cases, but this is subject to the qualification that there is no absolute standard in either case. In criminal cases the charge must be proved beyond reasonable doubt, but there may be degrees of proof within that standard. Many great judges have said that, in proportion as the crime is enormous, so ought the proof to be clear. So also in civil cases.

C The case may be proved by a preponderance of probability, but there may be degrees of probability within that standard. The degree depends on the subject-matter. A civil court, when considering a charge of fraud, will naturally require a higher degree of probability than that which it would require if considering whether negligence were established. It does not adopt so high a degree as a criminal court, even when it is considering a charge of a criminal nature, but

D still it does require a degree of probability which is commensurate with the occasion. Likewise, a divorce court should require a degree of probability which is proportionate to the subject-matter. I do not think the matter can be better put than SIR WILLIAM SCOTT put it in Loveden v. Loveden (3) (2 Hag. Con. 3):

E “The only general rule that can be laid down upon the subject is that the circumstances must be such as would lead the guarded discretion of a reasonable and just man to the conclusion . . .”

The degree of probability which a reasonable and just man would require to come to a conclusion—and likewise the degree of doubt which would prevent him from coming to it—depends on the conclusion to which he is required to come.

F It would depend on whether it was a criminal case or a civil case, what the charge was, and what the consequences might be, and if he was left in real and substantial doubt on the particular matter, he would hold the charge not to be established. He would not be satisfied about it.

What is a real and substantial doubt? It is only another way of saying a reasonable doubt, and a “reasonable doubt” is simply that degree of doubt G which would prevent a reasonable and just man from coming to a conclusion. So the phrase “reasonable doubt” gets one no further. It does not say that the degree of probability must be as high as ninety-nine per cent. or as low as fifty-one per cent. The degree required must depend on the mind of the reasonable and just man who is considering the particular subject-matter.

H In some cases fifty-one per cent. would be enough, but not in others. When this is realised, the phrase “reasonable doubt” can be used just as aptly in a civil case or a divorce case as in a criminal case, and, indeed, it was so used by BUCKNILL, L.J., in Davis v. Davis (2) and Gower v. Gower (1). The only difference is that, because of our high regard for the liberty of the individual, a doubt may be regarded as reasonable in the criminal courts which would not be so in the civil courts. I agree, therefore, with my brothers that the use of the phrase “reasonable doubt” by the commissioner was not a misdirection, any more than it was in Briginshaw v. Briginshaw (4).

If the commissioner had, however, put the case higher and said that the case had to be proved with the same strictness as a crime is proved in a criminal court, then he would, I think, have misdirected himself because that would be the very error which this court corrected in Davis v. Davis (2). It would be adopting too high a standard. The divorce court is a civil court, not a criminal court, and it should not adopt the rules and standards of a criminal court. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Bucknill and Jenkins, L.J.J.), July 3, 1950.]

Income Tax—Compensation for loss of office—Term in service agreement for payment on termination of service agreement—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. E, r. 1. C

By the terms of a service agreement the taxpayer, who was employed by a company as assistant to the managing director, was entitled to a salary and commission. The agreement provided that the company should be entitled to terminate the taxpayer's appointment at the end of the first or second year of the three years covered by the agreement by three months' notice, whereupon a lump sum would become payable to the taxpayer by way of compensation for loss of office. The company exercised the option to terminate the agreement at the end of the first year of the taxpayer's employment, and paid the agreed sum of compensation to him. On the question whether the sum was assessable to income tax in the hands of the taxpayer as a profit from his contract of employment, D

HELD: since the taxpayer was entitled, under the terms of the service agreement, to receive a payment of compensation in the event, which happened, of the company electing to terminate the agreement, the compensation was a profit arising from his employment, and therefore, taxable under sched. APPEAL by the taxpayer from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated Apr. 3, 1950, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 912, whereby he held that a payment of compensation for loss of office, made to the taxpayer by the company by whom he had been employed, was assessable to income tax under sched. E, r. 1. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

Grant, K.C., and Senter for the taxpayer.

Donovan, K.C., and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This is an appeal by the taxpayer, Colonel de Soissons, against a judgment of ROXBURGH, J., given on Apr. 3, 1950, whereby he held that a sum of £10,000 paid to the taxpayer by the company by whom he had been employed fell within the terms of r. 1 of the Rules Applicable to sched. E to the Income Tax Act, 1918. The rule reads as follows:

- A “Tax under this schedule shall be annually charged on every person having or exercising an office or employment of profit mentioned in this schedule . . . in respect of all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites or profits whatsoever therefrom . . .”

The question, therefore, is whether the £10,000 can be said to be “salaries, fees, wages, perquisites or profits” from the contract of employment between the taxpayer and his employers.

- B Cases of this character are never easy, and the line between those in which the taxpayer has succeeded and those in which he has failed may be described as “a little wobbly,” but, in my judgment, the learned judge rightly held that this case fell on that side of the line which has been illustrated by, among other cases, Henry v. Foster (A), Henry v. Foster (J), Hunter v. Dewhurst (1), and not on the side of the line on which fell Henley v. Murray (2), recently decided in this court.

C The taxpayer, who had been engaged in an important and responsible capacity by Messrs. Gallaher, Ltd., for some years, in July, 1944, made with his employers a new agreement, which is the only relevant contract for present purposes. The contract provided first:

- D “The company (Gallaher Ltd.) hereby continues the appointment of Mr. de Soissons as assistant to the managing director of the company and Mr. de Soissons agrees to continue in such office for the period of three years from Jan. 1, 1945.”

There then followed provisions for payment, by way of remuneration for those services, of a salary plus a commission. There was then a provision relating to what should happen if the taxpayer was prevented by ill-health from performing his services. The vital clause is cl. 5, which provides:

- E “If in the opinion of the board of directors of the company it is desirable for the better or more economical working of the company and conducive to the interests of the company so to do the company shall be entitled to terminate Mr. de Soissons’ appointment hereunder as assistant to the managing director on Dec. 31, 1945, or on Dec. 31, 1946, on giving to him three months’ previous notice in writing and on such termination of the said appointment becoming effective Mr. de Soissons’ appointment hereunder shall be forthwith terminated and in the event of Mr. de Soissons’ appointment hereunder being so terminated there shall be paid to Mr. de Soissons
- F by way of compensation for loss of office the amounts following . . .”

G Then there is a table showing that if the agreement is terminated at the end of the first year, Dec. 31, 1945, the amount of £10,000 shall be paid, and if at the end of the second year, £6,000. If the term of three years ran its course then, by silence, it is clear that nothing would be payable by way of, to use the words of the clause, “compensation for loss of office.”

- H It is conceded that the formula “by way of compensation for loss of office,” though it is not to be deprived of significance, is not, in a case of this kind, conclusive. The burden of the argument of counsel for the taxpayer is that, according to its proper construction, one cannot say that the £10,000, which in the event became payable when the option was exercised to terminate at Dec. 31, 1945, was a payment or remuneration for rendering the services which the taxpayer undertook to render under this agreement. Counsel accordingly says that it really represents, as a matter of principle as in Henley v. Murray (2), in effect a sum paid in consideration for the cancellation of the rights under the agreement which the taxpayer would otherwise have had. As I have already indicated, to my mind the correct answer is that given by ROXBURGH, J., namely, that this £10,000 was part of the remuneration which the taxpayer was entitled to get under, and received from, his contract of service. The contract provided that he should serve either for three years at an annual sum or, if the company so elected, for a shorter period of two years or of one year at the annual sum in respect of the two years or the one year, as the case might be, plus a further sum, that is to say, the £10,000 was something to which he became entitled as part of the terms on which he promised to serve, something which he was entitled to receive in the particular event specified, namely, the term not running the three years but being earlier determined. I agree with the learned judge that there is a true analogy between this case and the case to which I have referred, Henry v. Foster (A), Henry v. Foster (J) (1), where the taxpayer received sums by virtue of the articles of association which were treated, for that purpose, as being a part of the contract of service.

From the very full Case Stated it is apparent that there was a difficult question to be resolved when the war ended, namely, for how long would it be right to engage the taxpayer in the circumstances then affecting the tobacco trade. The Case sets out the evidence, which indicates that the arrangement came to and incorporated in the agreement to which I have alluded was a compromise, one side desiring a longer and a securer term, and the other preferring an annual contract of service. That evidence is clearly consistent with, and reflected by, the terms of the agreement itself. As I have indicated, the effect of it was that the taxpayer engaged himself, if called on, to serve for three years at a remuneration which was specified, but the right was given to the company to make his term a shorter one. In that event, as it seems to me, the remuneration for the services took the form in part of a remuneration plus a commission for the period he in fact served, plus a further sum to which he was contractually entitled under the terms of his agreement and as part of the bargain which he made.

Cases of this kind turn in the last resort on the short question whether, following the language of r. 1 of the Rules Applicable to sched. E, a sum can be said to arise from the contract of employment. I am satisfied to accept the last few words of ROXBURGH, J.'s, judgment as giving expression entirely to my own conclusion. He says ([1950] 1 All E.R. 915):

"In the present case the taxpayer surrendered no rights. He got exactly what he was entitled to get under his contract of employment. Accordingly, the payment, in my judgment, falls within the taxable class . . ."

For those reasons I think the learned judge was right, and the appeal should be dismissed.

E PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

In his statement of claim the plaintiff in an action for an account and an order for the sum found due alleged that the defendant was acting as solicitor for K., who was engaged in an action or proceedings against various persons, and also for the plaintiff to whom he was, in connection with the matters thereafter set out, under a fiduciary duty. In para. 3, the plaintiff alleged that between

F June, 1943, and July, 1948, he paid to the defendant:

G " . . . as solicitor aforesaid sums of money for the purposes of the said action or proceedings and for the purposes of being advanced by way of loan to the said [K.], and the defendant failed and refused to account to the plaintiff for the moneys so received by him or of the payments made by him out of the moneys so received by him, or to repay to the plaintiff any balance remaining in his hands."

H Succeeding paragraphs in the statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff had paid to the defendant various sums in respect of counsel's fees and costs and also certain sums to be paid to or to the use of K. In the prayer to the statement of claim the plaintiff claimed under para. 3 and also, separately, under the succeeding paragraphs "an account and an order for the payment of the sum found due from the defendant to the plaintiff, and interest thereon." By his defence the defendant denied that he ever acted as solicitor for the plaintiff and that he ever owed the plaintiff a fiduciary duty. He did not admit the allegations with regard to his relationship with K. He denied that he was, or ever had been, liable to account to the plaintiff for the alleged or any moneys as alleged or at all, and otherwise made no admissions with regard to para. 3 and the succeeding paragraphs above mentioned.

The defendant claimed the following further and better particulars under para. 3:

"(1) Of the sums of money alleged to have been paid by the plaintiff to the defendant giving dates and amounts and the method by which each payment was made. (2) Which of the said sums was or were for the purposes of the said action or proceedings. (3) Which of the said sums was or were for the purpose of being advanced by way of loan to the said [K.]. (4) In each of the above cases whether the alleged purpose was communicated to the defendant and if so how and when; if orally the substance of what was said; if in writing, identifying the document."

Vester for the plaintiff.

J. F. Bowyer for the defendant.

WYNN-PARRY, J., stated the facts and continued: The question arises whether it is necessary, to enable the defendant to know what case he has to meet, for him to be furnished at this stage with any details of the sums of money alleged to have been paid by the plaintiff to the defendant between June, 1943, and July, 1948. Apart from any question of the effect of the authorities, I should myself have thought that it was unnecessary for the defendant to be furnished with particulars of the sums so alleged to have been paid to him by the plaintiff over the period in question. The issue which will fall to be tried before the court when the action comes for trial is simply, as regards this part of the matter: Is the defendant an accounting party to the plaintiff or not? The answer to that will depend on evidence, of which figures, as it seems to me, will form no relevant part. If the plaintiff fails to establish that the defendant is an accounting party, then cadit quaestio. If, on the other hand, he succeeds in establishing that the defendant is an accounting party, the whole matter will be referred to chambers for the account to be taken. Then the defendant will have to account to the plaintiff, and, for the first time figures will become relevant.

In Augustinus v. Nerinckx (1), where the relevant claim was for an account, JESSEL, M.R., said (16 Ch.D. 17):

"It appears to me that the attention of the learned judge was not sufficiently directed to the nature of the action. It is not an action for a definite sum of money, but is an action by a legal personal representative in respect of advances alleged to have been made by her intestate under an agreement in the nature of a partnership agreement, and seeks to establish a lien upon a certain fund for what shall be found due. No specified sum is claimed, but an account is asked for, and in order to enable the defendant to put in a defence to such an action, it is not necessary that she should know the particulars of the sums advanced and the times when they were advanced."

It is to be observed that the Master of the Rolls grounded his decision on the circumstance that it was unnecessary for the defendant to have particulars in order to put in a defence. R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 7, of course, has since been changed by the addition (by R.S.C., February, 1919) of r. 7 (b); but it appears to me that the reasoning equally applies, and that, generally speaking, it is unnecessary, in the case of a claim for an account, that the defendant should know the particulars of the sums alleged to have been paid to him so that he may be able to contest the issue: Aye or no, is he an accounting party.

In the later case of Blackie v. Osmaston (2), which also was decided before the rule was altered, the claim was not for an account simply, but was also for payment of a specified balance. BAGGALLAY, L.J., in the course of his judgment, said (28 Ch.D. 122):

A “If the action had been merely for an account of what the plaintiffs and their testator had paid, I should have been of opinion that an order for particulars ought not to be made. But that is not the case. . . . Now it is true that it is not the practice of the court to order the plaintiff to give particulars where he only asks a general account, but the rule is otherwise where he asks for payment of a definite sum . . . If the statement of claim had merely asked for an account of what had been advanced by the plaintiffs or their testator, and payment by the defendant of his share of what should be found to have been advanced, I think that particulars would properly have been refused as unnecessary—but under a statement of claim in the present form I think that particulars would be very useful for enabling the defendant to frame his defence.”

B BOWEN, L.J., at the end of his very short judgment, said (ibid., 123):

“I agree with what BAGGALLAY, L.J., has said as to the distinction between cases where the plaintiff asks for an account and cases where he asks for a specified sum.”

C FRY, L.J., said:

“The rule is that where the plaintiff is claiming a specific sum he must give particulars of demand, and I see nothing in this case to induce the court to depart from that rule.”

D In Carr v. Anderson (3), a claim for an account in which there was an application by the defendant for particulars, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said (18 T.L.R. 206) that, in his opinion, a sufficient answer to the demand for particulars was that the action was brought for an account and the object of the particulars was that the plaintiff should first account to the defendants. That statement by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., appears to me to support the view which I have formed—that the ratio decidendi of the earlier cases applies even since the rule has been altered and particulars are not now ordered except in very special cases before the delivery of the defence.

E It is argued that, at least, the plaintiff should give to the defendant particulars as regards the purposes for which the various sums were advanced. Here, again, I can see no embarrassment whatever to the defendant in defending this action at the trial in the absence of any such particulars, which appear to me not to become relevant unless and until it has been established that the plaintiff is an accounting party. In my view, therefore, I ought not to order any of the particulars asked for under para. 3.

F Order accordingly. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Re BLAND-SUTTON'S WILL TRUSTS. NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK, LTD. v. COUNCIL OF THE MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), June 21, 23, July 7, 1950.]

Charity—Charitable purpose—Gift to the Royal College of Surgeons—Subsidiary or incidental object of college not charitable. A

Will—Gift to medical school of hospital—Gift over if hospital nationalised or passes into public ownership—Whether gift over takes effect consequent on National Health Service Act—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 8 (1), s. 15 (1).

By her will, dated Jan. 13, 1943, a testatrix, who died on Feb. 10, 1943, gave her residuary real and personal estate on the usual trusts for conversion and directed that the resulting "endowment fund" should be held on "the following charitable trusts" which were, inter alia, "to pay the residue of the income of the endowment fund in each year to the treasurer . . . of the Middlesex Hospital for the maintenance and benefit of the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology now carried on in connection with the said hospital . . . Provided always that should the . . . Middlesex Hospital become nationalised or by any means pass into public ownership or should the [trustees] at any time become unable lawfully to apply the income of the endowment fund for the purposes aforesaid then and in any of the said events the bank shall thereupon pay and transfer the endowment fund . . . to the Royal College of Surgeons . . ." The Bland-Sutton Institute was a department of the medical school of Middlesex Hospital, and until 1948 the school was a department of the hospital. On July 5, 1948, under the National Health Service Act, 1946, the hospital was designated a teaching hospital, but the school became a separate legal entity with a governing body constituted under s. 15 (1) of the Act. The Royal College of Surgeons claimed that, by reason of the changes brought about by the Act, the gift over took effect. B

Held: the effect of s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1946 was to take the property held for the purposes of the medical school out of the provisions of ss. 6 and 7 (by which land and other property of hospitals were vested in the Minister of Health, and endowments of teaching hospitals were vested in boards of governors appointed by the Minister), and the property of the school was now vested in an incorporated governing body set up pursuant to a scheme prepared by the former council of the medical school under s. 15 (1) of the Act; that corporate body was not nationalised and the property of the school had not passed into public ownership; and, therefore, for the purposes of the defeasance clause the Middlesex Hospital had not "become nationalised or passed into public ownership," and the trustee was able lawfully to apply the income for the purposes mentioned in the will. C

Per curiam: on the facts, the real object of the Royal College of Surgeons was the promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of surgery and not of the interests of surgical practitioners, and, therefore, the college was a charity. D

Cur. adv. vult.

July 7. DANCKWERTS, J., read the following judgment. By her will, dated Jan. 13, 1943, which was confirmed by a codicil dated Jan. 21, 1943, the testatrix, who was the widow of Sir John Bland-Sutton, the famous surgeon, appointed the plaintiff bank to be her executor and the trustee of her will, and after certain annuities and other bequests (by cl. 10) gave her residuary real and personal estate on the usual trusts for conversion and described the resulting fund as "the endowment fund." She directed the endowment fund to be held on "the following charitable trusts for so long as the law shall permit." The trusts which then followed were (i) out of the income of the endowment fund to pay the clear annual sum of £300 free of all duties and deductions and free from income tax at the current rate for the time being to the Royal College of Surgeons for the purpose of maintaining a Bland-Sutton Research Scholarship in the Bernard Baron Laboratories of the said college on certain terms and conditions set out in the will, and (ii)

"to pay the residue of the income of the endowment fund in each year to the treasurer or other proper officer of the Middlesex Hospital for the maintenance and benefit of the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology now carried on in connection with the said hospital."

Clause 11 of the will contains a proviso in the following terms:

"Provided always that should the Bland-Sutton Institute for Pathology cease to be carried on as a pathological research institution or should its name be changed or should the Middlesex Hospital become nationalised or by any means pass into public ownership or should the bank at any time become unable lawfully to apply the income of the endowment fund for the purposes aforesaid then and in any of the said events the bank shall thereupon pay and transfer the endowment fund (both as to capital and the income thereof) to the Royal College of Surgeons absolutely for the general purposes of the said College and the receipt of the treasurer or other proper officer thereof shall be a full and sufficient discharge to the bank therefor."

The testatrix died on Feb. 10, 1943, and her will and codicil were duly proved by the bank. Investments were appropriated to the annuities and a fund answering the description of "the endowment fund" of some £23,000 was left. Down to July 5, 1948, when the National Health Service Act, 1946, came into force, no difficulty arose as to the application of the income of the fund, but doubts have been felt as to the effect of the Act, and since that date the income (other than that required for the scholarship) has been accumulated.

It is necessary to consider the history of the Middlesex Hospital and the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology. Teaching in the wards of the Middlesex Hospital began in or about 1745 in the earliest days of the hospital's existence, but the medical school was not founded until 1835 when the school was opened in buildings erected on part of the hospital gardens, but by means of special subscriptions raised for the purpose and not the funds of the hospital. The school remained an unincorporated body having a separate existence, though working with the hospital, until 1896 when the school was amalgamated with and became part of the hospital under a scheme adopted by the Weekly Board of governors of the hospital. The Middlesex Hospital had been incorporated by an Act of 1836 (6 Wm. 4, c. vii). Under the scheme, which appears to have been in the nature of an agreement between the two bodies, the hospital took over the property and liabilities of the school and the school became and remained until 1948 a department of the hospital, though under the scheme a separate council was constituted as the governing body of the medical school. Theoretically, this council was under the control of the board of governors of the hospital, but in practice the government of the school was left to the council, and the accounts of the school were kept separate from the accounts of the hospital. In 1900, on the re-constitution of the University of London, the Middlesex Hospital Medical School became a school of the university, where university students of medicine might take their training, and the university became the examining body of the school and made grants to the school, but the legal position of the school was not otherwise affected. Until 1914 the school possessed no pathological department, but in 1913 Sir John Bland-Sutton (who had been associated with the hospital or the school since 1886) provided a sum of money to build an institute of pathology. Extensive alterations were made in the school buildings, and the institute was opened in 1914 under the name of the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology. Under the National Health Service Act, 1946, the Middlesex Hospital was designated as a teaching hospital, but the medical school became a separate legal entity with a governing body constituted under the provisions of s. 15 of the Act, which thereby became a body corporate. The Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology is carried on under this

A name as part of the medical school regulated by this scheme, and the medical school retains the school buildings, part of which are appropriated to the Bland-Sutton Institute.

It is claimed by the Royal College of Surgeons that by reason of the changes brought about on July 5, 1948, by the National Health Service Act, 1946, one or other of the events mentioned in cl. 11 of the will has occurred, and

B the gift over to the Royal College of Surgeons has taken effect. Against this claim it is said that the Royal College of Surgeons is not a charity, and, therefore, the gift over fails on the principle of Re Bowen (1). I propose to deal with this question first.

The testatrix describes the trusts of the endowment fund as "charitable trusts." It is not clear that this description includes the executory gift to the

C Royal College of Surgeons absolutely for the general purposes of the college, but in any case the view that may have been taken by the testatrix does not conclude the matter: Re Hummeltenberg (2). It is necessary, therefore, to inquire into the nature of the Royal College of Surgeons. The Royal College of Surgeons is a corporation formed under a number of royal charters. The first of these, a charter of 1800, incorporated the college on the dissolution

D of the former statutory corporation formed in 1745 on the separation of the barbers and the surgeons of London. This charter appears to re-incorporate the members of the late statutory corporation under the name of "the Royal College of Surgeons in London," and recites that "it is of great consequence to the common-weal of this Kingdom, that the art and science of surgery should be duly promoted" and that "the establishment of a college of surgeons will be expedient to the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science." There are seven further charters of 1822, 1843, 1852, 1859, 1888, 1899 and 1926, which regulate the college, and some of these contain recitals of a similar character. Except in these recitals, the charters do not contain any statement of the objects or purposes of the corporation. The charter of 1843 changed the name to "the Royal College of Surgeons of

E England." Counsel for the medical school raised the point (so that it might be available, if the matter should proceed further) that a corporation formed by royal charter is able to deal with its property as freely as an individual and was, therefore, unfettered by any trust, charitable or otherwise, but, in view of certain observations or assumptions to the contrary in the cases to which

I shall have to refer, he did not argue the point at length. Evidence as to the

G activities of the college is contained in an affidavit by Lord Webb-Johnson, a former president of the college. From this, it appears that the college has (i) a biological museum, which is open to all medical men and medical students and to members of the public in certain circumstances, (ii) a library which is used by those engaged in surgical research and by post-graduate students attending courses of instruction in the college, (iii) laboratories for surgical research in the college and a research farm at Downe in Kent, and (iv) scientific

H departments of anatomy, pathology and physiology and experimental research, each with a professor at its head. The college arranges statutory and commemorative lectures in respect of various aspects of surgery. Prizes are awarded by the college in connection with various surgical subjects in order to stimulate the advancement of knowledge in selected aspects of surgery. The college also conducts post-graduate teaching by means of lectures or classes which are attended by some one thousand students a year. The college provides residential accommodation for some twenty-four post-graduate students and research workers. The college also provides accommodation for a joint secretariat for a number of surgical and medical societies, and carries out the administrative work of the Imperial Cancer Research Fund. It seems to me that all of the above-mentioned activities fall within the ambit of charity in the ordinary legal sense of that term.

Examinations are conducted by the Conjoint Board of the Royal College of Physicians in London and the Royal College of Surgeons of England, which was set up shortly after the Medical Act, 1886, came into operation, for the qualifications of L.R.C.P., M.R.C.S., and for diplomas in specialised subjects. In addition, the college conducts examinations through the administrative machinery of the conjoint board for its own fellowship, and for its own fellowship in dental surgery and its licentiate in dental surgery. These examinations are not conducted primarily as a source of revenue, but do, in fact, produce revenue so as to make the examinations self-supporting and produce surpluses which are devoted to scientific activities. But the mere making of a profit is not inconsistent with the existence of a charity if the profits are employed for the charitable purposes of a charity, even though such profits may be liable to income tax: Brighton College v. Marriott (3) ([1926] A.C. 199 et seq.). It is admitted by Lord Webb-Johnson that the college endeavours to secure competence and high standards of honour in surgical practitioners and, as a corollary, feels bound to take and retain powers to defend and protect its fellows, members and licentiates, but it appears that discipline in practice is maintained by the General Medical Council established by the Medical Acts, and the registration of practitioners is a matter for the registrar of the General Medical Council. In practice, since the Medical Act, 1886, came into force no person has been entitled to be registered unless he has passed a qualifying examination in medicine, surgery and midwifery, which includes the examinations held by the conjoint board as well as those held by the medical faculties of universities. The college, however, has no monopoly rights in the licensing of surgical practitioners and the law does not in general terms prohibit any person from practising medicine or surgery, though it is an offence to pretend to be registered under the Medical Acts.

The position of the college has been considered by the Court of Appeal in Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (4). This was a case in respect of a claim by the college to be exempt from the tax imposed on corporate and unincorporate bodies by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, s. 11. The exemption in question is:

"... property which or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts."

The court, apparently, had less extensive evidence before it as to the objects, purposes, and activities of the college than that provided by Lord Webb-Johnson's affidavit in the present case. The argument before the court proceeded entirely on the question whether the property or income of the college was appropriated and applied for the promotion of science, and the judgment of the court (delivered by ROMER, L.J.) is entirely devoted to the consideration of this aspect, except that ROMER, L.J., observes ([1899] 1 Q.B. 882) that "... such property would not come within any of the exemptions from duty mentioned in s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885."

It is to be observed, however, that the words "any charitable purpose" in this section, have, it seems, a narrower meaning than "charitable purposes" in the ordinary legal sense, though I am unable to ascertain in what respect or degree the difference is to be found: see Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Scott,

Re Bootham Ward Strays, York (5) ([1892] 2 Q.B. 165, 166). The court held that the property of the Royal College of Surgeons did not come within the exemption from duty, and the real basis for the decision is to be found in the construction put on the objects of the college by ROMER, L.J., where he says ([1899] 1 Q.B. 877):

A “The college has two main objects, each of great importance, in fact, it would be difficult to say which of the two main functions imposed on and discharged by the college is the more important. Neither can be considered as merely subsidiary to the other. The one may be shortly described as the promotion of the science of surgery. The other is the promotion and encouragement of the practice of surgery, including the promotion of the interests of those practising, or about to practice, surgery as a profession, and also including the examination of students and others to qualify for practice or honours in surgery or kindred subjects.”

B It seems that it was the inclusion in the second of the objects of the college of the promotion of the interests of practitioners that was fatal to the claim to exemption, in the same way that the promotion of the interests of the members
C of the Society of Writers to the Signet in the exercise of their profession was fatal in the Scottish case of Society of Writers to the Signet v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (6). Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (4) has been followed and applied by the Court of Appeal in Ireland, which, in Miley v. A.-G. (7), had to consider the claim of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland to be a charity. The question arose in regard to the validity of a legacy partly payable out of real estate, and apparently
D the only evidence before the court as to the nature of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland was that contained in its charters which were in somewhat similar terms to those regulating the Royal College of Surgeons of England. The bequest was held not to be for charitable uses, as the promotion of the interests of those practising the profession of surgery (which was treated as being one of the main objects of the college) was not a charitable purpose.
E RONAN, L.J., held further that, as the college was a common law corporation regulated by charter, a gift simply to the college was, on the principle of Bowman v. Secular Society, Ltd. (8), simply a question of property and not of a trust at all. The result was that the legacy to the college was held to be valid. The principle that the advancement of those practising a profession or calling is not a charitable purpose has been applied to bodies which also had charitable purposes in other Irish cases: Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland v. Revenue Comrs. (9) and Pig Marketing Board (Northern Ireland) v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (10). In General Medical Council v. Inland Revenue Comrs., English Branch Council of General Medical Council v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (11), the General Medical Council was refused exemption from income tax by the English Court of Appeal as being F “a society formed for professional purposes.” No doubt this principle might
G be applied to the four Inns of Court or the Law Society. But, apparently, the ancient Inns of Chancery were purely places of learning, and, therefore, charities, as was held in regard to Cliffords Inn in Smith v. Kerr (12).

The terms of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, which was the subject of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (4), require the property or income to be both appropriated and applied
H for “any charitable purpose,” just as the exemptions in the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 37, only apply so far as the income in question is applied to charitable purposes only. I am far from suggesting that there is any difference in the legal meaning of “charity,” whether the question is on a will or for revenue purposes, and, of course, the leading case on the meaning of “charity,” Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (13), is a revenue case. But, in considering whether a particular society is a charity for the purposes of a gift in a will, at least, it would appear that the test is whether the objects of the society are really charitable, notwithstanding that the carrying out of the objects of the society may incidentally produce benefits to the members of the society. Nor does it appear to be material what are the motives of the members of the society in joining it. Indeed, an impossible investigation into the inner thoughts of the members would seem to be involved in any such consideration, and such a process was rejected (in a revenue case) where the purpose of a society is defined by charter or statute by LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in Institution of Civil Engineers v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (14) ([1932] 1 K.B. 166), citing the observations of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Savoy Overseers v. Art Union of London (15) ([1896] A.C. 313). A

In the present case, the purposes of the Royal College of Surgeons appear to be defined by the charters of the college as "the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science." It has been urged by counsel for the college, supported by the expert evidence of Lord Webb-Johnson, that the art and science of surgery is essentially a practical art and science, and that this art and science cannot be promoted without actual practice and experience, which can only be carried out by means of a competent body of practitioners, whose labours are intrinsically directed towards the cure or alleviation of the ills of mankind. This argument seems to me to have very great force. It seems to me to be supported by two decisions in regard to another practical science, that of civil engineering: Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Forrest (16), and Institution of Civil Engineers v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (14). In the latter of these cases the object of the Institution of Civil Engineers (which was founded in 1818 and was incorporated in 1928) was stated to be B

"... the general advancement of mechanical science and more particularly for promoting the acquisition of the species of knowledge which constitutes the profession of a civil engineer." D

Among the activities of the institution was the holding of examinations for persons desirous of being admitted as students or elected as members or associate members, the awarding of medals, premiums, prizes and scholarships, the provision of a library, the provision of rooms for lectures on subjects connected with the objects of the institution and the production of certain publications. The byelaws of the institution laid down rules as to professional conduct to be observed by members of the institution. Membership of the institution carried a certain amount of prestige, but was not necessary to enable a person to practise as a civil engineer. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the institution was a body of persons established for charitable purposes only, and was exempt from income tax under the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 37 (1) (b), and that any benefit which enured to the institution's members was merely incidental and subsidiary, and the activities above-mentioned did not represent a collateral or independent purpose. ROMER, L.J., said ([1932] 1 K.B. 172): E

"Where a society is instituted for a charitable purpose, it is obvious that the membership of the society may confer upon its holder personal advantages of considerable value to him in his profession or in his social standing. He may, for instance, have an exclusive right to affix to his name a certain designation, and will be known to the public as a person belonging to the society. He may have to observe disciplinary rules laid down with a view to ensuring that he does not bring discredit upon other members of the society. But in such cases, although the securing of such advantages to the members may in a sense be regarded as one of the objects of the society, such object is merely concomitant or incidental to the real objects of the society; and if that real object be charitable, the society is established for charitable purposes only." G H

It seems to me that those observations apply to the present case, and that, unless I am constrained by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Royal

College of Surgeons of England (4) to hold otherwise, the real object of the college is the promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the art and science of surgery, and not the interests of surgical practitioners. As has been already observed, that decision of the Court of Appeal was on a particular statute and was directed to different considerations, and I think I am at liberty to hold, for the purposes of the present case, that the Royal College of Surgeons is a charity, and I do so hold.

A The executory gift over, therefore, in accordance with the principle of Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (17), does not offend against the rule against perpetuities, but the question which remains to be considered is whether any of the events on which that gift is to take effect has happened. If the answer is in the negative, the Royal College of Surgeons has not at present become entitled to the endowment fund. The events mentioned in cl. 11 of the testatrix's will are as follows:

B "Should the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology cease to be carried on as a pathological research institution or should its name be changed . . ."

It appears that the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology is still carried on as a pathological research institution, though through the medium of a new body incorporated under the scheme pursuant to the provisions of the National

C Health Service Act, 1946, and its name has not been changed.

" . . . should the Middlesex Hospital become nationalised or by any means pass into public ownership or should the bank at any time become unable lawfully to apply the income of the endowment fund for the purposes aforesaid . . ."

D I think I should say, at once, that, as regards the last alternative event, I take the view that "the purposes aforesaid" are the maintenance and benefit of the Bland-Sutton Institution of Pathology and not necessarily payment of the residue of the income of the endowment fund to the treasurer or other proper officer of the Middlesex Hospital for that purpose.

E Now, in view of the considerable general and possibly uninformed discussion which accompanied the passing of the National Health Service Act, 1946, the popular view may be that the Middlesex Hospital has been nationalised and has passed into public ownership, but this is a clause providing for a defeasance, and, therefore, it is necessary to see that the terms of the clause are satisfied, and it will be necessary to examine the terms of the National Health Service Act 1946, with some care. For this purpose it is necessary to bear in mind that the Middlesex Hospital is "a teaching hospital" for the purposes of the Act, and that the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology was part of a medical school when the Act came into operation on July 5, 1948. Section 1 of the Act provides for the promotion by the Minister of a "comprehensive health service." By s. 3 the Minister has to provide certain services. By s. 6 of the Act all the premises (that is, land and buildings) of the hospital and all its equipment, furniture, or other moveable property used in connection with such premises were transferred to and vested in the Minister of Health free of any trust. By s. 7 all endowments of a teaching hospital were transferred to and vested in the board of governors constituted under s. 11 (8) and Part III of sched. III, i.e., in a new corporate body, the chairman and members of which are appointed by the Minister, while endowments of other hospitals were transferred to and vested in the Minister. Section 7 (10) contains a very difficult and puzzling definition of endowment, and s. 79 provides:

H " (2) References in this Act to the purposes of a hospital shall be construed as referring both to the general purposes of the hospital and to any specific purpose of the hospital."

But s. 8 (1) provides that where a medical or dental school is associated with any hospital to which s. 6 of the Act applies, nothing in that section or the last foregoing section (that is, s. 7) shall be taken as affecting any property or liabilities held or incurred solely for the purposes of that school, and those purposes shall not be deemed to be purposes of the hospital. That provision, as it seems to me, plainly takes the property held for the purposes of the medical school of Middlesex Hospital (including the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology) out of the provisions of ss. 6 and 7 of the Act and the provisions of s. 79 (2) of the Act, and also keeps such property outside the provisions of s. 60 of the Act (which deals with trusts authorising or requiring the trustees to apply capital or income of trust property for the purposes of any hospital to which s. 6 of the Act applies).

Section 8 (2) then proceeds to state what is to happen to the property of a medical school. It is to be transferred by virtue of the Act:

"(a) in the case of a general medical school of the University of London or any school in the faculty of medicine of that university which is recognised for dentistry only, to the governing body of that school," and is to vest in the said governing body by virtue of the Act. Section 15 (1) provides for the governing body, and requires the governing body of any such school, which is not incorporated at the passing of the Act, within a period of six months from the Act, to prepare and submit to the governing body of the university a scheme, to take effect on the appointed day (i.e., July 5, 1948), for constituting a new governing body of the school which is to be a body corporate with power to hold land without licence in mortmain. The old council of the medical school (which was the governing body of the school and was not incorporated, though it was associated with the Middlesex Hospital) accordingly prepared and submitted a scheme to the governing body of London University, by which scheme the government of the school is now vested in the council of the school. This council is, therefore, a body corporate, and the property of the school is vested in it. So far as this body and this property is concerned, it seems to me that it has neither been nationalised nor passed into public ownership. It may be that the new board of governors of the Middlesex Hospital are to be regarded as so much the creature of the Minister of Health that in substance it is nationalised, and the property of the hospital (other than that held for the medical school) has become nationalised or has passed into public ownership, but it seems to me that the old Middlesex Hospital has not as a whole been nationalised or passed into public ownership. Part of its property, and the most relevant part for the purposes of the trusts of the will of the testatrix, that of the medical school, has been transferred to and is in a corporate body, which is not nationalised and is not in public ownership. For the purposes, therefore, of this clause of defeasance (and my decision goes no further than that) I hold that the Middlesex Hospital has not become nationalised and has not passed into public ownership.

Has then the bank become unable lawfully to apply the income of the endowment fund for "the purposes aforesaid," that is, the maintenance and benefit of the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology? It seems to me that this event also has not occurred. The Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology and its work continue in existence, though it may be administered by a differently constituted body, and I cannot see anything to prevent the bank lawfully applying the income of the endowment fund for its purposes. Accordingly, it seems to me that none of the events on which the executory gift over to the Royal College of Surgeons is to take effect has occurred at present.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

CARDY v. CITY OF LONDON CORPORATION.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), June 21, 30, 1950.]

Local Government—Superannuation—"Continuous temporary service"—Period of rendering services broken by employee's participation in strike—City of London (Various Powers) Act, 1944 (c. iv), s. 9 (2).

A The plaintiff entered the employment of the City of London Corporation in a temporary capacity on June 27, 1925, and had continued in that employment, at a weekly wage, until July 10, 1948, except for a period from Apr. 27, 1947, until May 8, 1947, when he took part in an unofficial and illegal strike by some of the corporation's employees. The corporation did not, however, terminate his contract of employment when he refused to work, and, when he returned to work on May 9, 1947, they treated his original contract as subsisting. The strikers had returned to work unconditionally, but, on June 3, 1947, after a discussion with representatives of the employees, the corporation's special labour committee passed a resolution that there should be "no victimisation." On July 10, 1948, the plaintiff was placed on the establishment staff of the corporation, and became entitled, under the City of London (Various Powers) Act, 1944, s. 9 (2), to the option to contribute to the corporation's superannuation fund in respect of his continuous temporary service immediately prior to the date of his being placed on the establishment staff. He claimed that he was entitled to contribute for the whole period from the commencement of his employment in 1925 until July 10, 1948, but the corporation contended that his temporary service had been broken by the strike period in 1947 and that his continuous temporary service ran only from May 9, 1947.

D HELD: (i) section 9 (2) of the Act of 1944 required a continuous contract of employment, and not continuous work or services, to entitle a servant of the corporation to the option to contribute to the superannuation fund in respect of his "continuous temporary service"; as the corporation had not terminated the plaintiff's contract when he took part in the strike, he had "served continuously under the corporation," within the meaning of the sub-section, since June 27, 1925; and, therefore, the period in respect of which he was entitled to contribute to the fund commenced on that date.

E (ii) the resolution of the corporation's special labour committee, on June 3, 1947, that there should be "no victimisation," was merely a declaration of the corporation's policy, and gave rise to no contractual obligations between the plaintiff and the corporation.

ACTION by an employee of the defendants, the City of London Corporation, claiming inter alia a declaration that, for the purpose of the City of London (Various Powers) Act, 1944, s. 9 (2), the period of temporary service in respect of which he was entitled to contribute to the defendants' superannuation fund was the period commencing on June 27, 1925 (when he entered the employment of the defendants in a temporary capacity) and ending on July 10, 1948, the date of his being placed on the establishment staff. The defendants contended that the plaintiff had broken the continuity of his temporary service with them by participating in a strike of some of their employees from Apr. 27, 1947, until May 8, 1947, and, therefore, his continuous temporary service, for the purpose of s. 9 (2) of the Act, ran only from May 9, 1947. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 30. SELLERS, J.: On July 10, 1948, the plaintiff was placed on the establishment staff of the defendants and thereby became a servant of the defendants to whom the City of London (Various Powers) Act, 1944, s. 9 (2), applied, entitling him at his option after Apr. 1, 1939, to contribute to the defendants' superannuation fund in respect of the whole period of his continuous temporary service immediately prior to his being placed on the establishment staff, and, on so contributing, to have the whole of that period taken into account in assessing his superannuation benefit. Section 9 (2) of the Act of 1944 reads:

"Where any officer or servant as defined in [the City of London (Various Powers) Act, 1931] has been appointed in an established capacity or placed on the establishment staff on or after Apr. 1, 1939, and has served continuously under the corporation . . . in a temporary capacity immediately prior to the date of his appointment in an established capacity or of his being placed on the establishment staff as the case may be he shall have the option of contributing to the fund defined by the Act in respect of the whole or part of such continuous temporary service . . ."

The plaintiff entered the employment of the defendants in a temporary capacity at the metropolitan cattle market on June 27, 1925, and had been so employed at a weekly wage until July 10, 1948, subject to the event which gives rise to the controversy before me. On Apr. 27, 1947, there was an unofficial and illegal strike of the defendants' employees at the market where the plaintiff was employed, and the plaintiff performed no work for the defendants from then until May 9, 1947. On being placed on the establishment staff of the defendants, the plaintiff claimed under s. 9 (2) of the Act of 1944 that he had had continuous temporary service with the defendants from June 27, 1925, until he was placed on the permanent staff, but the defendants rejected this claim and alleged that the plaintiff's temporary service was broken by the strike period in 1947 and that his continuous temporary service ran only from May 9, 1947.

The plaintiff has now brought this action against the defendants claiming certain declarations, including a declaration that, for the purpose of s. 9 (2) of the Act of 1944, the period of temporary service in respect of which he is entitled to contribute to the defendants' superannuation fund is the period commencing on June 27, 1925, and ending on the date of his being placed on the establishment staff.

By their defence the defendants plead that, by participating in the strike and withdrawing his labour, the plaintiff repudiated his contract of employment, which repudiation was accepted by the defendants. The acceptance of the repudiation was alleged to be by a letter of May 7, 1947, written on behalf of the defendants. There is no doubt that the plaintiff by his conduct did repudiate his contract of employment with the defendants, but the letter of May 7, 1947, did not accept the repudiation as terminating the plaintiff's employment. It treated the contract as subsisting and before me it was admitted that the contract of employment had not been brought to an end.

The plaintiff has, therefore, been continuously employed by the defendants since 1925, but, notwithstanding this, the defendants submitted that the plaintiff had not served continuously under the corporation in a temporary capacity since 1925. The plaintiff has not worked continuously. That could be said of him and other servants if they were away on holiday, with or without leave, or were absent through illness, or were idle through slackness of work or from fatigue by overwork, or owing to an opportunity and their willingness to avoid the work for which they were employed, or were occupied on other than the employer's work or duties during working hours. There must in any employment be a necessary break in active work for sleep and food, at least, but, if regard is paid only to the normal working hours, all the circumstances I have indicated would involve a cessation of work or services, but not, I think, a cessation of service. I construe s. 9 (2) of the Act of 1944 as requiring a continuous contract of employment with the defendants in a temporary capacity to give the servants the option of contributing to the fund "in respect of the whole or part of such continuous temporary service." The essential words are: "has served continuously . . . in a temporary capacity." The sub-section does not require continuous services or work. It would be most remarkable if it did. If continuity of work is not essential, I find it difficult to differentiate between idleness from a strike and idleness from any other, and, perhaps, blameless, cause while the contract of employment was subsisting. The defendants did not terminate the plaintiff's contract, as they could have done when he completely failed to perform his part of it by illegally refusing to work, and the plaintiff has, therefore, established continuity of employment with the defendants since 1925.

I think that support is given to the view which I have formed from a number of cases arising in quite different circumstances. From the many which were cited to me I will mention only four: Re Lawson (1), Re Cole (2), Price v. Guest, Keen and Nettlefolds (3), and Re Marryat (4), in which JENKINS, J., reviewed a number of the authorities on this question. In Re Lawson (1), EVE, J., said ([1914] 1 Ch. 686):

"Upon the second point Mr. Draper is no doubt quite right when he says that in order to comply with the condition attached to the bequest it is incumbent on the servant to show that his service has been a continuous one for the period named by the testator. He cannot fulfil the condition by proving discontinuous periods of service amounting in the aggregate to two years. But even so, that does not, I think, involve the necessity of actual daily service for the whole period. It cannot be that if, owing to ill-health or for any other reasonable cause, the servant absents himself for a time and suspends his services with the full authority and consent of the employer, the continuity of the relationship of master and servant is thereby broken. It is true that in this case, in the circumstances I have mentioned, no payment was made to the servant while his absence continued, but I do not think this element is of itself conclusive, coupled as it was with the arrangement that he was to return to his duties as soon as his health was restored."

In that case there was no conduct of the servant which had not the full authority and consent of the employer.

In Price v. Guest, Keen and Nettlefolds (3), which arose under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the employers contended that the continuity of a workman's employment had not been broken by his cessation from work for a period of a week. The county court judge found that, during the seven days that the men, including the deceased workman whose widow was claiming compensation under the Act, were on strike, there was no engagement, the relation of master and servant did not exist, and on the men's return to work there was a new contract of service. The House of Lords, by a majority, upheld the order of the Court of Appeal reversing the decision of the county court judge. Their Lordships said that there was no evidence to support the finding and that the compensation should be assessed on the workman's actual earnings during the three years preceding the accident, because there had been no cessation in his employment. LORD ATKINSON said ([1918] A.C. 772):

"... if a workman contracts with his employer to perform certain services he will continue to be in the employment of his employer though he may not actually perform those services. Physical conditions may render the performance of them impossible, as, for instance, if a ploughman be hired to plough land and snow falls, or frost intervenes which renders ploughing impossible. The servant discharges his duty while his contract lasts if he is ready and willing to do that which his contract of service binds him to do. If he refuses to render these services, or is unable to render them, that may, and under most circumstances would, furnish just cause for his dismissal, but does not by itself terminate his contract of service. Illness, for instance, might be of such a temporary character that, though disabling the workman from performing his service while it lasted, it would not justify his dismissal, or it might be of such a permanent character that it would justify it."

Counsel for the defendants relied on some observations of ATKINSON, J. ([1939] 4 All E.R. 290) in Petrie v. MacFisheries, Ltd. (5), in which the learned judge was dealing with the right to wages during sickness. ATKINSON, J., referred to employment in the weaving industry, "where the amount of wages payable depends on the quantity and quality of the work done," and to contracts "where, by the custom of the industry, wages are payable only for services rendered, as with agricultural labourers, or as, apparently, in the mining industry." In the case now before me, however, the plaintiff was entitled to wages on a weekly basis not dependent on any particular work achieved by him.

The plaintiff further relied on what his counsel described as a "no victimisation" clause, and it was contended that that clause precluded the defendants from treating the plaintiff in any different way from that in which he would have been treated if he had not been on strike. In the course of the strike a deputation of representatives of the strikers met representatives of the defendants, and among the demands put forward as a condition of the defendants' servants returning to work was "no victimisation." The terms were not accepted and on May 9, 1947, the strikers returned to work unconditionally. Shortly after that a meeting for discussion between the parties' representatives was arranged and was held on June 3. After the discussion, the defendants' special labour committee resolved, among other things: "(5) there shall be no victimisation." I regard this resolution as a declaration of the defendants' policy. In my view, it gives rise to no contractual obligations between the plaintiff and the defendants. It had no such intention, and, also, it was too vague, indefinite and uncertain in its incidence and its duration to be enforceable as a contractual term. The plaintiff does not, in my judgment, need to rely on this second contention, but succeeds, as I have held, on the construction of the Act, and I shall make a declaration that, for the purpose of s. 9 (2) of the Act of 1944, the period of temporary service in respect of which he is entitled to contribute to the defendants' superannuation fund is the period commencing on June 27, 1925, and ending on the date of his being placed on the establishment staff.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), June 20, July 6, 1950.]

War Damage—Damage not made good—Discretion of War Damage Commission—Amount of payment—Payment of interest—War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), s. 13 (1) (b).

A On May 10, 1941, the applicants' premises suffered damage by enemy action, the premises being destroyed except for the basement. On May 27, 1941, the War Damage Commission was notified of the damage, and subsequently made a temporary works payment to the applicants. On Nov. 30, 1943, the commission informed the applicants that the premises were considered to be a total loss. On Mar. 24, 1944, the premises sustained further damage by enemy action, and on June 27, 1944, the commission was formally notified of the further damage. On July 18, 1944, the premises were again damaged, the commission being notified on Aug. 18, 1944, and on Apr. 25, 1946, the commission made a further temporary works payment. In October, 1947, the commission informed the applicants that, in consideration of representations made by them, the commission was of the opinion (contrary to their earlier view) that the damage had not involved a total loss, and, therefore, that a cost of works payment was appropriate. On Apr. 1, 1949, as it was not possible to reinstate the premises in their original form, the applicants requested the commission to make a value payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 13 (1) (b), and on Dec. 6, 1949, the commission gave notice of determination of the amount of the value payment under that sub-section as £42,000, which was increased (by virtue of the War Damage (Increase of Value Payments) Order, 1947), by sixty per cent. to £67,200, with interest at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum on the total amount "from the last notified date of damage to the date of payment." The applicants claimed that interest should be paid from the first notified date of damage, or, alternatively, that the value payment should be apportioned to the damage sustained on each occasion and interest paid on the appropriate amount referable to each occurrence from the date thereof.

E HELD: under s. 13 (1) (b) the commission had a discretion to make a value payment up to the amount which might have been awarded under s. 10, and, even if a larger sum for interest than that proposed to be made could have been given (e.g., by allowing interest from May 10, 1941, or Mar. 24, 1944, instead of from July 18, 1944), the determination actually made was a valid exercise of the discretion vested in the commission and should not be disturbed.

[FOR THE WAR DAMAGE ACT, 1943, s. 13, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 36, pp. 352, 353.]

G ORIGINATING NOTICE OF MOTION whereby the Solicitors' Law Stationery Society, Ltd., sought an order that a determination of the respondents, the War Damage Commission, (whereby the commission determined that a payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 13, in respect of the society's hereditament should be £42,000 with interest at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum less income tax) should be set aside so far as it determined that the interest was payable from the date of the damage last notified, and for a declaration that the interest was payable from the date of damage first notified. The question of law was stated to be: "From what date or dates is interest payable on the said payment according to the true construction of the relevant provisions of the War Damage Act, 1943?"

Rowe, K.C., and Denys B. Buckley for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 6. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The points which arise for my decision in this case were said to be as follows: (i) Is a payment made under the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 13, a "value payment" on which interest accrues under s. 10 (5) of the Act? (ii) If so, in a case (such as the present) where there have been several occasions of war damage to the hereditament, does such interest run from the date of the first of such occasions, or from the date of the last of such occasions, or must there be some kind of apportionment by reference to the dates of all the occasions?

The applicants, the Solicitors' Law Stationery Society, Ltd., ask me to say that interest runs from the first of the occasions (i.e., May 10, 1941). They state, as is, undoubtedly, the fact, that by far the greater part of the damage occurred on that day. The respondents, the War Damage Commission, contend (a) that in strictness no interest is payable, but admit (b) that they are willing to pay it as from the third and last of the occasions (July 18, 1944) in the circumstances of the present case. There was a second occasion, the date of which is Mar. 24, 1944. Each of the parties would naturally prefer me to hold that the principle of apportionment should be applicable rather than that the contention of the other party should prevail. The applicants submit that it would be difficult, although not impossible, to apply that principle. The respondents suggest that it could not be done at all.

The question is entirely one of the construction of the Act, through the tortuous windings of which I have once more been conducted under the expert guidance of counsel. The amount involved is large. The payment on which the interest (if any) has to be calculated is £42,000, increased by sixty per cent. under the War Damage (Increase of Value Payments) Order, 1947, to £67,200. The annual interest on that sum at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is £1,680. The difference between what the applicants claim and what the respondents are prepared to pay is about £5,370.

I think that a payment under s. 13 (1) (b), such as we have here, is one kind of a value payment, and may properly be described as a value payment, although it is, undoubtedly, a value payment of a peculiar and special kind—a value payment, one may say, with a difference. It is called a value payment in the section itself, sub-s. (2) beginning with these words: "In the case of a value payment made in exercise of the power conferred by this section . . ." It is so described in ss. 61 and 63 of the Act, and also in the War Damage (Increase of Value Payments) Order, 1947. It is likewise so described in the notice of determination from which the applicants are appealing. The omission of any reference to the section in s. 22 (1) (b), points to the same conclusion. With the exception of sub-s. (4), I think that s. 16 of the Act is not material to the question which I have to decide.

Now the difference between an ordinary value payment and what I may call a s. 13 value payment is in substance this. An ordinary value payment is an amount which must necessarily be ascertained under and according to the code of rules laid down in s. 10 of the Act. It is, notionally at any rate, a fixed amount, and, when once the right to an ordinary value payment has been established, the amount of it can, and must be, calculated without any room for variation either in the way of addition or deduction, and the amount so calculated must in such a case carry interest at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum payable when the payment is discharged: s. 10 (5) of the Act. I think that the interest falls to be calculated from the time of the occurrence of the war damage, if there was but one occasion, or probably by the method of apportionment to which I have already alluded if there were more occasions, but I need not so decide, for, in my judgment, the point does not really arise in the present case. The s. 13 value payment is, not a fixed amount, but a discretionary amount with a maximum limit of the amount at which an ordinary value payment would have been calculated: see s. 13 (1) (b) of the Act.

Now let me look at the notice of determination against which the applicants appeal. It must be read as a whole. It is described as a determination of the appropriate payment under s. 13, and by it the respondents give notice that, in exercise of the powers conferred on them by the section, they have determined that the payment should be the sum of £42,000, increased by the sixty per cent. to £67,200. True it is that they go on to say that they have computed that amount exactly as though it had been a case of an ordinary value payment, which looks as though the maximum amount permissible under the section was being awarded, but, at the foot of the form, attention is drawn to the notes on the back of it, which are headed "Important" and are described as notes "relating to the determination overleaf," i.e., on the other side of the sheet, and the first of such notes is in the following words:

"Interest at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per year (less income tax) will be paid on the amount of the value payment from the last notified date of damage to the date of payment."

Now, assuming without deciding, that a larger sum in respect of interest, i.e., interest from an earlier date than the last notified date, viz., July 18, 1944, could have been claimed if no mention of interest had been made in the determination appealed from, I think that the determination was validly made in this case under s. 13 (1) (b) fixing the amount at £67,200 plus interest from July 18, 1944, even though that was not the maximum sum of interest which might have been awarded under the section. The notice makes it quite clear to me that what the respondents have intended the applicants to have is £67,200, plus £1,680 per annum interest from July 18, 1944, and not £67,200, plus a larger sum for interest, i.e., interest calculated from some earlier date or dates. To put the matter in another way, if the applicants were justified in their contention that it was the larger amount of interest which should have been awarded, the respondents would be equally justified in saying that, if the interest or any part of the interest were to be calculated from an earlier date or dates, they would be giving the applicants more than they intended to give them in exercise of the discretion vested in them by the section, and that the matter could, and should be, re-opened to enable the necessary adjustments to be made. The result is that this application fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Order accordingly.

O'MEARA v. SOUTH EASTERN GAS BOARD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), June 30, 1950.]

Gas—Nationalisation—Agreement made after Nov. 19, 1945, but before Jan. 23, 1948—Disclaimer by area gas board—Reference to Gas Arbitration Tribunal—Disclaimer not allowed by tribunal—Jurisdiction of court—Gas Act, 1948 (c. 67), s. 36 (5).

By an agreement under seal, dated Dec. 28, 1945, and made between the plaintiff and the South Croydon Gas Co., the plaintiff was appointed general manager of the company and was admitted to the company's pensions fund. Under cl. 8 of the agreement the plaintiff was entitled to retire and to receive a pension and a payment for loss of office in the event of the transfer of the company's undertaking to any other authority or company. As from May 1, 1949, the property, rights, liabilities and obligations of the company were vested, by virtue of s. 17 of the Gas Act, 1948, in the defendants, the South Eastern Gas Board, who sought to disclaim the agreement under s. 22 (1) of the Act. On a reference of the matter to the Gas Arbitration Tribunal it was determined that the agreement ought not to be disclaimed and that the defendants' notice disclaiming the agreement should be revoked. The plaintiff then commenced proceedings against the defendants claiming (i) a declaration that he was entitled, under the agreement of Dec. 28, 1945, to an annuity for life as from May 1, 1949, and (ii) payment of the instalment of that annuity due on May 1, 1950. The preliminary point was taken by the defendants that, as reference had been made to the Gas Arbitration Tribunal with respect to a notice given under Part II of the Act, the tribunal had exclusive jurisdiction under s. 36 (5) of the Act to determine all claims arising under the agreement.

HELD: the application of s. 36 (5) of the Act was limited, by the opening words of sub-s. (1), to transactions entered into on or after Jan. 23, 1948, and, therefore, the court had jurisdiction to entertain the proceedings.

[FOR THE GAS ACT, 1948, s. 22, s. 36, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 888, 912.]

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of PARKER, J., in chambers, dated June 16, 1950, allowing an appeal by the defendants from an order of MASTER BURNAND, dated June 13, 1950, refusing the defendants' application for an order that the writ of summons in the action and all subsequent proceedings be set aside on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceedings by reason of the provisions of the Gas Act, 1948. The facts and the relevant sections of the Act of 1948 appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Gardiner, K.C., and M. L. Lyell for the plaintiff.

Upjohn, K.C., and Megaw for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This appeal raises a question of construction of two sections of the Gas Act, 1948. The main purpose of the Act—which was to effect what is ordinarily called the nationalisation of the gas industry—is familiar, and only the broad outlines are necessary for understanding the sections which we have to construe. Part I sets up area gas boards and the Gas Council. Part II deals with the acquisition of the existing gas undertakings, and it is on the construction of the sections in that Part of the Act that this case turns. Before going to them I will refer to s. 63 which sets up a Gas Arbitration Tribunal which is to deal with questions which under the Act are to be determined by arbitration. One of the sections that we have to construe contains an express reference to it.

The plaintiff, Mr. O'Meara, had a contract with the Croydon Gas Co. which was one of the companies or undertakings taken over by the South Eastern Gas Board under the statutory nationalisation scheme. The writ which he issued against the Gas Board claims a declaration that he is entitled, under an agreement in writing with the Croydon Gas Co., dated Dec. 28, 1945, to an annuity until his death and he claims payment of the instalment of that annuity due on May 1, 1950. The date of the agreement falls within what in the course of the argument was called "Period 2," the period referred to in the Act as between Nov. 19, 1945, and Jan. 23, 1948. The learned judge, reversing the learned master, decided that this court had no jurisdiction to entertain this claim, exclusive jurisdiction having been given to the arbitration tribunal under the Gas Act. The plaintiff appeals.

Section 22 of the Act is in a group of sections which is headed: "Part II. Acquisition of gas undertakings. Vesting of assets." It contains provisions by which agreements made by the undertakers are transferred to and become vested in the board. Section 22 gives the board power to disclaim agreements made in or subsequent to Period 2. It provides:

“(1) Where there are vested in any area board or in the Gas Council the rights, liabilities and obligations of any undertaker to whom this Part of this Act applies, being rights, liabilities and obligations under an agreement made or varied on or after Nov. 19, 1945, and the board or council are of opinion that the making or the variation of that agreement was not reasonably necessary for the purposes of the activities of the said undertaker or that the agreement was made or varied with an unreasonable lack of prudence on the part of the said undertaker, the board or council may, by notice in writing given to the other parties to the agreement before the expiration of three months from the vesting date, disclaim the agreement: Provided that any of the said parties may, within the prescribed period from the date on which the notice is served, refer to arbitration under this Act the question whether or not the agreement ought to be disclaimed. (2) On such arbitration, the arbitration tribunal, if satisfied that the agreement or variation was not reasonably necessary as aforesaid or was made with unreasonable lack of prudence, shall confirm the notice and if not so satisfied shall revoke it: Provided that, if the arbitration tribunal are satisfied that the agreement or variation thereof was made in the ordinary course of business and was in no way connected with any provision made by this Act, or with any anticipation of the making of any such provision, the tribunal shall revoke the notice. (3) Where a notice is so given by an area board or by the Gas Council with respect to any agreement and is not revoked by the arbitration tribunal . . . (b) the agreement shall be deemed to have been frustrated on the vesting date and the parties thereto for that reason to have been discharged from the further performance thereof . . .”

Broadly speaking, so far as that section is concerned, the only issues that would arise are: Is this a contract made in the ordinary course of business and in no way connected with any provision made by this Act; was it not reasonably necessary; and so on? I think that the section contemplates that every agreement should fall into one or other of those categories. Pausing there, it is possible that in settling that dispute a question of construction might arise. The board might say: “Look at this agreement. The consequences of it are clearly oppressive, and it was entered into with a view to nationalisation.” The other side might say with regard to an agreement before it: “That is not what it means at all. Properly construed, its effect is not onerous and is such as shows that it was entered into in the ordinary course of business.” It seems to me that that might be so, and if the board did come to a conclusion on a certain construction of the agreement and later proceedings should be taken—as I am going to hold is possible—in court, a question might arise whether the decision of the arbitration tribunal on the construction of the contract quoad the issue then raised constituted res judicata between the parties. That is a point that we have not got to decide today, and I mention it only because it seems to me that a point of construction might arise under s. 22. Section 22, then, gives a right to disclaim in respect of contracts made after Nov. 19, 1945, down to the vesting date.

The section on which this case turns is s. 36. In its opening words it is clearly dealing inter alia with a class of contract which might be included in the class dealt with in s. 22. It provides:

“(1) This section shall apply in any case where on or after Jan. 23, 1948, any company, being an undertaker to whom this Part of this Act applies and not being an ancillary gas undertaker, have—(a) made any payment . . . for an inadequate consideration; (b) sold or disposed of any of its property . . . for an inadequate consideration; (c) acquired any property . . . for an excessive consideration; (d) entered into or varied any agreement so as to require an excessive consideration to be . . . given by the company; or (e) entered into any other transaction of such an onerous nature as to cause a loss . . . and the payment . . . was not reasonably necessary for the purposes of the company or was made with an unreasonable lack of prudence on the part of the company . . .”

That section applies to agreements entered into after Jan. 23, 1948. Therefore, prima facie, this agreement, which was entered into in December, 1945, is outside it. Sub-section (2) provides: A and all interested parties are to be made parties to that application. It is not disputed that that applies to any transactions of the kind specified made after Jan. 23, 1948. Sub-section (3) provides:

“Where the arbitration tribunal are satisfied that the transaction in respect of which an application is made is a transaction to which this section applies, then, unless they are also satisfied that the transaction was in the ordinary course of business and was in no way connected with any provision made by this Act or with any anticipation of the making of any such provision, the tribunal shall determine the extent of the net loss or liability caused to or imposed on the company by the transaction, and shall make such orders against all or any of the parties to the application (other than the appropriate board) as the tribunal think just, having regard to the extent to which the parties were respectively responsible for the transaction or benefited from it, for the payment by them to the appropriate board of sums sufficient to enable the net loss or liability, or such part thereof as the tribunal think just, to be made good or met.” C D

The position, therefore, is that, in regard to contracts held to be unduly onerous which were made after Nov. 19, 1945, and up to, but not including Jan. 23, 1948, there is power to disclaim only. In respect of such contracts and transactions made after that date, in addition to the board's power to disclaim, the parties can be ordered to make repayments to the board in accordance with the provisions which I have read. E

So far, that provision might be invoked in a case where there was no question of disclaimer because the contract might have been executed and the loss incurred. The procedure had also to be adapted to cases where the contract had not been concluded, but there was a continuing agreement made after Jan. 23, 1948, which the board wished to disclaim. F

Sub-section (4) provides:

“Where the appropriate board have disclaimed an agreement or lease by a notice under this Part of this Act, being an agreement or lease entered into or varied on or after Jan. 23, 1948, the board may make an application to the arbitration tribunal under this section in respect of any loss or liability caused to or imposed on the company before the vesting date and, in the case of a lease, any loss or liability caused to or imposed on the board between the vesting date and the disclaimer of the lease, in consequence of the onerous nature of the agreement or lease.” G H

So far it is clear that we are dealing with applications by the board. As I see it, sub-s. (4) contemplates the case where the disclaimer, which would be under s. 22, has not been challenged, and it is saying that in that case the board can make an application for repayment.

The present dispute turns on sub-s. (5) which provides:

"Where any application is made to the arbitration tribunal under this section in respect of any transaction [in respect of third period matters] or a reference is made to that tribunal with respect to any notice given under this Part of this Act disclaiming an agreement or lease, the tribunal shall have exclusive jurisdiction—(a) to determine claims arising in respect of the transaction or under the lease or agreement . . ."

A Counsel for the board contends, and the learned judge has so held, that those words cover a reference in respect of a claim to disclaim an agreement made in Period 2. Counsel for the plaintiff contends that they must be restricted to what has so far been dealt with in s. 36, namely, Period 3, or post-Jan. 23, 1948, transactions. That is the first matter of dispute. Counsel for the board goes on to submit that, if he is right, and these words cover disputes as to the disclaimer of Period 2 agreements, then the words of sub-s. (5) (a) "to determine claims arising in respect of the transaction or under the lease or agreement" cover all claims in respect of that transaction including claims as to what the party to it is entitled to on the supposition, as happened here, that the agreement has been held not to be disclaimable. When the matter went before the arbitration tribunal on a reference under s. 22, the tribunal held that it was made in the ordinary course of business, and could not be disclaimed. That being so, we are now concerned with what the plaintiff is entitled to under it.

Counsel for the board says with force that whereas, for instance, in sub-s. (4), notwithstanding the opening words of s. 36 (1), it was thought necessary to repeat the limit of date and make it clear that sub-s. (4) applied only to post-Jan. 23, 1948 matters, when one comes to sub-s. (5) there is no such limitation, and that it would have been natural to insert the date or to put in the words "to which this section applies"—in other words, expressly to limit the generality of the words used if that had been intended. That argument has force, but I have come to the conclusion that the words must be limited for more than one reason. There is, I think, force in the submission of counsel for the plaintiff that where one is dealing, as we are in this appeal, with a claim as to what are the ordinary rights at law under a contract, one needs clear words to oust the jurisdiction of the court.

As was pointed out by DENNING, L.J., in the course of the argument, it is common ground that, if a contract the period of which is to extend after the vesting date is not disclaimed and no attempt is made to disclaim it, no one suggests that any tribunal other than the ordinary courts would decide the rights of the parties under it. Why should there be a different procedure if the board has unsuccessfully claimed that the contract should be disclaimed? The words of s. 36 (5) can, I think, be given effect while being limited to third period transactions. When Parliament came to sub-s. (5), it had, I think, covered the case of sub-s. (3), an application for payment when no question of disclaimer arises. It had covered the case where the board had disclaimed and the disclaimer was not challenged. Then it was realised that one might have a case of an agreement within this third period where the board had sought to disclaim and the party had claimed his right under s. 22 to refer the matter to the arbitration tribunal. Therefore, it was natural, when one came to sub-s. (5), to pick up that matter which might be in the process of getting itself before the tribunal in respect of a Period 3 agreement or transaction. I think that this sub-section, in dealing with the two matters which might be making their way towards arbitration, is emphasising the tribunal's exclusive jurisdiction. If that is right, I think that it decides this appeal. Prima facie, s. 36 is confined to third period matters. The words of sub-s. (5) can be given meaning and effect within that limit. It would be wrong by giving them a wider meaning to oust the jurisdiction of the court.

Counsel for the board does not contend that if sub-s. (5) is limited in the relevant words to Period 3 agreements we can do other than allow the appeal, but for myself I would like to say that I am not satisfied that the construction for which he contends with regard to sub-s. (5) (a) is necessarily right in its application to Period 3 agreements to which admittedly the words apply. I do not wish to express an opinion on a matter which we have not got to decide. I say only that to my mind it is not clear. It is an open issue which may or may not have to be decided some day whether these words in sub-para. (a) should not be confined to claims or disputes which arise out of the provisions of the Act and do not apply to a claim which is a claim under an agreement and has nothing to do with the Act in a case such as the present one where an agreement has been held to be of continuing effect as a legal agreement between the original party to it and the board instead of the undertaker. It is not clear to me that the tribunal is given exclusive jurisdiction to try claims of that kind which, as was pointed out in argument, might arise three or four years hence, long after the issue whether the agreement could or could not be disclaimed had been decided. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree with all that my Lord has said and I only add a few words in deference to the opinion of the judge. I start with the settled principle that the jurisdiction of these courts is not to be taken away except by clear words. I can find no such words in this Act. The opening sub-s. (1) of s. 36 defines the cases to which the whole section applies, and sub-s. (5) must, I think, be limited to those cases. The present case does not fall within them. The tribunal, therefore, has not got exclusive jurisdiction over it. In confirmation of this view I would point out that these courts clearly have jurisdiction over agreements which are not disclaimed at all. The courts also have jurisdiction over agreements which are rightfully disclaimed when the disclaimer is not challenged. It would be a strange thing if the courts had no jurisdiction when the agreements are wrongfully disclaimed. In my opinion, the courts have jurisdiction to deal with this case, and the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

CAMINER AND ANOTHER v. NORTHERN AND LONDON INVESTMENT TRUST, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord Reid and Lord Radcliffe), May 22, 23, 24, July 10, 1950.]

Negligence—Nuisance—Tree—Elm tree adjoining road—Fall on passing car—Fall due to disease—Liability of occupier of land.

The respondents were lessees of a block of flats which they occupied by their tenants. In the forecourt of the flats was a row of elm trees. On Apr. 7, 1947, the appellants were driving past the flats when one of the trees fell on their car, wrecking it and injuring the appellants. The fall was proved to have been due to a disease of the roots, which was of long standing, but the disease had not taken a normal course and there was no indication from the condition of the tree above ground that it was affected by the disease. The tree, which was about 130 years old, carried a considerable crown, although not abnormal for a tree of that age, and had never been lopped, topped or pollarded. Evidence was given that elm trees should be inspected every five or seven years, and, if this tree had been topped, it was unlikely that it would have fallen when it did, but it had not appeared to be dangerous to any of the witnesses who were called. On Mar. 1, 1947, the respondents had engaged a timber haulage contractor to advise what should be done with the elm tree in question as well as with the other elm trees on their property, not because they had any suspicion of the soundness or safety of the tree, but because they wished to put their gardens into good order. It appeared that the contractor did not think that the tree was likely to be a source of danger, and he proceeded to pollard the other trees first, leaving the tree in question untouched, with the result that some of the protection from the wind which the tree had formerly enjoyed was withdrawn. In an action by the appellants against the respondents for damages for negligence, and, alternatively, nuisance,

HELD: in the absence of any evidence that the respondents had failed in their duty to take reasonable care in the management of their premises, they were not liable.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL ([1949] 1 All E.R. 874), affirmed.

Per LORD RADCLIFFE: "I hope that I do not misinterpret the significance of this decision if I say that I do not think that it can be the last word on the position or liability of the tree-owner . . . The accepted test that liability only begins when there is apparent in the tree a sign of danger has the advantage that it seems to ignore, or to a large extent to ignore, the distinction between the spot that is much, and the spot that is little, frequented, but, on the other hand, I think that it does end by making the standard of the expert the test of liability . . ."

[AS TO OCCUPIER'S DUTY TOWARDS THE PUBLIC IN RESPECT OF THE STATE OF PREMISES ADJOINING A PUBLIC PLACE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 619-621, para. 870; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST Supp.]

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, ASQUITH and SINGLETON, L.JJ.), dated Apr. 12, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 874, allowing the defendants' appeal from a decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., dated Nov. 26, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 1101.

The first appellant and his wife, the second appellant, were injured by the fall of an elm tree standing on property occupied by the respondents, and they claimed damages from the respondents for negligence, and, alternatively, nuisance. LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that it was the duty of all owners of property to manage it in accordance with the principles of good estate management, so that their property might not be in a condition likely to cause damage to persons lawfully using highways in the immediate vicinity; as good estate management involved the inspection and trimming of trees from time to time, there was a duty on landowners to carry out those operations; and, as this duty had not been performed, the respondents were liable to the appellants. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision, and held that, since the appellants had failed to prove that the respondents, as ordinary, careful laymen, and not as experts, knew, or ought to have known, that the tree was dangerous, the respondents were not liable. In the House of Lords the appellants did not contend that any blame attached to the respondents for their failure to ascertain the diseased condition of the roots of the tree, but they maintained that the respondents were under a duty, as reasonable landowners in the proper management of their property, to lop, top, or pollard the tree in question, and that, if such action had been taken, the tree would not have fallen and injured the appellants. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD PORTER.

Fox-Andrews, K.C., and Rees-Davies for the appellants.

Beney, K.C., and R. M. H. Everett for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

July 10. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this case was tried by LORD GODDARD, C.J., sitting without a jury, and resulted in a finding for the two appellants for damages amounting to a total sum of £1,400. The Court of Appeal, however, unanimously reversed his judgment, though ASQUITH, L.J., apparently, entertained some doubt, and your Lordships have now to determine which of these two views should prevail.

The facts can be shortly stated. On Apr. 7, 1947, at about 12.50 p.m., the appellants were travelling along Prince Albert Road, St. John's Wood, in a motor car owned and driven by the first appellant when, as they approached the junction of Prince Albert Road and Wells Rise, an elm tree standing on land immediately adjoining the highway fell on the appellants' motor car, wrecked the motor car and injured both the appellants. The elm tree was growing in the forecourt of a block of flats known as St. James's Close, at the corner of Prince Albert Road and Wells Rise, of which the respondents were lessees and in occupation by their tenants. They became lessees in 1940, but in June, 1941, the premises were requisitioned by the Air Ministry who remained in occupation until April, 1946, when the premises were vacated by the Ministry and returned to the respondents. The day was fine, there was nothing exceptional about the wind, but it was blowing in strong squally gusts from time to time. The tree was a large, well-grown elm, between 120 and 130 years old. After it fell it was found that three of its roots were badly affected by a disease known as elm butt rot. The other three roots showed signs of rot, but were not so badly affected. The disease was of long standing, and must have been present in the roots many years before the respondents took possession of the property. The roots had not been cut at the time when the tree fell and there was no indication from its condition above ground that it was affected by this disease which had not taken a normal course inasmuch as the fungus which caused it was working out sideways along the main roots and had not affected the trunk. There was nothing, therefore, to indicate by external examination that the tree was in any way diseased and even if the trunk had been bored it was very unlikely that the existence of the disease would have been discovered. The learned Lord Chief Justice found that it carried a considerable crown, some thirty-five feet across, but this finding was challenged by the respondents and the evidence on which it is based must be considered later. In the opinion of the learned Lord Chief Justice its fall was due to a combination of circumstances, namely, the action of the wind on a tree bearing a large crown, the roots of which had rotted to a greater or less extent, and the non-trimming or lopping of the tree or its branches. He said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1103):

"Had it not been for the condition of the roots, it is probable that the wind was not heavy enough on the day in question to cause the tree to fall. On the other hand, had the tree not been bearing the amount of top hamper that it, in fact, was, and if it had been topped or pollarded, there is no reason to suppose that the tree would have fallen when it did, and it might have stood for a very considerable time."

On May 23, 1947, the appellants issued a writ claiming compensation for the damage alleged to have been suffered as a result of negligence or nuisance on the part of the respondents. In the circumstances set out above the appellants do not now contend that any blame attaches to the respondents for their failure to ascertain the diseased condition of the roots of the tree, but they maintain that in the particular circumstances of this case the respondents were under a duty as reasonable landowners in the proper management of their property to lop, top, or pollard this elm tree, and that, if such action had been taken, the tree would not have fallen when it did, and the appellants would not have suffered the damage complained of. In their submission, it is well-known that an elm tree is dangerous, treacherous, and shallow-rooted, and that either the branches are, or the whole tree is, liable to fall suddenly; that this was a large tree and well into middle-age, situated close to a busy thoroughfare, and carried a considerable crown; that it had never been lopped, topped or pollarded or otherwise treated at all by the respondents, and it was, or should have been, obvious to them, when they took over the property, that no such action had ever been taken; that it was close to a wall so that the ordinary layman would expect that the roots had, in fact, been cut to enable the footings of the wall to be built; and that for these reasons this particular tree ought to have been suspected and dealt with. Finally, they pointed out that the respondents had ample time either before or after the requisitioning to take the appropriate steps to render it innocuous. No action of any kind was, in fact, taken by the respondents until Mar. 1, 1947, when one Chipping was instructed to advise what should be done with this and the other trees on the property which also appear to have been elms. In calling in Mr. Chipping, however, the respondents were not influenced by any suspicion of the soundness or safety of the tree, but they took action because certain repairs of war damage to the buildings had been completed and they were anxious to put their gardens into good order. Nor, indeed, does Mr. Chipping appear to have thought this tree to be the source of any danger. Indeed, so little was such an idea present to his mind that he proceeded to pollard the others first, leaving this tree untouched until they had been dealt with lest they should be injured by its falling boughs, and one result at any rate of proceeding in this order was to withdraw some of the protection from the wind which the tree had formerly enjoyed.

My Lords, I have set out somewhat fully the arguments presented by the appellants in their case lest I should have failed to give due weight to them. One matter may, I think, be dealt with in the forefront of my opinion. It is suggested that a reasonably prudent landowner seeing this tree and its contiguity to the wall would suspect that the roots had been cut, and that, as a result, its supports had been weakened or that some disease had been set up. In fact, they had not been cut, no questions were put to any witness suggesting that such an eventuality was, or should have been, present to their minds, and no finding to this effect is contained in the Lord Chief Justice's judgment. I see no reason for inferring that a layman would draw such a deduction from the position of the tree. Still less should I be prepared to infer that he would suspect any disease of the roots. Boring into the trunk would not have disclosed it, and the Lord Chief Justice in terms states that he is quite satisfied that there was nothing in the appearance of the tree to indicate that it was in any way diseased. It is true that Mr. Aitkins, an expert called on behalf of the appellants, said he would have bored the trunk and found out the existence of the disease, but the Lord Chief Justice did not accept his evidence in this respect. If, then, an expert had been called in to diagnose whether this elm tree suffered from elm butt rot he would have given it a clean bill of health. Whether he would have advised topping and lopping is a different question, dependent on different considerations, but I cannot accept the view that the respondents were negligent merely because they failed to call in an expert to advise as to the possible existence of an unsuspected and undiscoverable disease even though an expert, if called in, might have recommended topping and lopping.

The issue seems to me a broader and more general one, viz., in the case of an apparently healthy elm tree, which was of obviously mature age, though by no means old, ought its owners either to have had it lopped and topped, or should they, at any rate, have called in an expert to advise them as to its treatment, and was this course the more imperative in the case of a tree standing near a public and well-used road? The answer in this particular case is somewhat complicated by the controversy as to whether the crown was a very large one or not.

The matter stands thus. Mr. Aitkins, at the beginning of his evidence on this part of the case, was asked:

"Q.—In your opinion is an elm tree of 125 years old, which has never been lopped, safe? A.—It depends on the size of its head. If it has a large head it should be lopped. Q.—Would you leave such a tree standing close to the highway without having it inspected? A.—No, most definitely not. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE: You would not leave any elm tree close to the highway without it being inspected, would you? A.—No, you would not. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE: You mean an old elm tree, Mr. Fox-Andrews. Mr. Fox-Andrews: Yes, my Lord. The Witness: Yes, or a tree completely out of balance, with an enormous head for the height of the bole. Mr. Fox-Andrews: That deals with inspection. Would you leave any tree such as this close to the highway without it being lopped? I say 'such as this,' meaning an elm tree 125 years old or more? A.—No, I would take precautions and have it lopped."

The witness had never seen the tree itself though he had seen photographs, presumably of it in its fallen state. Yet he expressed the view that it had a very large head and said that Mr. Chipping had told him so, though Mr. Chipping denied having done so, but, even so, the stress is mainly laid on an enormous head and inspection to see whether it required lopping rather than on lopping itself, though at the end the witness does say he himself would take precautions and have it lopped. Apart from his testimony no evidence as to the size of the head was given on behalf of the appellants except that of Mr. Dunk, who was garden superintendent of the St. Marylebone Borough Council. He knew the tree, had seen it in position, said it appeared to be perfectly healthy, and had instructed the Air Force to cut away the boughs below seven feet so as not to interfere with passers by. In re-examination he was asked:

"Q.—Ought elm trees to be lopped and topped from time to time? A.—I consider growing near a thoroughfare or open space I should certainly lop them if they had got any big tops at all."

Beside this question and answer, however, must be set what he had said earlier:

"Q.—In the course of your inspection and walking round, supposing you come across a tree which you regard as a potential danger to the public in any way, do you, as a fact, report it? A.—I do."

Admittedly he made no report on this tree. Later, Mr. Prosser, who was one of the respondents' tenants and occupied a flat in the building close to and looking immediately on the tree in question, expressed the opinion that the crown was by no means a large one more particularly when compared with others in the neighbourhood. After his evidence had been given, Mr. Dunk was recalled. He said, in the first place, that after the tree had fallen its top extended right across the road and estimated its crown as about thirty-five feet. This measurement I take to be the height of the crown, not its breadth, as the tree fell lengthwise across the road. Mr. Chipping, on the other hand, who removed it and disposed of the timber said that the tree was about forty feet in height—that about twelve feet of trunk fell inside the garden and the rest in the road. That would mean twenty-eight feet in the road only, and at best Mr. Dunk's estimate must be but a rough one. I should myself think Mr. Chipping a better judge of its size, and, after all, it is not the truthfulness of the witnesses that is in question, but their ability to make an accurate estimate. But I do not think its exact size, whether it was thirty or thirty-five feet, is of much importance. There is nothing to show that even thirty-five feet would be an exceptionally large head on such a tree. Like SOMERVELL, L.J., I can find no evidence to this effect, nor to the effect that a prudent landowner would have suspected any danger, and the question admittedly is not how an expert would deal with the tree but what a prudent landowner would do. So far as the respondents' witnesses are concerned, none appears to have had any suspicion, and, if they are to be held negligent, it must be because they ought to have envisaged danger.

Unless one is to take the view that every elm tree over one hundred years old growing beside a busy street should be lopped and that its owner is guilty of negligence unless he so treats it, I see no reason for imputing a want of care on the part of the respondents. If I did so, I should feel obliged to regard Mr. Chipping to blame, since he not only saw no urgency in getting to work on this tree, but even weakened its staunchness by cutting away the branches of other trees in its neighbourhood and leaving it less protected than before. Moreover, it was not in leaf, but was just coming into bud so that it had not yet reached a stage at which a heavy strain might be expected to be placed on its roots. As I understand the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, however, he does take the view that any prudent landowner on whose soil an elm tree of one hundred years' growth or over is to be found should foresee the danger of it falling or of its branches breaking away, and this is the basis of his judgment. For this view he finds particular support in the evidence of Mr. Le Sueur, an expert admittedly of great eminence, called on behalf of the respondents. The Lord Chief Justice's words have been quoted in the Court of Appeal, but, perhaps, I may be excused for repeating them. He says ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1103):

"... it is the duty of all owners of property to manage it in accordance with the principles of good estate management so that their property may not be in a condition likely to cause damage to persons lawfully using highways in the immediate vicinity, and, if good estate management involves the inspection and trimming of trees from time to time, there is a duty on landowners to carry out those operations. Mr. Le Sueur, who was called by the defendants, and who gave his evidence with a frankness which was most refreshing, said that elm trees should be inspected every five to seven years, and that if this tree had been lopped it is very unlikely that it would have fallen when it did. If, therefore, principles of good estate management require periodical inspection and cutting, it is not open to an occupier of property who maintains on his land trees which immediately adjoin or are very close to a highway to say: 'Well, I did not know that I ought to have done it'."

I take the suggested obligation to manage property in accordance with the principles of good estate management to mean no more than that the party concerned must act as a prudent landowner would. If it means more I could not subscribe to it, but, even so, to the extent that the passage is based on the impression that Mr. Le Sueur considered that elm trees should be inspected every five or seven years in order to see whether they require lopping, it contains, as I think, a misapprehension as to that gentleman's view. As I understand him, he did not state that an elm, even if mature, should be inspected with a view to lopping at these intervals, but he said that once it was lopped it ought thereafter to be inspected every five or seven years because after lopping its wounds may rot. He was asked:

"Q.—If it was lopped how long do you think it reasonable to elapse before you lopped it again? A.—If you treat the wounds very carefully, it does not rot as fast as it would if you leave the branches alone but ordinarily speaking I should say five to seven years from the lopping point of view. Lopping a tree may make it more dangerous in the end, of course."

This evidence expresses no opinion as to when an elm tree should first be lopped. It is concerned only with the question as to the intervals at which it should be inspected after it has once been lopped in order to see if the wounds caused by lopping have rotted. Mr. Le Sueur's general view as to when an elm tree requires lopping is, I believe, summed up in his statement in answer to the learned Lord Chief Justice, who said:

"I want to know what a prudent owner should do in deciding whether an elm tree should be lopped. A.—If a trunk is a straight one and it has not swelled out at the bottom and does not have rising roots and has a comparatively compact crown and has not any obviously very heavy boughs, that owner should consider his tree safe. Beyond that I do not think any reasonable being can go."

From this view I do not think he ever resiled. Indeed, except possibly in the case of falling boughs, which are not now in issue, he was not inclined to give an exceptionally bad name to the elm tree. He says:

"I have a very wide experience of elms and I think the elm is a rather maligned tree. It is a very easy statement to make [i.e., that elms are notoriously untrustworthy]. I know elms have a higher percentage of heart rot for the species than other trees, but there are an awful lot of elms in the country which have not."

Undoubtedly, he thinks elms less staunch than other trees and that as a matter of theory they should be inspected, as soon as they are big enough to damage anyone if they fall. He is, however, speaking theoretically and not practically, and of inspection not lopping, and however carefully this tree had been inspected it would have shown no flaw. When the question to and answer of Mr. Aitkins: "Would you leave any tree such as this close to the highway without it being lopped? I say 'such as this' meaning an elm tree 125 years old or more? —No, I would take precautions and have it lopped," are put to him and he is asked: "Do you disagree with that?", he will go no further than to say: "Not in a general way, no"—a reply which I find of very little assistance one way or the other. The appellants laid much reliance on one answer given by Mr. Le Sueur to a question put to him from the bench. He had said:

"Judging from the photograph, I should say it was a normal tree, but with regard to it not requiring attention, of course, I cannot get sufficient from the photograph to say anything at all."

The Lord Chief Justice then asked him:

"Q.—Do you think you might have said if you went by: 'Why on earth don't they have it lopped?' A.—Yes, I think so."

If I thought that this answer meant that judging from the appearance of the tree Mr. Le Sueur regarded it as potentially unsafe, the evidence would require very careful consideration before one could conclude that the respondents had exercised due care, but to give his answer this interpretation is to contradict everything he has just said and the response is so condensed that its meaning is obscure. Had the question been: "Do you think you would have, not you might have, said, 'Why don't they have it lopped'?", the witness might be taken to be saying that the tree was, in his opinion, unsafe. As it is, it seems to me merely the scientist's careful reply in a case where he has insufficient evidence to give a certain answer one way or the other. He might, or he might not, have expected it to require lopping and had not the material requisite to enable him to make up his mind. In any case he is answering as an expert not as a prudent landowner.

If, as I have said, it is the duty of every owner of an elm tree near or overhanging a road to lop and top that tree as soon as it has reached an early middle age, however sound it is found to be on external examination, then the respondents were negligent, but short of this, in the circumstances of the case now under consideration, they appear to me to be free from blame whether the case against them is framed in negligence or nuisance. For myself, I do not regard the evidence as establishing that elm trees are so plainly a danger as to require their being lopped and topped lest they should fall, though to all external appearance they are sound and no inspection would raise a doubt as to their general condition. If such a duty existed there would be, I imagine, a vast number of negligent persons who are only saved from liability owing to the chance that their elm trees have, in fact, resisted the forces tending to make them fall. I should dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD NORMAND (read by LORD PORTER): My Lords, the appellants felt themselves unable to support the ground of judgment on which they had succeeded before LORD GODDARD, C.J. Mr. Le Sueur, one of the expert witnesses, had said that once an elm had been lopped it should, ordinarily speaking, be lopped again five to seven years later because the wounds inflicted by lopping exposed it to the invasion of disease. The evidence that elms should be lopped at brief intervals was taken by the learned Lord Chief Justice to apply to unlopped elms, and he held on this evidence that it is a reasonable and proper precaution for the occupier of property on which there are elm trees bordering on or near to a public road to lop or pollard them as an ordinary incident of good estate management. I respectfully think that good estate management is not the correct test and that the misunderstanding of the import of Mr. Le Sueur's evidence deprives the finding, so far as it is a relevant finding of fact, of the value which it would otherwise have had. The Court of Appeal applied what is, I think, the proper test—the conduct to be expected from a reasonable and prudent landowner—and held on the evidence that the respondents had satisfied this test, because there was nothing dangerous in the appearance of the tree, no sign of disease, advanced age, disproportion of crown to stem, or of rising roots. The appellants in this House accepted the test applied by the Court of Appeal, but they put forward the proposition that on the evidence it was established that a reasonable and prudent landowner, having on his property a well-grown elm with a large crown, which has not been lopped or topped and which is adjacent to a busy thoroughfare, has the duty either to lop or top the tree or to take the advice of a reasonably competent expert as to the necessary action to be taken for the protection of the public safety.

The test of the conduct to be expected from a reasonable and prudent landlord sounds more simple than it really is. For it postulates some degree of knowledge on the part of landlords which must necessarily fall short of the knowledge possessed by scientific arboriculturists but which must surely be greater than the knowledge possessed by the ordinary urban observer of trees or even of the countryman not practically concerned with their care. The evidence in this case was not directed with the precision which I should have liked to defining the degree of knowledge to be expected from a reasonable and prudent landlord, but it is possible to piece together from the evidence the characteristics of the elm, or, at any rate, of the common elm, which are notorious or generally recognised by persons concerned with the care of them and which have a bearing on the danger which they may cause when they are growing on or near ground to which the public has lawful access. They are less resistant to wind than the other common British trees; the limbs and branches are more likely to fall; they are more prone to disease; their lateral roots are shallow and their tap root decays with age, so that the trees themselves are also more likely to fall. That knowledge the reasonable and prudent landlord may be expected to possess, and if through lack of it he fails to take appropriate precautions he must bear the consequences. If a landlord is aware of his ignorance about elms he would obtain the advice of someone better instructed, not a scientific expert in the ordinary case, but another landlord with greater experience or a practical forester, for example.

The elm which caused the damage complained of was a mature tree. It was about 130 years old as was found when the rings were counted after it was cut up, and though no one could have told its age merely by looking at it while it was still standing it would have been apparent to anyone that it was a well grown tree. Its growth was upright; it was about forty feet high; its bole was about three feet in diameter; and its crown as estimated by a witness, whose evidence the Lord Chief Justice accepted, was some thirty-five feet across. That is, according to the evidence, not an abnormal crown for a well grown elm forty feet high, but it can fairly be described as considerable. The tree was growing close to a busy street in north London. The roots were not rising, but some of them were badly affected by rot caused by fungus which usually attacks the tree at the point where it has received a wound. There was, however, no evidence that the roots had ever been cut. The disease was of long-standing, and it had taken an unusual course by moving along the main roots without affecting any part of the trunk. There was nothing in the appearance of the tree to suggest that it was in any way diseased, and the presence of the disease could not have been detected by the methods usually employed when disease is suspected. The fall of the tree was caused by the force of a squally gust of wind acting on the crown and by the diseased condition of the roots.

What would a reasonable and prudent landlord have done about the tree? There is more than enough evidence of what scientific experts would have thought or done, but there is a paucity of evidence about what a reasonable and prudent landlord would have done. The appellants called Mr. Aitkins, who had been a lecturer on forestry at Aberdeen University and was, at the time of the trial, carrying on business as an adviser in forestry. I shall quote a short passage from his examination-in-chief.

"Q.—In your opinion, is an elm tree of 125 years old, which has never been lopped, safe? A.—It depends on the size of the head. If it has a large head, it should be lopped. Q.—Would you leave such a tree standing close to the highway without having it inspected? A.—No, most definitely not. Q.—You would not leave any elm tree close to the highway without it being inspected, would you? A.—No, you would not. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE: You mean an old elm tree, Mr. Fox-Andrews. Mr. Fox-Andrews: Yes, my Lord. The Witness: Yes, or a tree completely out of balance, with an enormous head for the height of the bole. Mr. Fox-Andrews: That deals with inspection. Would you leave any tree such as this close to the highway without it being lopped? I say 'such as this,' meaning an elm tree 125 years old or more. A.—No, I would take precautions and have it lopped."

In his re-examination he is asked:

"Q.—If you had found this tree—about 130 years old and in this position with a very large crown which had never been lopped—what would you have said was the proper thing to do from the point of view of public safety, quite apart from disease? A.—To have it lopped and docked to safe proportions for the benefit of the public, without any doubt."

Reasonable exception may be taken to the description of the crown as very large, but, allowing for that, I think that this witness does support the proposition advanced by the appellants. Mr. Dunk, garden-superintendent of the St. Marylebone Borough Council, was also called by the appellants. During the war he had observed this tree and had asked the occupants to cut some branches which were lower than seven feet from the ground. This was in the exercise of a statutory power and the occupiers complied with his request. He was asked in cross-examination whether he would report it if he came across a tree which he regarded as a potential danger to the public and he said that he would, but he had never had occasion to make any adverse report on this tree. In his re-examination he said of elm trees in general that he would lop them, though they were not apparently diseased, if they were growing near a thoroughfare or in an open space and had "any big tops at all." The appellants do not, in my opinion, obtain much advantage from the evidence of Mr. Dunk.

Of the respondents' witnesses Mr. Gabell, a maintenance surveyor employed by Messrs. Hillier, Parker, May & Rowden, who managed the property on which the tree grew, said that it was similar in size to many other elms in the neighbourhood. He had advised that this tree and others growing beside it should be topped, not because of any question of safety, but to let more light and air into the garden of the respondents' block of flats. Mr. Chipping was employed in March, 1947, by Messrs. Hillier, Parker & Co., to top this group of trees. He said that there was nothing whatever which would have led him to say that he was suspicious of this tree. He left the topping of it to the last because that suited the work he had to do and he does not seem to have thought that his men working near it were running any risk. In cross-examination he stated that he had lopped or topped many elm trees close to highways or property though they were less than one hundred years old, but this bare statement without more detail is of little assistance in the case. Mr. Le Sueur, another witness for the respondents, holds a special diploma in forestry and arboriculture and has long been a consultant in forestry. He is a specialist and a scientist, but he showed more than once in his evidence his understanding that the reasonable and prudent landlord was not to be expected to have his knowledge of trees and their treatment. The Lord Chief Justice was favourably impressed by him and commended his frankness. By experience and by the quality of his evidence I think that he is by far the most important witness on this question of the alleged duty to lop elm trees. In his examination-in-chief he explained the considerations which would guide him in advising whether to lop an elm tree—whether it is standing where unsuspecting people go; whether it is standing upright or inclined; the size of the crown; whether any work had been done which might have damaged the roots. He sums up thus:

"If the trunk is a straight one and it has not swelled out at the bottom and does not have rising roots, and has a comparatively compact crown and has not any obviously very heavy boughs, the owner should consider his tree safe. Beyond that I do not think any reasonable human being can go."

In his cross-examination, after some introductory matter, in which he said that the elm is a rather maligned tree but that it is nevertheless more dangerous than other trees and that it owes most of its popular ill-repute to damage caused by the falling of branches, he is asked:

"Q.—If you have got a tree 130 years old standing in a position in which if it falls or a branch falls a member of the public may be killed, and if you have occupied the land for years, ought you not at some time to have it inspected? A.—Well, I think so; though, of course, I may say that if everybody thought so I would be a much richer man than I am now—the enormous number of trees that are never inspected."

The duty of inspection is put to him in a series of questions following on this. Then the evidence of Mr. Aitkins embodied in the answer to the last question in the passage which I have quoted above is put to him, and he says that in a general way he would not disagree with it. I must refer also to a question put to him by the Lord Chief Justice at the end of his re-examination. He was asked:

"Q.—Do you think you might have said if you went by 'Why on earth don't they have it lopped?' A.—Yes, I think so."

My Lords, I hope that I have fairly and adequately summarized Mr. Le Sueur's very important evidence. After repeated consideration of his evidence as a whole, I think that it comes to this. A reasonable and prudent landlord would inspect or cause to be inspected any good-sized elm growing in a place where unsuspecting persons may lawfully approach it; that this inspection is for the purpose of deciding whether to have it lopped; that if the trunk is straight and there are no rising roots, a comparatively compact crown, no obviously very heavy boughs, and, it may be added, no sign of rot or disease, the owner may count the tree safe. He himself, if inspecting on behalf of the owner, would certainly have lopping or topping very much in mind and would, judging from his answer to the Lord Chief Justice, begin by asking, not whether it ought to be lopped, but whether it ought not to be lopped. I think it would be unfair to him, however, to conclude that he resiled from his evidence that, if the trunk is straight and has not swelled out at the bottom, if there are no rising roots and the crown is comparatively compact, and there are no obviously heavy boughs, the owner would consider his tree safe. From his evidence, as also from the evidence of Mr. Gabell, it is plain, as indeed everyone who can recognise an elm can see for himself, that, if there is a duty to lop or top all well grown elms in or near public places, it is a duty which is not observed by a vast number of owners, public and private.

The next question is whether the respondents performed the duty of inspection which, I infer from the evidence of Mr. Le Sueur, a reasonable and prudent landlord would perform. Plainly they did not, but it is not less plain that, if they had, it would probably have made no difference. The tree was just such a tree as Mr. Le Sueur says the owner might consider safe. I cannot hold that the appellants have satisfactorily proved that the negligence was a cause of the accident by which they suffered the damage in respect of which they sue. In general I respectfully agree with the judgment in the Court of Appeal. The appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree with the judgment of TUCKER, L.J. The respondents' duty was to act as ordinary prudent landowners would act. Landowners are not all experts in the management of trees and those who are not perform their duty if they take reasonable steps to employ persons who are experts. The respondents employed the well known firm of estate agents, Messrs. Hillier, Parker, May and Rowden, to manage this property and they in their turn employed Mr. Chipping, a timber contractor, who has been engaged in timber felling since 1915. It was decided between Mr. Gabell, a maintenance surveyor of Messrs. Hilliers, and Mr. Chipping that the trees in front of the respondents' flats including the tree in question should be lopped and topped generally to open up the gardens to get more light and air into them so that the grass and flowers might grow. It was not suggested in cross-examination either to Mr. Gabell or to Mr. Chipping that the trees were being lopped for any other reason or because they appeared to anyone to be unsafe. On the contrary, Mr. Chipping said when asked:

"Q.—To you, a man who has been engaged in the timber business and tree felling business for a good many years, walking up to that tree on Mar. 1 and looking at it, was there anything which would have led you to say 'I am very suspicious of this'? A.—Nothing whatever."

What more would the ordinary prudent landowner do? Mr. Chipping was not a servant of the respondents. It cannot be that a landowner must consult other experts or that because experts may be called at the trial after an accident who think the accident might have been foreseen that the landowner who did not consult them or act in accordance with their view is negligent. As a matter of fact none of the experts called in the case who had seen the tree before it fell thought it appeared dangerous, and it is not at all clear, in my view, that even the expert witnesses who had not seen the tree in growth would have considered it dangerous. For these reasons I am of opinion that there was no evidence that the respondents failed in their duty to take reasonable care in the management of their premises, and the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD REID (read by LORD RADCLIFFE): My Lords, I have no doubt that a person who has a tree which is in such a position that it or some of its branches may fall and injure some person passing along a busy thoroughfare is under some duty to those who pass. The place where the accident happened out of which this case has arisen was a busy street in London and in what I say I do not intend to express any opinion about the extent of the duty of a person who has trees near an unfrequented highway or near some other place to which the public have access. I think that the respondents' duty was to take such steps to prevent danger as a reasonable man in the respondents' position would have taken. In 1940 they became lessees of a block of flats in the forecourt of which stood a number of trees. The premises were requisitioned from 1941 to 1946, when the respondents regained possession. On Apr. 7, 1947, one of the trees in the forecourt fell across the adjoining street and struck a motor car in which the appellants were travelling. It is clear that the respondents were entitled to deal with this tree but they had done nothing to it. The question is whether its fall on that occasion was due to negligence on their part. No separate case of nuisance is now maintained.

I think that the respondents' duty was not limited to dealing with any danger of which they might happen to be aware, and if a person has any further duty than that with regard to trees his first step must be to look at those trees which are near the highway or to get someone else to do so on his behalf to see whether any of them is dangerous. The respondents being a company could only adopt the latter alternative. I think that it was their duty to have this tree inspected within a reasonable time and it was not suggested that before the accident they did not have ample time to do this and to consider the results of an inspection and take any necessary action. In fact, in January, 1946, before the end of the period of requisition they appointed a firm of auctioneers and surveyors as their managing agents, but those agents never inspected the trees in the forecourt to see whether they appeared to be safe or not. After certain repairs were completed and in the course of "tidying up" they ordered a contractor to top and lop the trees to let in more light and air and the contractor would have reached the tree which fell a few days after the accident. This operation, however, had nothing to do with safety and any steps with that object could and should have been taken much earlier. It is not material to this case to consider whether or not the managing agents had any duty under their contract with the respondents to see to the safety of the trees. If they had not, the respondents failed in their duty because they did nothing about safety. If the managing agents had a duty under their contract, they failed to carry it out, but the respondents would not be absolved by engaging agents to carry out their duty if in fact those agents did nothing.

But it is not enough for the appellants to prove that the respondents failed to take any steps. To succeed they must also prove that proper inspection ought to have led to something being done which would have prevented the accident. The tree in question was an elm tree. The evidence shows that its roots were much weakened by disease, but that disease had taken an unusual course and no reasonable examination, even by an expert in tree diseases, would have disclosed this danger. The tree was perfectly healthy in appearance, but that appearance was deceptive and the hidden weakness in its roots led to its fall. In these circumstances the first question to consider is, I think, whether the evidence in this case establishes that every fully grown elm tree in a dangerous position ought to be lopped or otherwise dealt with as a safety precaution no matter how healthy it may seem to be. It is only if that is not proved that it is necessary to go on to consider whether there was anything special about this tree which should have been apparent on inspection and which called for precautionary action.

On the first question LORD GODDARD, C.J., who tried the case, found for the appellants. I think that the basis of his decision is contained in this sentence ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1104):

"In this case the evidence satisfies me that it is a reasonable and proper precaution for the occupier of property on which there are elm trees bordering or near to the road to top or pollard them as an ordinary incident of good estate management."

This is so broadly stated as to include all fully grown elm trees (I assume that young trees were not intended to be included), and if I could find evidence to support this conclusion I would be very reluctant to disturb it. But with all respect I cannot find that evidence. If it were an ordinary incident of good estate management or a general practice to lop or pollard or otherwise remove parts of all fully grown elms standing near roads, whether the tree appeared to be normal and healthy or not, that must have been known at least to the expert witnesses who gave evidence in this case, but no witness speaks of such a practice. Mr. Aitkins, the expert who gave evidence for the appellants, carries on business as a forestry adviser and has been a university lecturer. He gave evidence at some length to show that inspection would have revealed peculiar features about this tree—in particular, the root disease—which required that action should be taken, but his evidence as to what should have been done on the assumption that inspection revealed nothing abnormal was confined to a few short answers. It had been found by counting the rings in a section of the trunk after the tree had fallen that the tree was about 130 years old, and Mr. Aitkins, who never saw the tree, said that he had been told that it had a very large crown and he thought that this was so from looking at a photograph of the fallen tree. He was then asked:

"Q.—In your opinion is an elm tree of 125 years old which had never been lopped safe? A.—It depends on the size of the head. If it has a large head it should be lopped."

He then referred to an old elm tree or a tree "completely out of balance with an enormous head for the height of the bole" and when asked:

"Q.—Would you leave any tree such as this close to the highway without it being lopped? I say 'such as this', meaning an elm tree 125 years old or more. A.—No, I would take precautions and have it lopped."

In re-examination he was asked, leaving the question of disease entirely out of account:

"Q.—If you had found this tree at about 130 years old and in this position with a very large crown which had never been lopped what would you have said was the proper thing to do from the point of view of public safety, quite apart from disease? A.—To have it lopped and docked to safe proportions for the benefit of the public, without any doubt."

Not only does Mr. Aitkins nowhere say that there is any general rule or practice of lopping elms in the interests of safety; he does not even say that, in his opinion, there ought to be. When he advocates lopping it is always with reference to trees with large crowns or with some other particular feature. The other expert who gave evidence is Mr. Le Sueur. He is highly qualified and has been in practice as a consultant for twenty years. LORD GODDARD, C.J., said of him that he gave his evidence with a frankness which was most refreshing. When he was asked what a prudent owner should do in deciding whether an elm tree should be lopped, he said:

"If the trunk is a straight one and it has not swelled out at the bottom and does not have rising roots and has a comparatively compact crown and has not any obviously very heavy boughs that owner should consider his tree safe. Beyond that I do not think any reasonable human being can go."

He agreed that an elm should certainly be inspected with a view to lopping before it is one hundred years old, but he did not say that it should certainly be lopped. He was asked whether he disagreed with Mr. Aitkins' answer which I have quoted: "No, I would take precautions and have it lopped" and he replied: "Not in a general way, ^{no}." I cannot find that any of the other witnesses refer to dealing with elms as an ordinary incident of good estate management or speak of any general rule that all elms near a road should be lopped. All the witnesses agree that elms are more dangerous than other trees commonly found in this country, partly because the branches are apt to fall unexpectedly and partly because they are shallow rooted, and I think that it is plain that action should be taken if there is any reason to suspect weakness on inspecting any particular tree. That, however, is quite another thing from lopping all elms irrespective of their condition as an ordinary incident of good estate management.

So, in my judgment, the appellants can only succeed in this appeal if they can show that there was something about this particular tree which should have suggested that lopping or other action was necessary. What inspection suggests will depend on the knowledge and experience of the inspector, and there has been some controversy about the degree of knowledge and experience necessary for adequate inspection. Plainly it would be no use to send a person who knew nothing about trees. The alternatives put forward were that he should be an expert or that he should have at least such knowledge and experience of trees as a landowner with trees on his land would generally have. As the question depends on what a reasonable man would do I think that it may be put in this way. Would a reasonable and careful owner without expert knowledge but accustomed to dealing with his trees and having a countryman's general knowledge about them think it necessary to call in an expert to advise him or would he think it sufficient to act at least in the first instance in his own knowledge and judgment? The evidence in this case does not convince me that he should call in an expert. There must be many owners of elm trees beside busy roads, and, if it were proper for them to seek expert advice, I would expect, making every allowance for the facts that not all owners are reasonable and careful and that even reasonable people frequently omit to do what they know they ought to do, that it would appear that expert advice was not infrequently sought, but the evidence in this case does not bear this out. Mr. Le Sueur gave clear evidence that inspection was necessary, but he did not say that it should be, or commonly was, by an expert, and Mr. Chipping, a contractor accustomed to dealing with trees, spoke of a number of his clients who had engaged him to lop elms but not of any who had consulted him as to whether their trees should be lopped. In his experience, apparently, the decision to lop was the unaided decision of the client. So, I think, the question is whether a person with general knowledge and experience of trees would, or should, have advised the respondents that this elm tree, notwithstanding its normal healthy appearance, ought to be lopped, or at least that there was such doubt that expert advice should be sought if it was desired to keep the tree untouched. It appears from the evidence that lopping is an operation which can damage a tree. It wounds the tree, and, according to Mr. Le Sueur, even if the wound is carefully treated, the tree should not be left untended thereafter for more than five or seven years. He said: "Lopping a tree may make it more dangerous in the end of course," but he admitted that, if this tree had been lopped, any immediate danger would have been removed.

Apart from the root disease, which could not have been detected on inspection, the two features of this tree which are dealt with in the evidence are its age and the size of its crown. When this tree fell the rings were counted in a section of the trunk and its age was found to be about 130 years. The experts were agreed that this is only middle age for an elm. Mr. Aitkins said that an elm can reach the age of five hundred years provided it is not exposed to wounding. There is no evidence of how the approximate age of a growing tree can be determined, or whether an elm of 130 years old would appear to a person of ordinary knowledge different from a younger tree which has just attained full stature, and I can find no basis in the evidence for the suggestion that, while it may be safe as a general rule to leave a younger elm unlopped, it is different when it comes to such an age as 130 years. In my opinion, it is not proved that on inspection the age of the tree alone ought to have suggested that action was necessary. The main feature relied on for the appellants was the size of the crown. The experts were agreed that any tree with a very large crown ought to be lopped for safety and I think that a person with general knowledge of trees would take the same view. But how large was this crown? Mr. Aitkins, who never saw the tree, thought from information given to him and from looking at photographs of the fallen tree that it was very large. One witness, Mr. Dunk, being recalled, estimated its diameter at thirty-five feet and thought it was large, but the experts were not asked whether a thirty-five feet crown would be large for a tree of this character. Mr. Dunk was an officer of the borough council and he had observed the tree in the course of his duties. He said that when he came across a tree which he regarded as a potential danger he reported it, but he made no report about this tree. The maintenance surveyor of the respondents' managing agents, asked whether it appeared to be an unusually large top, said it was quite in keeping with the rest of the trees in the neighbourhood, but, no doubt, he had an interest as his firm might be blamed for taking no action. A resident who saw the tree every day saw nothing unusual about it. He was interested in elm trees, but may not have had much knowledge. The contractor, who was engaged in topping and lopping the trees and knew something about trees, saw nothing abnormal about this tree, and said he thought the crown, not a large, but an ordinary, one, but Mr. Aitkins said that this contractor had told him that it was a very large crown. Mr. Le Sueur did not see the tree, and, when asked whether the photograph showed anything abnormally large about the top, he said he would not like to answer that question. The evidence which gives me most difficulty on this question is a passage in his re-examination:

"If I looked at the photograph I would not say 'Good gracious what is the matter with this tree.' Q.—Would you say 'Good gracious what an enormous tree; it ought to have been lopped' or would you say that it was a normal tree not calling for attention? A.—Judging from the photograph I should say that it was a normal tree, but with regard to it not requiring attention, of course I cannot get sufficient from the photograph to say anything at all. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE: Do you think you might have said if you went by: 'Why on earth don't they have it lopped?' A.—Yes, I think so."

If the last answer means that Mr. Le Sueur thinks that he would have thought lopping appropriate even at a glance, that would tell very strongly in favour of the appellants, because if the matter was so clear to him as that it surely ought not to have escaped the notice of a less highly qualified inspector, but, if he meant that, this answer is quite out of line with the rest of his evidence. I do not think that he can have meant more, in assenting to what was suggested to him, than that if he had seen the tree he might have seen something which called for lopping. The rest of his evidence is to the effect that, so far as his information went, it did not suggest that. But, perhaps, the best reason for not attributing too much importance to this passage is that it is not mentioned in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J. LORD GODDARD, C.J., refers to the tree carrying "a considerable crown" and "bearing a large crown," but, as I have already said, he does not base his judgment on this. The matter was argued again in the Court of Appeal, and I agree with the opinion of TUCKER, L.J., who said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 876):

A "If the judgment had been based on the ground that the crown of the tree was of abnormal size so as to make it apparent to a layman that it was a potential danger, I should have been of the opinion that the evidence was not sufficient to justify such a finding. A study of the judgment, however, satisfies me that it was not based on this finding. The Lord Chief Justice does not say it was abnormal, merely that it was large or considerable, which I take to mean no more than that it was the kind of crown which an elm tree of this age which had never been lopped might be expected to carry."

B So I do not find either in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., or on a reconsideration of the evidence enough to establish that there was anything unusual about the size of the crown. The case is a difficult one, and I have not reached my conclusion without some hesitation, but in the end I have come clearly to be of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

C LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I should have preferred to see this appeal allowed, but, since the majority of your Lordships take a different view, I am not prepared to dissent. The difference that would have been between us would not have been one of principle. It would, in fact, have been confined to the proper interpretation of the evidence given at the trial by one witness, Mr. Le Sueur. Left to myself, I should, though not with certainty, have deduced from the written record of his testimony that he left the court in little doubt that, in his opinion, it would have been the reasonable and proper thing for the owner of this elm to have had it lopped, and I think that the Lord Chief Justice, who had the advantage, denied to us, of hearing and seeing Mr. Le Sueur, did so understand him. Again, I think that Mr. Le Sueur probably did mean to convey that a "well-grown fully-branched elm tree" ought to be lopped every five or seven years to ensure safety, and I doubt very much whether D that estimate depends at all on the consideration that lopping may promote decay. In fact, he says that, if you treat the wounds very carefully, the tree does not rot as fast as it would if you leave the branches alone, but the truth is that the evidence is not in a satisfactory state for the purposes of an appellate court. There is too much ambiguity in some of the questions, and there are too many inconclusive answers that were left unresolved. If the majority of your E Lordships take the view that the evidence as a whole leaves no reasonable certainty as to what, if anything, it would have been prudent to do to this tree, had it been inspected, I think that that is the best proof that the plaintiffs at F the trial failed to make out their case.

G I hope that I do not misinterpret the significance of this decision if I say that I do not think that it can be the last word on the position or liability of the tree-owner. To say that it is a natural use of land to grow trees on it seems to me too wide a generalisation to be of much use in practice. It would be conceded, I believe, that there is somehow a difference between the legal responsibilities of the owner of a mature forest tree in a built-up area immediately adjacent to a busy street and the responsibilities of the owner of a stand of timber bordering a country lane, but is the difference only this, that the latter is H entitled to take more chances at the expense of his neighbours than the former? I am not certain of the logic, for a tree or its branches only falls once, and it must be poor consolation to an injured passer-by in the country lane to be assured that the chances were all against his being at the place of the accident at the moment when it occurred. The accepted test that liability only begins when there is apparent in the tree a sign of danger has the advantage that it seems to ignore, or to a large extent to ignore, the distinction between the spot that is much, and the spot that is little, frequented, but, on the other hand,

I think that it does end by making the standard of the expert the test of liability. Anyone can own a tree, there is no qualifying examination, but to how many people in this country can be credited as much general knowledge as will warn them that a tree's top is unusually large, or that it is, in fact, diseased, dangerously or otherwise?

My Lords, I have formed no final view on any of these points. I allude to them only because I think that they still await final exposition and that it would be regrettable if they were regarded as finally determined by the authority of this case.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

REYNOLDS AND GIBSON v. CROMPTON (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), June 29, 30, July 14, 1950.]

Income Tax—Profits from trade—Capital profit—Profit on collection of book debt—Book debt included among assets acquired from predecessor—Purchase of debt at discount—Election to be treated as having set up new trade—Ultimate payment of debt in full—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Case I.

One of the assets of a partnership firm of cotton brokers as originally constituted was a debt owing by a customer which had been incurred in the course of their trade as cotton brokers. The firm, having doubts about the recoverability of the debt, made reserves against it which were duly allowed as deductions in computing the firm's profits for assessment to income tax in the relevant years. In 1933 a change took place in the constitution of the firm. A further change occurred in 1938, and the firm which was then formed carried on the business, purchased the assets and took over the liabilities of the previously existing firm, but elected, under the proviso to r. 11 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, to be treated for tax purposes as having set up a new trade. There was a further change in the constitution of the firm, but the firm constituted on the change in 1938 and its successor (the appellant firm) were treated for tax purposes as one and the same. The assets taken over by the appellant firm were valued and paid for, and these assets included the book debt which was acquired at its written down value. Subsequently, the debt was collected in full in part by the appellant firm and in part by its predecessor, a profit of £50,000 being thereby made. It was found as a fact that the new firm did not carry on any trade of dealing in book debts.

HELD: the profit accrued, not in the course of carrying on a trade, but from the purchase of a capital asset which subsequently appreciated in value, and was, therefore, not assessable to income tax under Case I of sched. D.

APPEAL by the taxpayers from an order of ROXBURGH, J., made on Apr. 3, 1950, dismissing an appeal by the taxpayers from a determination of the Special Commissioners who had confirmed an assessment to income tax under Case I of sched. D for the year ended Apr. 5, 1949, in respect of the annual profits or gains from the trade of cotton brokers carried on by the taxpayers in Liverpool from Oct. 1, 1945, onwards in succession to a series of firms trading under the same name as the taxpayers.

In 1930 a partnership firm of cotton brokers, called Reynolds and Gibson, were the creditors of Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd., for £200,000 for cotton supplied to them. This partnership firm, firm No. 1, had doubts about the recoverability of the debt, and made reserves against it, amounting to £50,000 in all. These reserves were duly allowed as deductions for income tax purposes in the appropriate years. On a change of partners, firm No. 2 took over the debt which was subsequently reduced to £174,600, but the reserve against that amount remained at £50,000. On Oct. 1, 1938, a further change of partners occurred, and firm No. 3 came into existence and took over the assets and liabilities of firm No. 2 on its succession to that firm and paid for the book debt in question a sum less by £50,000 than its face value. All the partners of firms No. 2 and No. 3 elected, under the proviso to r. 11 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, that the firm should be treated, for income tax purposes, as though a new trade had been set up. In the years ended Sept. 30, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944, firm No. 3 received from the debtor company in reduction of the debt sums totalling £84,114 13s. 10d., and in the years ended Sept. 30, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945, firm No. 3 re-credited to profit and loss account reserve sums totalling £40,000. There was a further change in the constitution of the firm, but firms No. 3 and No. 4 fell to be treated for income tax purposes as one and the same firm since on the occasion of that succession recourse was not had to the proviso to r. 11 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D. The position at the date of firm No. 4's succession was that the debt stood at £90,485 6s. 2d., with a reserve against it of £10,000, and, in taking over the assets and liabilities of firm No. 3, firm No. 4 paid for this particular asset £10,000 less than its face value. On various dates firms No. 3 and No. 4 received payment of the debt in full. The debt of £174,600 having thus been discharged completely, its acquisition by firm No. 3 from firm No. 2 at the price of £124,600 resulted in a profit of £50,000 of which £40,000 was received by firm No. 3 and £10,000 by firm No. 4. The Special Commissioners found (in para. 7 of the Case) that neither firm No. 3 nor firm No. 4 traded in book debts. They found also (in para. 11 of the Case) that in the hands of firm No. 1 and firm No. 2 the debt in question was not a capital asset but an ordinary trading debt, and that the debt did not change its quality from revenue to capital when it was taken over by firms Nos. 3 and 4. They, therefore, confirmed the assessment on firm No. 4. On appeal by the taxpayers, firm No. 4, ROXBURGH, J., held that the debt in question did change in quality from revenue to capital on its acquisition by firm No. 3, but that it represented circulating capital, so that the profit on its collection properly fell for inclusion in the profits of firm No. 4, and he, therefore, confirmed the determination of the Special Commissioners. The facts are fully set out in the judgment of JENKINS, L.J.

A further appeal by the taxpayers (Reynolds and Gibson v. Inland Revenue Commissioners) on an excess profits tax assessment involving the same point was heard together with the present case, but was not separately argued, and the judgment related to both appeals.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 14. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. (read by JENKINS, L.J.): In this appeal both my brethren (whose judgments I have had the advantage of reading) have arrived at a clear conclusion in favour of the taxpayers. I have felt, for myself, impressed by the force of the argument of counsel for the Crown that the question whether the item in suit, the debt—counsel for the taxpayers was reluctant to call it a “book debt”—due from Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd., was, in the hands of the taxpayers or their immediate predecessors, called firm No. 3, a capital or revenue item, was one of fact; that the Special Commissioners had found the facts in favour of the Crown; and that there was some evidence to support that finding. The Case Stated is, in its exposition of the character of the taxpayers’ business as cotton brokers, of the way in which this particular debt was dealt with, and of the business relations (if any) between firms No. 3 and No. 4, on the one hand, and the debtor company, on the other, undoubtedly meagre, but there is (as it seemed to me) much to be said for the view that the Special Commissioners intended to find as a fact that the debt in question was treated for all practical or business purposes as a revenue item, and retained the revenue character which, admittedly, it had originally possessed in the hands of firms No. 1 and No. 2. Both my brethren, however, clearly think that the relevant part of para. 11 cannot, in its context, be regarded as a finding of fact, but constitutes rather an expression of opinion based on the matters previously set forth. If this is the right view, then I agree that the Case and the conclusions of the Special Commissioners appear to do less than justice to the effect of the advantage taken on the formation of firm No. 3 of the proviso to r. 11 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. In all the circumstances I am not prepared to dissent from the view of my brethren that the appeal should be allowed.

SINGLETON, L.J. : The taxpayers have carried on the business of cotton brokers in Liverpool for many years. The appeal is against an assessment to income tax made on them for the year ended Apr. 5, 1949, under Case I, sched. D, of the Income Tax Act, 1918. ROXBURGH, J., upheld the decision of the Special Commissioners confirming the assessment, and the taxpayers appeal to this court.

Under Case I income tax is chargeable in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to the firm in respect of their trade. Thus, it must be shown that the assessment is based on profits arising from the business of cotton brokers or accruing to the firm in respect of it. It is not enough to show merely that there was a profit of some kind. It must be a profit accruing to the firm in the course of its trade.

Some thirty years ago, the firm of Reynolds and Gibson, as then constituted, supplied cotton to Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd., and as a result, the latter incurred a debt to the former of £200,000. There have been various changes in the firm since that date. The firm which supplied the cotton was firm No. 1 (or a firm which was in existence before firm No. 1), and the firm on which the assessment is made is firm No. 4. The debt was regarded as doubtful to some extent, and during the existence of firm No. 1 sums amounting to £50,000 were reserved against it, and these amounts were allowed as deductions in computing the profits or gains of firm No. 1 in the relevant years. In later years, during the time of firm No. 3, it was considered that the value of the debt was greater than had been thought, and amounts aggregating £40,000 were re-credited to the profit and loss accounts. Firm No. 1 had taken securities from the company in respect of the debt, and the company made certain payments. Firm No. 2, in which some of the partners were the same as in firm No. 1, was treated as continuing the business of firm No. 1. When firm No. 3 was formed on Oct. 1, 1938, the proviso to r. 11 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D was invoked by all those who were engaged in the business both immediately before and immediately after the change, so that firm No. 3 fell to be treated for income tax purposes as though a new trade had been set up or commenced. Firm No. 3 acquired the debt owing by Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd. It was then £174,600, but, as I have said already, it had been written down in the books by £50,000 so that it was of the book value of £124,600. The taxpayers, firm No. 4, was formed on Apr. 1, 1945. No notice to bring into operation the proviso to r. 11 (1) was given. At the time of the formation of firm No. 4, £90,485 6s. 2d. of the original indebtedness of Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd. was still outstanding. There is nothing in the Case to show the figure at which it was taken over by firm No. 4 from firm No. 3, though the £40,000 I have mentioned had already been credited in the profit and loss account of firm No. 3. The amount was paid off by Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd. on Dec. 24, 1946. The contention of the Crown is that the sum so paid results in a profit to the firm of £50,000, and that that sum must be brought into account in order to arrive at the profits or gains of firm No. 4 in respect of the year of assessment ended Apr. 5, 1949. The difficulty in the Case is created by the paucity of the facts found and stated. ROXBURGH, J., referred to this and appears to have thought that there was need for further elucidation, but neither party wished the Case to go back. Speaking for myself, I do not think that the court ought to be asked to give judgment on the meagre statement of facts contained in this Case. The original debt had arisen from sales of cotton by firm No. 1 many years ago and they had taken securities to cover it. There is nothing whatever to show that business relationship continued (apart from payments on account of the debt from time to time). Nor is there anything to show whether this kind of transaction is usual when one firm takes over the business of another firm engaged in cotton-broking. It may well be an important element in preserving goodwill on a change of firm such as took place in 1933, in 1938 and in 1945, but there is no suggestion of that kind in the Case. All that we are told is that the assets and liabilities were valued on each occasion for the purpose of fixing the amount of consideration to be paid by the new firm. There may well have been other book debts. Only this one is mentioned in the Case.

The taxpayers rely strongly on the finding in para. 7 of the Case that neither firm No. 3 nor firm No. 4 traded in book debts, and, undoubtedly, this is of importance in view of the necessity of its being shown that the profit arose from trade or business carried on by the firm. The Crown places reliance on para. 11, and counsel submitted that that paragraph amounted to a finding of fact that the balance of the debt remained a debt on revenue account. I do not regard para. 11 as a finding of fact. The commissioners had already stated their findings of fact, and para. 11 should be read as containing the conclusions at which the commissioners arrived on the facts set out earlier in the Case. In any event I agree with the view of ROXBURGH, J., that, whatever the position had been earlier, as from the time the debt was acquired by firm No. 3 it became a capital asset purchased out of capital. Yet I find myself unable to agree with the learned judge that the findings of the Special Commissioners are equivalent to a finding that the profit in question arose from the utilisation of circulating capital in the trade. Circulating capital is normally something used by a trading concern for the purpose of buying goods in which it trades in the hope of making a profit. I do not see that this debt in the hands of firm No. 3 or of firm No. 4 can be described as circulating capital in any sense. It was a debt and, so far as we know, an isolated case of a debt taken over, and there is nothing to show that it had any connection with the trade or business of firm No. 3 or of firm No. 4—unless that can be assumed from the fact that the indebtedness arose from sales of cotton by a predecessor firm, and I cannot think it is right to make such an assumption. In Golden Horse Shoe (New), Ltd. v. Thurgood (1), ROMER, L.J., dealing with the difference between fixed capital and circulating capital, said ([1934] 1 K.B. 563):

“Unfortunately, however, it is not always easy to determine whether a particular asset belongs to the one category or the other. It depends in no way upon what may be the nature of the asset in fact or in law. Land may in certain circumstances be circulating capital. A chattel or a chose in action may be fixed capital. The determining factor must be the nature of the trade in which the asset is employed.”

Herein lies the importance of the finding that neither firm No. 3, nor firm No. 4 traded in book debts, coupled with the absence of any finding that any business relationship continued or that the debt had anything to do with the business of firm No. 3 or of firm No. 4. It is true to say that firm No. 4 collected the balance of the debt and included it in the books of the firm: it is that fact, I take it, which leads the commissioners to say that it remained “collectible in the ordinary course of trade and its collection was incidental to the trade.” I am not quite sure what that means and I do not think that it carries one much further.

In Jones v. Leeming (2), LORD BUCKMASTER said ([1930] A.C. 419):

“This brings the argument back to the original position. Can the profits made in this case be described as income? Were the respondent a company promoter or were his business associated with purchase and sale of estates, wholly different considerations would apply, but this is negatived; the transaction in this case stands isolated and alone. It is, to my mind, in the circumstances, purely an affair of capital.”

For some reason which I do not profess to understand, both parties wish to have a decision on this Case as it stands. Having regard to the isolated nature of the transaction, to the finding that neither firm No. 3 nor firm No. 4 dealt in book debts, to the application of the proviso to r. 11 (1) in 1938, and to the lack of anything to show that the debt was in any way connected with the trade or business of either firm No. 3 or firm No. 4, I am not prepared to say that the sum of £50,000 falls to be dealt with as part of the profits or gains from the trade or business of the taxpayers. Such part of the profit as was made by either firm accrued, not by reason of its trade or by reason of its carrying on the business of cotton brokers, but because of the acquisition of a debt. The position would have been the same had firm No. 3 acquired at a low figure a debenture which was ultimately paid in full. In my view, the appeal should be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of ROXBURGH, J., dated Apr. 3, 1950, dismissing an appeal by the taxpayers, the firm of Reynolds and Gibson, from a determination of the Special Commissioners to the effect that the assessment to income tax under Case I of sched. D made on the taxpayers for the year ended Apr. 5, 1949, should be confirmed.

The assessment under appeal was made in respect of the profits of the trade of cotton brokers carried on by the taxpayers in Liverpool from Oct. 1, 1945, onwards in succession to a series of firms of the same name, three of which, covering the period from Oct. 1, 1928, to Sept. 30, 1945, are specifically mentioned in the Case, and conveniently referred to in chronological order as firms Nos. 1, 2 and 3 respectively, the taxpayers being distinguished from their three immediate predecessors as firm No. 4. Firm No. 1 (which succeeded a yet earlier firm of Reynolds and Gibson) operated from Oct. 1, 1928, to Sept. 30, 1933, firm No. 2 from Oct. 1, 1933, to Sept. 30, 1938, and firm No. 3 from Oct. 1, 1938, to Sept. 30, 1945, when it was succeeded by the taxpayers, firm No. 4. As will appear below, the only significant change for the present purpose is the succession of firm No. 3 to firm No. 2 on Oct 1, 1938. The method of effecting the succession on each occasion is thus described in the Case:

“On the formation of each new firm the assets and liabilities of its predecessor were valued for the purpose of fixing the amount of the consideration to be paid by the new firm to the old and were taken over at the figure so fixed.”

The question in the appeal is, in effect, whether a sum of £50,000, representing the difference between the value (namely, £124,600) at which firm No. 3 took over a certain debt from firm No. 2 and the full amount (namely, £174,600) of the debt as ultimately recovered from the debtor by firms Nos. 3 and 4, was rightly included in the assessment under appeal as a profit of firm No. 4's trade as cotton brokers.

The debt in question was the balance of a larger sum which had become due from a company called Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd. (to which I will refer as “the debtor company”) in respect of cotton supplied to the debtor company in or about the year 1920 by the firm of Reynolds and Gibson as then constituted. In 1930 the amount of the debt was £200,000, and firm No. 1, having doubts as to its recoverability, made reserves against it in the years ended Sept. 30, 1930, and Sept. 30, 1932, of £37,500 and £12,500 respectively, making £50,000 in all. These reserves were duly allowed as deductions for income tax purposes in the appropriate years. At a date not specified in the Case, but clearly before Oct. 1, 1938, arrangements were made between firm No. 1 or firm No. 2 and the debtor company under which the debt was to be discharged over a period by means of three month bills drawn by the firm and accepted by the debtor company, and the debtor company gave collateral security in the form of a mortgage. Under this arrangement the amount of the debt had, by Oct. 1, 1938 (that is to say, the date of firm No. 3's succession to firm No. 2), been reduced to £174,600, but the reserve against it still stood at £50,000. Thus, in effect firm No. 3 in taking over the assets and liabilities of firm No. 2 on its succession to that firm paid for this particular asset a sum less by £50,000 than its face value (that is to say, £174,600 less £50,000, which equals £124,600). In the years ended Sept. 30, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944, firm No. 3 received from the debtor company in reduction of the debt sums totalling £84,114 13s. 10d., and in the years ended Sept. 30, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945, firm No. 3 re-credited to profit and loss account from the reserve sums totalling £40,000. The position at the date of firm No. 4's succession to firm No. 3 (that is to say, Oct. 1, 1945) therefore, was that the debt stood at £90,485 6s. 2d., with a reserve against it of £10,000, and, in taking over the assets and liabilities of firm No. 3, firm No. 4 thus, in effect, paid for this particular asset £10,000 less than its face value (that is to say, £90,485 6s. 2d. less £10,000, which equals £80,485 6s. 2d.). On Dec. 24, 1946, the debtor company discharged the balance of the debt in full by payment to firm No. 4 of the sum of £90,485 6s. 2d. The debt of £174,600 having thus been paid in full, its acquisition by firm No. 3 from firm No. 2 at the price of only £124,600 resulted in the end in a profit of £50,000 of which, as appears above, £40,000 was received by firm No. 3 and £10,000 by firm No. 4. The question is whether, in the circumstances I have stated, this profit of £50,000 was for income tax purposes a profit of the trade of cotton brokers carried on by firm No. 4, so as to attract tax under Case I of sched D.

In the consideration of this question the succession of firm No. 4 to firm No. 3 must admittedly be ignored, as on the occasion of that succession recourse was not had to the proviso to para. (1) of the new r. 11 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, introduced by s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1926, and consequently for income tax purposes firms Nos. 3 and 4 fall to be treated as one and the same firm, with the result that, if the £50,000 is taxable at all, the whole amount is rightly assessed on firm No. 4 notwithstanding that £40,000 of it was in fact received by firm No. 3. But it is important to observe that the proviso to para. (1) of r. 11 was invoked on the succession of firm No. 3 to firm No. 2 and consequently that the liability or otherwise of the £50,000 to tax as a profit of the trade of firm No. 4 must be judged on the assumption that on Oct. 1, 1938, firm No. 3 set up a new trade as cotton brokers and for that purpose purchased the assets and undertook the liabilities of the previously existing firm No. 2.

I should, perhaps, read para. (1) of r. 11, as amended by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32, and the Finance Act, 1930, s. 16, which is in these terms:

"If at any time after Apr. 5, 1928, a change occurs in a partnership of persons engaged in any trade, profession or vocation, by reason of retirement or death, or the dissolution of the partnership as to one or more of the partners, or the admission of a new partner, in such circumstances that one or more of the persons who until that time were engaged in the trade, profession or vocation continue to be engaged therein, or a person who until that time was engaged in any trade, profession or vocation on his own account continues to be engaged in it, but as a partner in a partnership, the tax payable by the person or persons who carry on the trade, profession or vocation after that time shall, notwithstanding the change, be computed according to the profits or gains of the trade, profession or vocation during the period prescribed by the Income Tax Acts: Provided that, where all the persons who were engaged in the trade, profession or vocation both immediately before and immediately after the change require, by notice signed by all of them or, in the case of a deceased person, by his legal representatives, and sent to the surveyor within twelve months after the change took place, that the tax payable for all years of assessment shall be computed as if the trade, profession or vocation had been discontinued at the date of the change, and a new trade, profession or vocation had been then set up or commenced, and that the tax so computed for any year shall be charged on and paid by such of them as would have been charged if such discontinuance and setting up or commencement had actually taken place, the tax shall be computed, charged, collected and paid accordingly."

The Special Commissioners, after narrating the facts to which I have already referred, recorded (in para. 7 of the Case) a finding that "neither firm No. 3 nor firm No. 4 traded in book debts." Then, after summarising the contentions of the parties, they expressed their decision in para. 11 of the Case in the following terms:

"We, the commissioners, gave our decisions as follows: 'In September, 1938, firm No. 3 took over from firm No. 2, for £124,600, the debt of £174,600 due from Combined Egyptian Mills. Eventually the full sum of £174,600 was realised, £84,114 13s. 10d. being received by firm No. 3 and £90,485 6s. 2d. by firm No. 4. For income tax purposes firm No. 3 fell to be treated as having set up a new trade, and we accept that it did not trade in book debts. Nevertheless, in the hands of firms Nos. 1 and 2 the debt in question was in no sense a capital asset, but simply an ordinary trading debt, and, on the facts of this case, we are unable to see that when it was taken over by firms Nos. 3 and 4, successively, its "quality" was changed from revenue to capital, as contended on behalf of the appellant firm. In our opinion, it remained a debt on revenue account, collectible in the ordinary course of trade and its collection was incidental to the trade. If the full £174,600 had been received by firm No. 3, we should have felt no doubt that its profit of £50,000 over the amount which it had paid for the debt would have been a profit on revenue account. But the final £90,485 6s. 2d. was received by firm No. 4 (the taxpayers) and the Crown admits that if all the members of firms Nos. 3 and 4 had given the requisite notice under the proviso to sub-s. (1) of s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1926, firm No. 4 would fall to be treated as having set up a new trade, with the result that its profit on realisation would have been only £10,000 (being the excess of the amount received over the amount at which it took over the debt from firm No. 3). It is admitted, however, that no such notice was given, and we accept the contention of the Crown that, in these circumstances, for income tax purposes this change of partnership must be ignored, with the result that the above profit of £50,000 must be brought into the income tax assessment of firm No. 4. The appeal, therefore, fails."

As I have already indicated, the correctness of this decision is not challenged so far as the effect of para. (1) of r. 11 is concerned. In other words, it is admitted that if and so far as the £50,000 constituted a profit of the trade of firm No. 3 or firm No. 4 at all, firm No. 4 is assessable to tax on the whole amount notwithstanding that the greater part of it was in fact received by firm No. 3. The contest is directed solely to the question whether it was a profit of their trade at all. It was argued before us on the part of the Crown that the Special Commissioners' decision of this question adversely to the taxpayers, firm No. 4, involved a finding of fact which ought not to be disturbed. I do not think this is so. Apart from the somewhat meagre narrative summarised above and the finding in para. 7 of the Case that neither firm No. 3 nor firm No. 4 traded in book debts, the only findings bearing on the character of the debt in question appear in the second paragraph of the decision, and are to the following effect: (1) That in the hands of firms Nos. 1 and 2 the debt in question was in no sense a capital asset but simply an ordinary trading debt; (2) that on the facts of the Case the Special Commissioners were unable to see that when it was taken over by firms Nos. 3 and 4 successively its "quality" was changed from revenue to capital; and (3) that in their opinion it remained a debt on revenue account collectible in the ordinary course of trade and its collection was incidental to the trade. I cannot regard these as findings of fact concluding the matter against the taxpayers, firm No. 4. That the debt in question was in origin an ordinary trading debt is not open to doubt. But the question is not whether it was a trading debt in the hands of the firm to which it originally became due or in the hands of firms Nos. 1 and 2, but whether, on the assumption that it preserved its original character as a trading debt down to the date of the succession of firm No. 3 to firm No. 2, and was at that date a trading debt owing to the latter, it then became a trading debt owing to firm No. 3 notwithstanding that firm No. 3, by virtue of the proviso to para. (1) of r. 11 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, is to be considered as having set up a new trade as opposed to merely continuing the trade of its predecessor. The Special Commissioners do not seem to me to have addressed themselves adequately to this question. They draw no distinction between the succession of firm No. 3 to firm No. 2 (to which the proviso to para. (1) of r. 11 applied) and the succession of firm No. 4 to firm No. 3 (to which that proviso did not apply), but content themselves by saying that on the facts of the case they are unable to see that when the debt was taken over by firms Nos. 3 and 4 successively its "quality" was changed from revenue to capital. Now, if firm No. 3 is to be considered as having set up a new trade, the trading operations by which the right to receive the debt in question was originally earned are ex hypothesi not to be regarded as operations of the trade carried on by firm No. 3, since they were wholly completed and done with long before firm No. 3's trade was ever set up. Therefore, if the debt in question became a trading debt of firm No. 3, it can only have done so because its acquisition by firm No. 3 as part of the assets of firm No. 2 amounted to an operation of firm No. 3's new trade. But, as found by the Special Commissioners, the new trade set up by firm No. 3 did not include dealing in book debts. It was simply the trade of cotton brokers. It follows that the acquisition of the debt in question was not per se an operation of the new trade set up by firm No. 3. The question, therefore, is whether on the facts of the case its acquisition was an operation of firm No. 3's new trade, although such trade was simply that of cotton brokers and not dealers in book debts. On the facts as found by the Special Commissioners, I see no warrant for so holding. Their statement of the opinion that the debt in question "remained a debt on revenue account, collectible in the ordinary course of trade and its collection was incidental to the trade" appears to me to carry the matter no further. The question, as I understand it, is whether the acquisition of the debt was an operation in the course of firm No. 3's trade. If the answer to that question is "yes" then prima facie any profit resulting from such acquisition would be a profit of firm No. 3's trade and taxable accordingly. If the answer is "no," then prima facie any such profit would be simply the appreciation of an asset acquired otherwise than in the course of such trade, and accordingly not part of the profits of such trade or taxable in that character. There seems no doubt that the debt in question was in fact treated in the books of firm No. 3 in the same way as a debt arising in the course of its own trade would have been treated, and I am prepared to assume it was similarly dealt with for the purposes of collection (if that is what the Special Commissioners mean by "collectible in the ordinary course of trade") and also that its collection was carried out in conjunction with the ordinary trading operations of firm No. 3 (if that is what the Special Commissioners mean by saying "its collection was incidental to the trade"). But these circumstances cannot suffice to convert it into an asset acquired by firm No. 3 in the course of its trade if in fact it was not so acquired. The learned judge expressed doubts, which I fully share, as to the effect of the Special Commissioners' findings of fact, but added that neither party wished him to ask them for further elucidation. A similar reluctance was shown on both sides when it was suggested in this court that the case might with advantage be remitted to the Special Commissioners for further facts to be found.

"I understand this to be a finding that, although firms Nos. 3 and 4 did not trade in book debts generally, it was a part of their trade to acquire and collect this particular book debt. Is this finding of fact one which justifies treating the £50,000 as profits of the trade for income tax purposes? I do not share the view of the Special Commissioners that when the debt had been purchased by firm No. 3 it remained a debt on revenue account. It seems to me that it clearly became a capital asset, purchased out of capital. But the question remains whether it was fixed or circulating capital. As ROMER, L.J., pointed out in Golden Horse Shoe (New), Ltd. v. Thurgood (1) ([1934] 1 K.B. 563): ' . . . the profits or losses in a year of trading cannot be ascertained unless a comparison be made of the circulating capital as it existed at the beginning of the year with the circulating capital as it exists at the end of the year. It is, indeed, by causing the floating capital to change in value that a loss or profit is made.' Between assets which clearly constitute fixed and circulating capital respectively there is a debatable territory, and in that territory the decision is one of fact, and may be one of degree. I think that the findings of the Special Commissioners, as I understand them, are equivalent to a finding that the

A profit in question arose from the utilisation of circulating capital in the trade, and was accordingly profit liable to taxation and was not a realised accretion to a fixed capital asset. Counsel for the taxpayers submitted that the finding in para. 7 of the Case was conclusive against this view, but that submission is inconsistent with the decision of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., in Hall (Harry), Ltd. v. Barron (Inspector of Taxes) (3), who upheld a determination of the Special Commissioners that the profits on realisation of purchased book debts were taxable although the company was not a dealer in book debts, holding that the question was essentially one of fact. As he pointed out, the book debts had a particular characteristic. They had arisen in the conduct of a business of the same nature. That also applies here. It was a book debt in a cotton broker's business. It would certainly seem to me difficult to regard this particular book debt as fixed capital, and, in my judgment, the determination of the Special Commissioners cannot be successfully impeached."

The learned judge thus arrived at what may perhaps be described as a rationalisation of the Special Commissioners' findings which enabled him to uphold their decision. For my part, however, I do not think the importation into the Case of the somewhat debatable distinction between fixed and circulating capital really contributes anything to the solution of the question in issue. After all, if I understand the cases correctly, "circulating capital" is simply an expression used to denote capital expended in the course of the trade with a view to disposal at a profit of the assets produced or acquired by means of such expenditure, and represented at different stages of its career by cash, assets into which the cash has been converted, and debts owing from customers to whom those assets have been sold. It follows that to describe the sum of £124,600 expended by firm No. 3 in the present case on the acquisition of the debt of £174,600 owing to firm No. 2 as circulating capital is really to beg the question, since the £124,600 was circulating capital employed in firm No. 3's trade if, but not unless, the acquisition of the debt was an operation of firm No. 3's trade. The question, therefore, still remains to be answered: Was the purchase of the debt in question a purchase in the course of the new trade which firm No. 3 is treated as having set up, with the result that the profit of £50,000 accruing through the ultimate payment of the debt in full was a profit of that trade? For this purpose, firm No. 3 must be regarded as a complete stranger to firm No. 2, purchasing the assets and undertaking the liabilities of firm No. 2 with a view to setting up a new business of the same kind on its own account. The mere fact that a given asset was included in the totality of the assets so acquired clearly could not of itself make its acquisition an operation in the course of the new trade set up by firm No. 3, so as to turn any appreciation in the value of that particular asset into a profit of such trade. For instance (the trade being that of cotton brokers) appreciation in the value of such assets as premises, office furniture, or investments acquired from firm No. 2 would clearly not answer that description. The result must, therefore, depend on the nature of the asset. If it was an asset of the kind dealt in in the course of the particular trade, or, in other words, if it was in the nature of stock in trade, its purchase would clearly amount to a trading operation, and any resulting profit would be a profit of the trade. If it was an asset which could only be turned to account by the exercise of the trade (for example, an uncompleted contract for the supply of goods of the kind dealt in in the trade) the same result would, I apprehend, ensue. But, if it was an asset neither of the kind dealt in in the trade, nor such that it could only be turned to account by the exercise of the trade, I cannot for my part see on what ground its purchase could be regarded as in itself constituting an operation of the trade.

Applying these principles to the present case, I find that firm No. 3 purchased from firm No. 2, among other assets, a debt, the right to receive which had been fully earned many years ago by trading operations long since completed. Nothing whatever in the way of the relevant trade remained to be done in order to recover the amount, and it was in due course recovered by firms Nos. 3 and 4 simply by virtue of the former's purchase of the right to receive it. It is true that the trading operations by which the debt had originally been earned were of the same kind as those upon which firm No. 3 was proposing to embark, but this seems to me to be beside the point. It was simply a right to receive £174,600, and it mattered not on what account that right had arisen. Precisely the same profit would have arisen to any purchaser of the debt, whether a cotton broker or not. Its value in no way depended on firm No. 3 carrying on the business of cotton brokers or any other business. The transaction, as I see it, was simply the purchase of an asset which subsequently appreciated in value by a firm whose trade did not include the purchase of or dealing in assets of that character.

I ask myself whether in the converse event of firm No. 3 having purchased from firm No. 2 a similar debt which ultimately realised £50,000 less than the price paid for it the deficiency would have constituted a loss sustained in the course of the new trade set up by firm No. 3, and find difficulty in seeing how the answer to that question could fail to be in the negative. If this view is right, the following passage from the judgment of LORD YOUNG in Assets Co., Ltd. v. Forbes (Surveyor of Taxes) (4), seems to me to be closely in point (3 Tax Cas. 549):

"Is it to be said that they were making a trade of buying and selling doubtful debts? There is nothing to indicate that in the least. The proposition that where anybody who purchases a doubtful debt and makes more than he paid for it—one purchase, he not being a trader in that kind of thing—that that is income, is, I think, a proposition which cannot be sustained. Now, I think we have nothing upon the face of this case to show that in a trade of buying and selling there was income or gain made by this company upon which the assessment is made."

I would refer also to the opening passage in the judgment of ROWLATT, J., in Rees Roturbo Development Syndicate, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs., Same v. Ducker (5), where he said (138 L.T. 147):

"This is one of those cases which raise great difficulty in applying a principle which in itself is perfectly clear. It has been said before in this court, and in more important courts, and it is perfectly clear, that where profit accrues from the sale of property a question arises whether that forms the basis of liability to income tax. Now income tax is not attracted by the mere circumstance that there is a profit, because the profit may be a mere accretion of the value of the article, and the profit may not accrue in the course of any trade at all. On the other hand, the circumstance that the profit is due to an accretion in the value of the article does not negative the application of income tax, because the accretion of value to the article may have been the very thing that a trader, within Case I, was established to secure. In that case you have a trade which is going to be in articles with a view to securing the accretion of value to those articles, and the accretion of value does not negative the incidence of income tax."

The present case, as I see it, is one in which quoad firms Nos. 3 and 4 the profit did not, in the words of ROWLATT, J., "accrue in the course of any trade at all." As to Hall (Harry), Ltd. v. Barron (Inspector of Taxes) (3), in which CROOM-JOHNSON, J., treated the question whether a profit realised by the collection of book debts purchased from one tailoring concern by another was a trading profit in the hands of the purchaser as a question of fact which had been concluded in favour of the Crown by the findings of the Special Commissioners,

I need only say that, whether that case was rightly decided or not, there were facts found by the Special Commissioners which have no counterpart here. On the facts as found in the present Case I am of opinion, for the reasons I have endeavoured to state, that the Special Commissioners and the learned judge came to a wrong conclusion and that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

By his will, dated Mar. 10, 1941, a testator, who died on Aug. 22, 1941, directed payment out of his residuary estate of certain legacies and proceeded: “To the following hospitals if still at my death run on a voluntary system and not taken over by the State, namely:—To the Fleet and District Hospital £6,000 . . . To the same hospital £300 to build a library for the hospital and such of my books as shall be approved as suitable by my executors . . .” He then specified certain further legacies, gave directions for payment of duty and in connection with the administration of his estate, and provided: “Any residue of my estate I give to the Fleet and District Hospital for endowment purposes.” On July 5, 1948, the Fleet and District Hospital vested in the Minister of Health under the National Health Service Act, 1946, ss. 6 and 7, and it was accepted that the condition on which the pecuniary and specific legacies to the hospital were defeated had then occurred.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This is an originating summons raising certain questions of construction on the will and the first codicil of the testator. After appointing executors and giving certain directions and making certain bequests not material to be further referred to, the testator deals with his residuary estate. Having directed payment thereof of a number of legacies he proceeds as follows:

"To the following hospitals if still at my death run on a voluntary system and not taken over by the State, namely:—To the Fleet and District Hospital £6,000 for investment in stock or stocks of the British government and to apply the income to provide (a) £100 a year as an X-ray deposit fund to be called the 'Frere X-Ray Fund,' (b) £50 a year for extra comforts for the nursing staff, (c) the balance for a free bed for ex-service men to be called the 'Frere bed.' Any surplus yearly income may in the discretion of the executive committee be applied for the general benefit of the hospital. To the same hospital £300 to build a library for the hospital and such of my books as shall be approved as suitable by my executors. To the London Hospital £1,000 to endow one or more 'Frere' children's beds."

He gave legacies to a number of bodies including the Royal Air Force Benevolent Fund, the British Sailors' Society, the Royal Lifeboat Institution, the Fleet Cricket Club, the Fleet Football Club and a legacy to the Fleet Urban District Council for the purpose of erecting a certain memorial, and other legacies. He then gave a direction that all legacies should be free of duty, and provided for the lapse of a legacy to a person dying in his lifetime and for machinery for abatement if his estate should be insufficient to pay all the legacies he had given. Then he provides: "Any residue of my estate I give to the Fleet and District Hospital for endowment purposes."

By the first codicil to his will, so far as material for the purposes of this case, he revoked the legacy of £1,000 to the London Hospital to endow one or more "Frere" children's beds, and he directed that his residence at Fleet and his personal chattels as defined by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 55, should be excluded from the gift and devise of his residuary estate and gave and devised that residence and his personal chattels to the London Hospital so that the property and contents should be used as a rest home for the nursing staff. He gave to the same hospital the sum of £1,000 to form an endowment fund for the maintenance of the property for that purpose, and directed that the gifts and devise should be free of duty. There follows this proviso:

"Provided that if at my death the hospital shall have ceased to be run on a voluntary system and shall have come under State control no one of the said gifts or devise to the hospital shall take effect and in lieu thereof I direct that such gifts and devise shall take effect for such charitable purpose or purposes as my trustees after consultation if possible with former members of the board of governors of the hospital shall decide to secure if possible the retention of the property for some good and charitable purpose and I further separately provide that if after my death the hospital shall cease to be run on a voluntary system and shall be taken under State control the benefit of the said gifts and devise to the hospital shall immediately before the taking over by the State cease and determine and shall go and be applied and transferred to such charitable purpose or purposes as the majority of the then members of the board of governors of the hospital shall decide with the object if possible of retention for some good and charitable purpose."

The will is dated Mar. 10, 1941, and the first codicil Aug. 22, 1941. On the appointed day, July 5, 1948, under the National Health Service Act, 1946, the property of the Fleet and District Hospital was taken over under s. 6 of that Act and its other property under s. 7. The activities of the hospital are now conducted by the Farnham Group Hospital Management Committee, who act as the management committee for a group of hospitals including that hospital. The London Hospital was designated a teaching hospital and was so treated for the purposes of ss. 6 and 7 of the Act.

It is conceded that, as regards the Fleet and District Hospital, the condition on which the gift of £6,000 was made has come into operation and that that gift does not take effect. So far as the gift in the will and first codicil to the London Hospital is concerned, the position is that those who are now managing the activities of that hospital and are responsible for its property do not desire to have this property and the endowment fund transferred, the view being taken that it would be impossible to give effect to the testator's wishes. It is contended by counsel for the hospital management committee that, in any event, the proviso in the first codicil operates, and, in the result, that position is not disputed and, therefore, the gift over takes effect.

The question then arises of the effect of the short residuary disposition which I have already read. Counsel for the hospital management committee contends that on the true construction of the will the residue is given without any such condition attached as is attached in the case of the earlier gifts in the will to the Fleet and District Hospital and the London Hospital respectively. He points out that between the earlier gifts and the residuary gift there are, first of all, a number of further legacies to some of the recipients, to which I have already referred, and the directions to which I have also referred. Therefore, he says, when you come to read the residuary gift there is no justification for reading it as subject to any such condition as is imposed in the case of the earlier gifts. It is, of course, to be observed that the object of the testator as regards the earlier gifts to the two hospitals was to indulge his charitable instincts. He emphasises that in the first codicil, which is, of course, later in date than the will. In both the earlier gifts in the will and in the codicil he expressly provides that as regards the two hospitals in the will and the London Hospital in the codicil the gifts are to be effective only if the hospitals shall not have come under State control. Can it be said that there is an indication there that the testator is intending that, if the hospitals are taken over by the State, that shall be regarded as having the result that, for the purposes of his will, they shall cease to be regarded as charities? If the construction for which counsel for the hospital management committee contends is the correct construction, the extraordinary result follows that the very institution which in the earlier part of the will is deprived of the limited legacies of £6,000 by the operation of the condition, obtains, under the residuary gift, not only £6,000, but any balance of the residue.

With considerable reluctance, however, I feel driven to the conclusion that I cannot find a sufficient justification to enable me to import into the residuary bequest by necessary implication the condition which is imposed in the case of the earlier gifts to the two hospitals. It seems to me that the only way that that could possibly be done would be by coming to the conclusion in construing the earlier gifts that the testator has established his own vocabulary and has shown, with sufficient clarity to allow the court to act on it, that, for the purposes of his will, the taking over by the State of a hospital results in that hospital ceasing to be a charity. But, on consideration, I do not see that I should be justified in so construing the testator's will. Therefore, I must give effect to the words of the residuary gift as I find them unqualified by the words preceding the earlier gifts and hold, as a matter of construction, that there is a good residuary bequest.

There remains the interesting question, which counsel for the next-of-kin raised, whether or not on the basis that the gift of the residue was otherwise good the gift should not fail on the ground that the Fleet and District Hospital has ceased to be a charity. The force of that submission lies in this, that the gift of the residue is for endowment purposes, that it is a gift of the residue as a capital sum on trust to apply the income in perpetuity, and is, therefore, a gift which could be good only if it is charitable. On the evidence it appears to me to be satisfactorily established that, so far as identity is concerned, there is a body to answer the description "the Fleet and District Hospital," and the evidence satisfies me that the activities which were previously being carried on by the hospital before the appointed day are still being carried on. It seems to me that, having regard to the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 59 (1), which empowers a regional hospital board and the board of governors of any teaching hospital and a hospital management committee

" . . . to accept, hold and administer any property upon trust for purposes relating to hospital services or to the functions of the board or committee under Part II of this Act with respect to research," having regard to the provisions of sub-s. (2) of that section to the effect that Part II of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, and the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891,

" . . . shall not have effect with respect to any assurance . . . to any such board or committee of land or of personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land," and having regard further to the two recent cases of Re Morgan's Will Trusts (1), and Re Dean's Will Trusts (2) it is not open to me to hold in the present case that this is not a good charitable disposition of the residuary estate. The fact that the hospital is still to be regarded as a charity seems to me implicit in the reasoning of ROXBURGH, J., in Re Morgan's Will Trusts (1), and, further, it appears to me that, in Re Dean's Will Trusts (2), HARMAN, J., has, in effect, held that a hospital does not cease to be a charity merely because of the coming into effect of the National Health Service Act.

For these reasons, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the gift of the residuary estate is a good and valid gift to which effect should be given.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be taxed and paid out of the residue.

THE ARDENNES (OWNER OF CARGO) v. THE ARDENNES (OWNERS).

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), June 27, 28, 29, July 5, 1950.]

Shipping—Bill of lading—Inclusion of term at variance with contract between parties—Admissibility of evidence as to true contract.

Shipping—Carriage by sea—Breach of contract—Measure of damages—Shipper taking delivery and paying freight—Right to recover increase in import duty and loss of profit.

On Nov. 22, 1947, in reliance on a promise made by the shipowner's agent that the ship would proceed direct to London, and, therefore, in the belief that she would arrive there by Nov. 30, at the latest, a shipper in Cartagena, Spain, shipped three thousand cases of mandarines which were intended for sale in the London market. The shipper was anxious that the goods should arrive in England by Nov. 30, as the import duty on them would be considerably increased on Dec. 1, and also because the sooner they arrived the better prices they would fetch. These facts were known to all persons handling this class of merchandise, and, when making the contract, the shipper impressed on the shipowner's agent the importance of the ship arriving in London by Nov. 30. The bill of lading contained a clause that the shipowner was to be at liberty to carry the goods to their port of destination "proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination." Instead of proceeding direct to London from Cartagena, the ship went first to Antwerp, where she arrived on Nov. 30, and she did not arrive in London until Dec. 4, with the result that the shipper had to pay the higher import duty and obtained an appreciably lower price for the goods than the price which he would have realised if he had been able to sell them earlier. In an action by the shipper claiming damages against the shipowner for breach of contract, the shipowner relied inter alia on the clause in the bill of lading and contended that evidence of any other contract or promise was inadmissible.

HELD: (i) the bill of lading was not in itself the contract between the shipowner and the shipper, and, therefore, evidence was admissible of the contract which was made before the bill of lading was signed and which contained a different term.

(ii) the shipper had not waived his claim for damages by taking delivery and paying freight.

(iii) as the shipowner must have known that the earlier the goods arrived the better would be the price obtained for them, the shipper was entitled not only to damages representing the increased import duty, but also to the additional sum which he would have realised if the ship had arrived in London on Nov. 29, and the goods had been sold at Covent Garden on Dec. 2.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiff, a fruit grower and exporter in Southern Spain, wished to arrange for a shipment of cases of mandarines from Cartagena to reach England before Dec. 1, 1947, on which date the import duty would rise from 3s. 6d. a cwt. to ten per cent. ad valorem. On or about Nov. 20, his son, Basilio, had an interview with the sub-agent in Cartagena of the defendants, the owners of s.s. Ardennes. Basilio informed the sub-agent that the plaintiff wanted to ship the goods by a ship sailing direct for London and impressed on him the importance of the cargo reaching London by Nov. 30. The sub-agent told Basilio that, if a minimum consignment of three thousand cases were guaranteed, he would have the Ardennes, which was then at Candia taking on cargo for Antwerp, brought immediately to Cartagena and would then dispatch her direct to London. Pursuant to this arrangement, the Ardennes arrived at Cartagena on the morning of Nov. 22, the plaintiff's goods were put on board, and the ship sailed on the evening of the same day, her destination on the clearance documents being given as London. Before she sailed, however, instructions had been received by the master from the ship's agents in Valencia, directing him to proceed to Antwerp, but the plaintiff was not informed of this change of plans. The new instructions were sent, presumably, as a result of objections on the part of other shippers who had shipped their goods in the belief that the ship would proceed first to Antwerp. The Ardennes arrived at Antwerp on Nov. 30, and did not reach London until Dec. 4. On Dec. 5, she discharged 2,626 cases belonging to the plaintiff, the other 374 having been left at Antwerp, by mistake. Of these, 362 were brought over by another ship on Dec. 15, and twelve were lost. The defendants admitted liability for the twelve which were lost. The duty paid by the plaintiff on the goods was £721 12s. 11d., which was £451 1s. 7d. more than he would have had to pay if they had arrived by Nov. 30.

The defendants, the shipowners, were the Belgian government, but no point was taken that they were a foreign sovereign State, and they submitted to the jurisdiction. They contended, inter alia, (a) that there had been no contract that the ship should proceed direct from Cartagena to London, (b) that evidence of an oral contract was inadmissible to contradict a clause in the bill of lading permitting them to proceed by any route and to carry the goods beyond their port of destination, and (c) that the plaintiff had waived the claim for damages by taking delivery and paying the freight.

Cur adv. vult.

July 5. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment. The plaintiff is a fruit grower and exporter at Cartagena in Southern Spain. He has for many years done a considerable business with this country, particularly in exporting here mandarines, a fruit more usually known in this country as tangerines. The trade is, eminently, a seasonal one. Generally speaking, the fruit becomes ready for export towards the latter part of November, until when it is, if not unobtainable, scarce in this market. Accordingly, the earlier the shipment, the better the price it is likely to obtain. Another and very important reason for getting the fruit to this country before the last day in November is that, whereas the import duty on this class of goods is 3s. 6d. a cwt. from Apr. 1 to Nov. 30, on Dec. 1 the duty rises to ten per cent. ad valorem. The Spanish growers, therefore, have every incentive to secure the arrival of their fruit as early as possible in November, and, at the latest, by Nov. 30.

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts, and found that the plaintiff had shipped his goods, comprising three thousand cases of mandarines, in the Ardennes, a ship belonging to the defendants, in reliance on a promise made by the ship's sub-agent in Cartagena that she would proceed direct to London, and that, had it not been for that promise, he would not have put his goods in that ship, especially as there was another ship, the Pelayo, which was, admittedly, proceeding direct to London, but starting on Nov. 23, a day later than the Ardennes. (This ship arrived in London on Nov. 28, while the Ardennes, having gone to Antwerp first, did not arrive in London until Dec. 4.) His LORDSHIP found that all parties were aware of the importance of the Ardennes arriving in London at the latest on Nov. 30, but, in view of the weather conditions at that time of the year, he was not prepared to hold that there was a binding promise as to the date of arrival. On the evidence of the master, however, he found that, had she not gone first to Antwerp, the ship would have arrived in London on Saturday, Nov. 29, and, therefore, whether or not the cargo were discharged on that day, the goods could not have been sold in Covent Garden before Dec. 2. He further found that people engaged in the fruit trade and in handling this kind of merchandise realised how advantageous it was to the shipper to get early delivery in London on account of the higher prices to be obtained for early shipments. His LORDSHIP continued:] The defences raised were, in substance, that there was no oral agreement between the parties that the ship should proceed direct to London, and that liability was excluded by one of the conditions in the bill of lading. I have no hesitation in finding that there was a promise made to the plaintiff's representative that the ship should proceed direct to London and that he shipped in reliance on that promise. I have, therefore, now to consider the defence which arises out of the terms of the bill of lading. This document was in the form known as "received for shipment," and the operative part reads:

"Received for shipment in apparent good order and condition from Basilio A. Cobarro Tornero in and upon the steamship called the Ardennes or upon any other steamship substituted or following with liberty to call any port or ports for the purpose of receiving and delivering coals . . . and bound for London . . . 3,000 cases of mandarines . . . to be delivered . . . at London to order . . ."

There are then stamped on the bill of lading words in Spanish which, translated read: "Merchandise received on board." It seems to me, therefore, that this was a bill of lading for goods shipped in the Ardennes. The main controversy, however, turned on the clause in the bill of lading which reads:

"The owners are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination, by the above or other steamer, or steamers, ship or ships or railway, either belonging to themselves or to other persons, proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination, and so tranship or land and store the goods either on shore or afloat and reship and forward the same at the owner's expense but at merchant's risk."

Counsel for the defendants contended that this clause was a complete defence, and that evidence of any other bargain or promise was not admissible. Whether his contention is correct seems to me to be the main question for decision in this case.

It is, I think, well settled that a bill of lading is not, in itself, the contract between the shipowner and the shipper of goods, though it has been said to be excellent evidence of its terms: see Sewell v. Burdick (1), per LORD BRAMWELL

(10 App. Cas. 105), and Crooks v. Allan (2). The contract has come into existence before the bill of lading is signed. The bill of lading is signed by one party only and handed by him to the shipper, usually after the goods have been put on board. No doubt, if the shipper finds that it contains terms with which he is not content or that it does not contain some term for which he has stipulated, he might, if there were time, demand his goods back, but he is not, in my opinion, thereby prevented from giving evidence that there was a contract which was made before the bill of lading was signed, and that it was different from that which is found in the document or contained some additional term. He is not a party to the preparation of the bill of lading, nor does he sign it. It is unnecessary to cite further authority than the two cases which I have already mentioned for the proposition that the bill of lading is not itself the contract, and, therefore, in my opinion, evidence as to the true contract is admissible. Leduc v. Ward (3), on which counsel for the defendants strongly relied, was a case between shipowners and indorsees of the bill of lading, between whom its terms are conclusive by virtue of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, s. 1, so that no evidence was admissible in that case to contradict or vary its terms. Between those parties the statute makes it the contract.

In this case, moreover, the representation that the ship would sail direct to London would amount to a warranty, for it was in consequence of that representation that the goods were shipped, both parties being fully aware of its high importance in the circumstances. In other words, it was a promise that the shipowner would not avail himself of a liberty which otherwise would have been open to him. Having formed this view, it is unnecessary for me to consider the other matters argued by counsel for the plaintiff, as, e.g., whether the liberty clause is not inconsistent with the opening clause of the bill of lading. Nor do I think that there is anything in the point as to waiver, taken in the defence. Whatever the reason may have been, the ship arrived late, i.e., later than she would have done had she not gone first to Antwerp. She had the plaintiff's goods on board and they were of a perishable nature. I cannot see that he can be said to have waived his claim for damages because he took delivery and paid the freight rather than let the goods remain to be dealt with in some way by the shipowner, a course which might and, probably, would, have largely increased the damages, as the fruit might then have perished or deteriorated, and this is also true of the 362 cases which arrived later.

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the question of damages, and said :] This case is, in my opinion, quite distinguishable from The Parana (4), because all parties must have been aware that the earlier the goods arrived, the better would be the price. The case is much more akin to Dunn v. Bucknall Bros., Dunn v. Donald Currie & Co. (5). [HIS LORDSHIP assessed the damages at £451 1s. 7d., representing the increased import duty, plus the additional sum (to be computed) which would have been realised if the cargo had been sold at £4 per case gross instead of £3 0s. 11d., and he gave judgment for the plaintiff with costs.]

FIELD v. PERRYS (EALING), LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), June 6, 7, 1950.]

Factory—Building operations—“Premises . . . temporarily used for . . . construction of a building”—Night watchman injured during week-end stoppage of work—Machinery not being used, but available for use—“Working-place”—Watchman's tour of inspection—“Efficiently lighted”—Watchman provided with hurricane lamp—Building Regulations, 1926 (S.R. & O., 1926, No. 738), reg. 15.

The Building Regulations, 1926, “apply to all premises on which machinery worked by steam, water or other mechanical power is temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building . . .” and by reg. 15: “Every working-place and approach thereto shall be efficiently lighted.”

A night watchman employed by building contractors on a site on which they were constructing a block of flats was supplied only with a hurricane lamp to light his way. While on his round at 10.30 p.m. during a week-end when work had ceased until the following Monday, he tripped over a loose plank left in the roadway of the site and sustained injuries. On a claim by him against his employers for damages for breach of their duty under the Building Regulations, 1926, reg. 15,

HELD: (i) the Building Regulations, 1926, applied to the site at the time of the accident, since it was “temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building” so long as there was machinery on the site for the purpose of the construction of the building and available for use, although during the week-end it was not in active use.

Barnett v. Caxton Floors, Ltd., Butler v. Kleine Patent Fire Resisting Flooring Syndicate, Ltd. (1928) (140 L.T. 138), applied.

(ii) the regulations applied to the night watchman as well as to building operatives, since it was the duty of an employer to observe such requirements in Part I of the regulations “as affect any workman engaged by him.”

(iii) a place on the night watchman's ordinary tour of inspection was not a “working-place” within the meaning of reg. 15.

(iv) if reg. 15 had applied to that place, it would have required that that “working-place” itself should be lit, and it would not be a compliance with it to provide the watchman with a lamp to take there.

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff was a night watchman employed by the defendants on a site on which they were constructing a block of flats. He was injured through falling over a loose plank left in the roadway while making his round at 10.30 p.m. during a week-end when work on the site had ceased until the following Monday. He was provided at the time of the accident only with a hurricane lamp. He contended (i) that there had been a breach of the common law duty owed by the defendants to their servants, and (ii) a breach of their duty efficiently to light his “working-place” under the Building Regulations, 1926, reg. 15. The defendants denied liability at common law and contended that the regulations did not apply to the site since it was not “temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building” at a week-end, that the regulations applied only to actual building operatives, and that "every working-place" meant the place of building operations, and, even if it extended further, did not include the round of the night watchman.

N. Lawson for the plaintiff.

Jukes for the defendants.

DEVLIN, J.: The plaintiff is a one-legged man. At the time of the accident of which he complains he was employed by the defendants as a night watchman. The defendants are building contractors and they were engaged in constructing a block of flats at a site in Fulham Road, London. The buildings were fairly well advanced at the time when the accident occurred, on Aug. 9, 1947. The plaintiff's duty was to take care of the premises during the night and the week-end. It was on a Saturday at about 10.30 p.m. that this accident occurred. As night watchman, the plaintiff was provided with a hut and it was his duty to go round the premises from time to time. His ordinary tour took him along what is described as the main roadway or driveway of the block of flats—a road or drive which goes round the inside of the block of flats and comes out again to give access to the road. There were various huts and other buildings situated at or near that roadway, and it was part of the plaintiff's duty to see that they were all in order. While he was on one of those rounds he tripped and fell over a loose plank that had been left in the roadway and injured himself. As a result of the injuries he received he has brought this action. He relies on a breach of the common law duty which a master owes to his servant, and also on a breach of reg. 15 of the Building Regulations, 1926, which are made under the Factories Acts.

[HIS LORDSHIP examined the evidence, found that the defendants had not committed any breach of their duty at common law, and continued:] The alternative claim is made under the Building Regulations, 1926, reg. 15 of which reads:

"Every working-place and approach thereto shall be efficiently lighted."

For reasons which I shall give later I am satisfied that, if this regulation applies, there was no efficient lighting, and the main argument that has been addressed to me on behalf of the defendants on this point has been that these regulations do not apply. Counsel for the defendants put the point in three ways. He said (i) that the regulations apply only when building operations are actually in progress; (ii) that they apply only to building operatives; and (iii) that the place where the accident occurred was not a working-place within the meaning of reg. 15.

With regard to the first point, my attention has been directed to the introductory words to the regulations, which read as follows:

"In pursuance of s. 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, I hereby make the following regulations and direct that they shall apply to all premises on which machinery worked by steam, water or other mechanical power is temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building, or for the purpose of any addition to the structure of an existing building."

It is not disputed that machinery was being used on these premises, nor is it disputed that it was being temporarily used. That is to say, counsel for the defendants has not sought to impugn the authority of Barnett v. Caxton Floors, Ltd. (1) where it was argued that, by reason of the word "temporarily," the regulation only applied when machinery was actually in use, but the Divisional Court held that that was not the true view of the section and the regulation applied to the whole period during which machinery was available for use. In that case the accident occurred during ordinary working hours. Here, the accident occurred during the week-end, and counsel for the defendants relied on that distinction and said that where building operations cease altogether the regulations cannot apply. I cannot find anything in the language of the regulations which would lead me to arrive at that conclusion. It seems to me once it is conceded that the words "temporarily used" do not mean actually in use, but mean available for use, the only question to consider is whether machinery is on the site for the purpose of construction of a building, and whether it is available for use. All those conditions are just as much satisfied during the week-end as during actual working hours. It may be—although I have not

A to consider the point—that, if there were some prolonged interruption of the building operations, the regulations would not apply, but I am satisfied that they do apply during the ordinary interruptions to work, that is to say, during the night and during the week-end. If that were not so—if the duty ceased immediately building operations ceased—I can imagine very difficult questions arising as to what would be the position at the conclusion of building operations,
B say, at 4.30 in the afternoon, when men were still engaged, perhaps, in clearing up and leaving the site.

So far as the second submission is concerned—that the regulations apply only to building operatives—there, again, I accept the argument of counsel for the plaintiff that the regulations themselves are framed widely. Under the heading "Duties" the regulations say:

C "It shall be the duty of every contractor and employer of workmen to observe such of the requirements in Part I of these regulations as affect any workman engaged by him."

I do not think I can cut down that wide phrase "any workman engaged by him" to mean only any building operative or any workman actually engaged in any
D part of the building operations. As counsel for the plaintiff pointed out, there are other regulations of a similar sort in which the beneficiaries of them, if I may so phrase it, are more narrowly defined, but here is a wide definition and I see no reason for cutting it down.

Thirdly, as to the working-place, counsel for the defendants advanced a stronger argument, and one which, in a sense, can be divided into two. He relied on a
E general submission that these regulations were never intended by the legislature to apply in the case of a night watchman merely caretaking in the course of building operations, but that they were intended to apply to the work of building, and he has relied particularly on the phraseology of reg. 15. He suggested that "every working-place" means a place that is used as a working-place for the purpose of building operations, and he submitted that the plaintiff was not
F injured at any "working-place" within this meaning. I do not think it is necessary that I should make up my mind with regard to this wider proposition. I am impressed by the argument, but I need not consider it because I am in the defendants' favour on another aspect of it. Assuming that the regulations apply, and that a night watchman is capable of having a working-place within the meaning of reg. 15, I am not satisfied that the working-place extended to the
G place where the accident occurred in this case. One thing seems quite clear to my mind, and that is that the regulation is not designed to provide that the whole of the premises should be "efficiently lighted." The regulation says "Every working-place and approach thereto." It contemplates, therefore, a specific working-place where people are doing a specific piece of work. I do not think it can extend to the case of a night watchman who—leaving out, conceivably, his hut—has no specific working-place at all. His duties take him to any H part of the building or site where he may have any reason to apprehend there is something which it is necessary to investigate. It is obviously unreasonable to contend, and counsel for the plaintiff does not contend, that it means that every part of the site is to be floodlit, and, holding the view I do that the regulation refers to a specific working-place, I am satisfied that once work for the day has ceased and there is only a night watchman on duty, there is no longer on the site any specific working-place that the regulation requires to be efficiently lit. I omit the possible question of the night watchman's hut, with which I am not concerned.

Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the working-place of the night watchman might be said to be the tour of inspection which took him round the carriageway and to the place where the accident occurred. I am not satisfied that the evidence in this case shows that the plaintiff's duty was so clearly defined as to make that tour and no other round a specific working-place. He did normally go that round, but it would obviously be his duty to look into anything which might attract his attention in the course of the tour as something needing investigation. It would be surprising if he made his tour without diverting to one side or the other, almost as a matter of course, each time, to investigate some particular point, some particular hut or some particular stack of wood that he thought might need investigation. I am not satisfied, therefore, that his ordinary tour can be regarded as his working-place. Nor am I satisfied that any proper distinction can be drawn between the tour which he ordinarily makes, as a matter of his discretion, to see whether the building is in order, and other parts of the building to which it is equally his duty to go if he thinks there is anything which requires his presence there.

Accordingly, I hold that reg. 15 does not apply to this case. Therefore, there cannot be any breach of it. If it had applied, I should have been of the opinion that the carriageway was not efficiently lighted. I accept the submission of counsel for the plaintiff that "efficient lighting" in this regulation means that the working-place itself has to be lit. I do not think it would be a compliance with the section to provide a workman with a light to take there. I think what the regulation has in mind, and what it is directed to, is the lighting up of the place itself.

Since I accept that the regulation requires the place itself to be lit up, it makes it all the more unlikely that it would apply to any place to which the night watchman might have to go. I have had very much in mind the principle that I cannot find that the regulation is to be applied unless its language is clear and unambiguous and it is reasonably obvious that the matter with which the case is concerned comes within its purview. I think there is serious doubt what "working-place" can mean in the case of night watchmen. I am not satisfied that the regulation is clear and unambiguous and I think that, if the legislature had intended to include this rather unusual and exceptional type of case within the regulation, they would have used clearer words than have been used. It follows the defence succeeds. [HIS LORDSHIP said that, if he had had to assess damages, he would have awarded £400, including special damages, and he gave judgment for the defendants with costs.]

MASTER LADIES TAILORS ORGANISATION AND ANOTHER v. MINISTER OF LABOUR AND NATIONAL SERVICE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Somervell, L.J., sitting as additional Judge), July 4, 13, 1950.]

Wages—Regulation—Holiday remuneration—Order fixing remuneration—Remuneration to “accrue” in respect of periods before coming into force of order—Validity of order—Wholesale Mantle and Costume Wages Council (Great Britain) Wages Regulation (Holidays) Order, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 1402), sched., para. 9.

The Wages Councils Act, 1945, s. 10, empowers the Minister of Labour and National Service to make orders giving effect to proposals submitted by a wages council established under the Act for fixing remuneration for work and holiday remuneration of workers in respect of whom the council operates, as from such date as may be specified in the order, which must be a date subsequent to that of the making of the order. On July 25, 1949, the Minister made a holiday remuneration order for workers engaged in wholesale mantle and costume making, which came into force on Aug. 15, 1949. Para. 8 of the schedule to the new order provided: “When a worker ceases to be employed after the provisions of this schedule become effective, accrued holiday remuneration shall, immediately on the termination of the employment, be paid to him by his employer in accordance with the next following paragraph . . .,” and by para. 9 “holiday remuneration shall accrue to a worker during the period of twelve months commencing on May 1, 1948, and thereafter in each successive period of twelve months commencing on May 1, and such remuneration shall accrue in accordance with the provisions of” a table which specified twice the normal wage if an employee had worked for forty-eight weeks and a diminishing proportion of that sum for lesser periods. On the question whether the order was ultra vires the Act of 1945 and void since it purported to confer on workers remuneration not merely measured by, but in respect of, employment before the order became effective and thus imposed on the employers liabilities which had accrued in respect of antecedent employment, HELD: the effect of the provisions relating to accrued remuneration being merely to determine and limit the quantum of payments to be made after the order came into force, the order could not be construed as having a retrospective operation and was valid.

ACTION for a declaration.

The plaintiffs were a trade union and a member of the union, which was an organisation of employers of workers employed in the wholesale mantle and costume making industry. The plaintiffs contended that the Wholesale Mantle and Costume Wages Council (Great Britain) Wages Regulation (Holidays) Order, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 1402), made by the defendant, the Minister of Labour and National Service, under s. 10 of the Wages Councils Act, 1945, was ultra vires and void on the ground that it was in part retrospective and, therefore, not authorised by the Act of 1945. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, K.C., and Quass for the plaintiffs.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and Winn for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 13. SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment. In this case the first plaintiff is a trade union, the members of which are employers of workers employed in wholesale mantle and costume making. The second plaintiff is a member of the first plaintiff and an employer of workers employed as above. They claim a declaration that the Wholesale Mantle and Costume Wages Council (Great Britain) Wages Regulation (Holidays) Order, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 1402) made or purported to be made under the Wages Councils Act, 1945, is ultra vires and void. The basis of the claim is: (i) that the order is in certain respects retrospective; (ii) that an order in certain respects retrospective is ultra vires unless the Act under which it is made plainly authorises such an order; (iii) that the Act does not plainly authorise the retrospective elements in this order. The Attorney-General submitted in the first place that the order was not retrospective, and that is the first issue.

The Wages Councils Act, 1945, deals with the matters previously dealt with by the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918. It also deals with holidays with pay which had been dealt with in the Holidays With Pay Act, 1938. By virtue of s. 20 (2) of the Act of 1945 the trade boards existing under the earlier legislation, including the trade board for the wholesale mantle and costume trade, became wages councils under this Act. The argument is concerned with s. 10 of the Act. Sub-section (1) gives power to a wages council to submit proposals to the Minister for fixing remuneration for work and holiday remuneration. Sub-section (4) provides that, if these proposals are approved, the Minister shall make a wages regulation order giving effect to them as from such date as may be specified in the order, which date has to be subsequent to the making of the order. The order in question here had its origin in this procedure. Sub-section (2) lays down certain matters which have to be contained, and certain matters which may be contained, in proposals dealing with holidays. It reads as follows:

“(2) Wages regulation proposals for requiring a worker to be allowed a holiday shall not be made unless both holiday remuneration in respect of the period of the holiday and remuneration other than holiday remuneration have been or are being fixed under this Part of this Act for that worker, shall provide for the duration of the holiday being related to the duration of the period for which the worker has been employed or engaged to be employed by the employer who is to allow the holiday, and, subject as aforesaid, may make provision as to the times at which or the periods within which, and the circumstances in which, the holiday shall be allowed; and wages regulation proposals for fixing holiday remuneration may contain provisions as to the times at which, and the conditions subject to which, that remuneration shall accrue and shall become payable, and for securing that any such remuneration which has accrued due to a worker during his employment by any employer shall, in the event of his ceasing to be employed by that employer before he becomes entitled to be allowed a holiday by him, nevertheless become payable by the employer to the worker.”

I will now turn to the order. It was signed on July 25, 1949. The specified date was Aug. 15, and as from that date a previous order (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 604), ceased to have effect. The main difference is that the maximum holiday which was six days under the earlier order is twelve days under the present order. It is para. 9 of the schedule to the order which is relied on, but I think it is of assistance to refer first to para. 3. It provides that an employer shall before Sept. 30, 1949, and between May 1 and Sept. 30 in future years allow to workers to whom the schedule applies a holiday, the duration of which is to be determined by the period of employment with the employer. The provisions were complicated by the fact that the specified date was in the middle of the holiday season and account had to be taken of holidays already granted in that season under the previous order to which I have referred. It is, however, plain that the length of the holiday to be granted after the specified date depended or might depend up to Aug. 15, 1950, on whether or not the man had been employed prior to the specified date.

Counsel for the plaintiffs did not rely on this as retrospective. I think he was right. The fact that a prospective benefit is in certain cases to be measured by or depends on antecedent facts does not necessarily, and I think does not in this case, make the provision retrospective. The Attorney-General referred to R. v. St. Mary, Whitechapel (Inhabitants) (1), where this principle was stated by LORD DENMAN, C.J., in very concise language. The Poor Removal Act, 1846, s. 2, provided that:

“ . . . no woman residing in any parish with her husband at the time of his death shall be removed . . . from such parish, for twelve calendar months next after his death, if she so long continue a widow.”

It was sought to remove within the twelve months a widow whose husband had died before the Act came into force. It was argued that to make the Act apply in such a case was to construe it retrospectively. The right to remove was, it was argued, a vested right which accrued on his death. The court held otherwise and LORD DENMAN, C.J., used these words (12 Q.B. 127):

“ . . . we have before shown that the statute is in its direct operation prospective, as it relates to future removals only, and that it is not properly called a retrospective statute because a part of the requisites for its action is drawn from time antecedent to its passing.”

Substituting “ holidays ” for “ removals ” this principle seems to me properly applicable at any rate to para. 3. In R. v. Christchurch (Inhabitants) (2) a somewhat similar point arose on a different provision of the same statute. LORD DENMAN, C.J., said this (12 Q.B. 156):

“ The statute is prospective only: its direct operation is only on removals; after it has passed, it does not alter existing rights in respect of completed removals. A space of time is an essential ingredient in the case to which it applies: and this space of time may consist in part of time passed before the statute passed, as is the case with statutes in limitation and prescription; but they are not therefore classed with the retrospective statutes.”

In order to understand para. 9 it is necessary to read the first part of para. 8:

“ When a worker ceases to be employed after the provisions of this schedule become effective, accrued holiday remuneration shall, immediately on the termination of the employment, be paid to him by his employer in accordance with the next following paragraph for periods of employment in respect of which he has not been allowed or has not become entitled to be allowed an annual holiday under this schedule . . . ”

This is followed by a proviso dealing with the case of a man leaving his employment after having had part only of his annual holiday and this need not be read. The paragraph makes it clear that the order is providing, and providing only, for payments to be made to workers ceasing to be employed after the specified date. Paragraph 9 reads as follows:

“ (1) Subject to the provisions of this paragraph, holiday remuneration shall accrue to a worker during the period of twelve months commencing on May 1, 1948, and thereafter in each successive period of twelve months commencing on May 1, and such holiday remuneration shall accrue in accordance with the provisions of the following table . . ."

The table provides that if the man has worked for forty-eight weeks or more he gets twice his normal wage, and, if for lesser periods, then a diminishing proportion of that sum.

The argument for the plaintiffs is based on the use of the word "accrue." It is argued that a provision for accrual before the specified date involves the conception of conferring rights before the specified date. The order purports to confer on those to whom payments are to be made rights measured, not merely by, but in respect of, antecedent employment, and to confer liabilities on employers which have been accruing in respect of antecedent employment. There is force in this, and the Attorney-General admitted that the use of the words "accrue" and "accrued" was unfortunate. It is clear, to my mind, that the result of para. 9 could have been achieved by words which, if I am right in my conclusion as to para. 3, would not have been retrospective in the sense to be given to the words in this area. If, for instance, the words had been "holiday remuneration to be paid to a man ceasing to be employed after the specified date shall be two weeks' wages if he has been employed forty-eight weeks or more prior to his ceasing to be employed" and so on for the lesser periods. The Attorney-General put forward this further argument. If the paragraph had provided that any worker who had not had his holiday and ceased to be employed after the specified day should have two weeks' pay, this could not have been challenged. It would be an odd result, he suggested, if a cutting down by reference to antecedent events of an obligation which could have been validly imposed made the provision retrospective and bad. The statement I have quoted from LORD DENMAN, C.J., shows that not every matter which is retrospective "in a sense" is retrospective in the sense in which I have to apply the words in the present case.

I have come to the conclusion that the effect of these provisions as to remuneration accruing, being, as I hold, to determine and limit the quantum of prospective payments, do not make this order retrospective in the sense which has to be given to the word in this issue. The claim, therefore, fails. Most of the cases dealing with retrospective legislation, some of which were cited to me by counsel for the plaintiff are concerned with a different issue. It has, of course, been laid down in the clearest possible terms that no statute or order is to be construed as having a retrospective operation unless such a construction appears very clearly or by necessary and distinct implication in the Act. That most salutary principle does not assist in solving the problem which I have so far been considering.

If I had held that the provisions of para. 9 quoad persons ceasing to be employed in the first year was retrospective, the Attorney-General argued that its retrospective character was expressly authorised by s. 10 (2) of the Act of 1945. The principle to which I have just referred would, I think, have been a formidable obstacle in the way of any such argument. For these reasons I think the claim fails and must be dismissed.

WOLFE v. CLARKSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Cohen, L.JJ.), July 13, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—County court—Jurisdiction—Breach of covenant to repair in original tenancy agreement—Claim for £414 damages—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 15 (1), s. 17 (2).

By an agreement dated Dec. 31, 1943, the landlord demised to the tenant a dwelling-house (which was within the Rent Restrictions Acts) from Jan. 9, 1944, until June 24, 1945, and thereafter from quarter to quarter. On Feb. 20, 1948, the landlord gave the tenant notice to quit on June 24, 1948, but the tenant remained in possession. In November, 1948, the landlord began an action in the county court against the tenant claiming possession under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (a), damages for breach of covenants to repair contained in the tenancy agreement, and arrears of rent. In his particulars of claim the landlord recited the covenants to repair, stated that on Feb. 23, 1948 (while the contractual tenancy was subsisting) he had served the tenant with a schedule of repairs required to be carried out under the terms of the lease and alleged that the tenant had failed to execute any of the said repairs. The county court judge referred the case to the registrar for an inquiry and report on the issue of damages, and before the registrar it appeared that the amount of damages claimed was £414 2s. 6d. The registrar remitted the matter to the judge on the question whether he had jurisdiction to deal with the claim for damages. The judge held that he had jurisdiction, and the tenant appealed.

HELD : the breach of the covenant to repair was a continuing breach, and in November, 1948, when the county court proceedings began, in view of the provisions of s. 15 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and on the construction of the particulars of claim, the landlord was claiming damages for the breach of the tenant's statutory obligation to comply with the terms of the contractual tenancy, and, therefore, the county court had jurisdiction to deal with the claim under s. 17 (2) of the Act.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE BLAGDEN, Clerkenwell County Court, dated May 17, 1950.

On Nov. 2, 1948, the landlord issued a plaint claiming from the tenant possession of a dwelling-house under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (a); damages for breach of covenants to repair contained in a tenancy agreement dated Dec. 31, 1943; and arrears of rent. No amount of damages was specified in the particulars of claim, and the county court judge referred the case to the registrar for an inquiry and report on the issue of damages. Before the registrar it appeared that the total amount claimed as damages for breach of the covenant to repair was £414 2s. 6d. and the registrar remitted the question of jurisdiction to the judge. The question turned, having regard to s. 17 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, on whether the damages were claimed for breach of the contractual obligation of the tenant or of the statutory obligation which, by virtue of s. 15 (1) of the Act of 1920, was imposed on him during the statutory tenancy which arose on the termination of the contractual tenancy. The particulars of claim recited the tenancy agreement (made between the landlord's predecessor in title and the tenant) including covenants to pay rent, to keep the premises in good tenantable repair, and to yield up the premises in good tenantable repair. The tenant was alleged to be a statutory tenant consequent on the expiration on June 24, 1948, of a notice to quit delivered by the landlord on Feb. 20, 1948. The particulars of claim continued:

"6. On Feb. 23, 1948, the [landlord's] solicitors at the instance of the [landlord] served the [tenant] with a schedule of repairs required to be done to the demised premises in accordance with the terms of the said agreement of Dec. 31, 1943. 7. The [tenant] has failed to carry out the repairs specified in the said schedule or any part of them."

The landlord claimed, inter alia, "damages for breach of the covenants to repair contained in the said lease." The county court judge held that he had jurisdiction to deal with the matter.

Widgery for the tenant.

Hackforth-Jones for the landlord.

TUCKER, L.J.: I will ask COHEN, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

COHEN, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE BLAGDEN sitting, first, at the West London County Court and, later, at the Clerkenwell County Court, by which he referred a claim for damages for breach of repairing covenants to the registrar for report.

The claim was issued on Nov. 2, 1948. It related to a dwelling-house known as 13, Anderson Street, Chelsea, which had been demised to the tenant from Jan. 9, 1944, until June 24, 1945, and thereafter on a quarterly tenancy at a yearly rental of £95, the rateable value being £52 per annum. There was no doubt, therefore, that the premises were within the Rent Restrictions Acts. Notice to quit had been given on Feb. 20, 1948, the notice expiring on June 24, 1948, and at the date of the issue of the plaintiff the tenant was a statutory tenant. By his particulars of claim the landlord set out the tenancy agreement and the repairing covenants, including an obligation to repair while the lease was in force and to yield up the premises, etc., in good tenantable repair and condition. He stated the facts about the notice to quit and that the tenant was at the time a statutory tenant, and alleged that on Feb. 23, 1948, while the lease was still in force, he served the tenant with a schedule of repairs required to be done to the demised premises under the agreement of tenancy. He alleged that the tenant had failed to carry out the repairs specified in the schedule or any part of them. He then claimed possession of the demised premises without proof of alternative accommodation on the grounds set out in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (a), damages for breach of the covenants to repair contained in the lease, and £33 odd as arrears of rent. The tenant, in his defence, admitted non-payment of part of the arrears of rent, but claimed a set-off and denied that the landlord was entitled to possession.

It is to be observed that in the particulars of claim no amount of damages was mentioned and that was still the position when the matter came before the learned county court judge on Mar. 8, 1950, on the question of the construction of the covenant to repair. After dealing with the question of construction, he referred the action to the registrar of the West London County Court for inquiry and report on the issue of damages. Still at that time nobody had any idea what the landlord was claiming by way of damages. When the matter came before the registrar it transpired that the amount of damages which the landlord was claiming was £414 2s. 6d. That being in excess of the limit in normal circumstances of the jurisdiction of the county court, the tenant took the objection that, whatever might be the position as regards the claim for possession and mesne profits, the county court had no jurisdiction to deal with the claim for damages for breach of the covenant to repair. The registrar remitted the matter to the learned county court judge who decided that he had jurisdiction and again referred the matter to the registrar for inquiry and report. It is from that order that the tenant now appeals.

A There is no doubt that, apart from the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 17 (2), the tenant's contention that the claim for damages for breach of the covenants to repair would be outside the jurisdiction of the county court would be well founded, but s. 17 (2) provides:

B "A county court shall have jurisdiction to deal with any claim or other proceedings arising out of this Act or any of the provisions thereof, notwithstanding that by reason of the amount of claim or otherwise the case would not but for this provision be within the jurisdiction of a county court, and, if a person takes proceedings under this Act in the High Court which he could have taken in the county court, he shall not be entitled to recover any costs."

C The landlord alleged that his claim for damages for breach of the covenants to repair was a claim in respect of matters arising out of the Act or one of the provisions thereof when regard was had to the nature of the claim, which was, among other things, a claim to recover possession under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1) and sched. I. Schedule I provides:

D "A court shall, for the purposes of s. 3 of this Act, have power to make or give an order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom without proof of suitable alternative accommodation (where the court considers it reasonable so to do) if—(a) any rent lawfully due from the tenant has not been paid, or any other obligation of the tenancy (whether under the contract of tenancy or under the principal Acts), so far as the obligation is consistent with the provisions of the principal Acts, has been E broken or not performed . . ."

Counsel for the landlord says that, even if his claim was in respect of the breach of an obligation under the contract of tenancy, none the less it was within s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920 having regard to the terms of sched. I to the Act of 1933, and that, even if that be not so, he is entitled to damages for breach of the obligation, which lay on the tenant by virtue of s. 15 (1) of the Act of 1920, being
F incorporated by that section into the statutory tenancy.

The learned county court judge considered the various authorities to which his attention had been directed. He relied, in particular, on Lee v. Roberts (1), where the plaintiff sued for possession and arrears of rent and claimed damages amounting to £150. The action was brought in the High Court and ROWLATT, J., made an order for possession and granted damages amounting
G to £12 10s. 0d. The matter came before the Court of Appeal which decided that the case fell within s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920 and could have been brought in the county court, and, on that ground held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover costs. It is true that they gave an alternative ground in that more had been paid into court than the £12 10s. 0d. which was recovered, but I think that it is clear that the court was making s. 17 (2) one of H its grounds and that that was part of the ratio decidendi. Counsel for the tenant, however, said, quite properly, that in that case it was by no means clear that there had been a breach of any contractual obligation. Having regard, he said, to the fact that only £12 10s. 0d. was recovered, it might be a reasonable inference that in that case the breach relied on was purely of the obligation arising by reason of s. 15 (1). In the present case, he argued on the pleadings, the breach relied on occurred entirely under the contractual tenancy, or, if not entirely, there had been no increased damage alleged which had occurred since the end of the contractual tenancy. In those circumstances, he submitted that the decision of HILBERY, J., in Smith (A. J.) & Co., Ltd. v. Kirby (2) was in point.

In that action the landlord had claimed as arrears of rent under a lease a sum well over the amount of the county court jurisdiction and claimed recovery of composite premises which were within the Rent Restrictions Acts. Judgment was given for the plaintiff, and the question arose whether, since the action was brought in the High Court, the plaintiff was entitled to recover costs in view of the provisions of s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920. The learned judge decided that he was, saying ([1947] 1 All E.R. 460):

"The claim for possession was a claim which the county court could have entertained, and which the county court alone should have entertained if it had stood alone, but the action was for arrears of rent and, in the second place, for possession, and, although the premises are within the Act, and, therefore, the claim in respect of the possession arises out of the Act, yet, as the claim for the rent arises out of the lease, the whole action is not one to which s. 17 (2) applies."

That case, I think, amounts to a decision that, if any part of the claim is one which could not be within the jurisdiction of the county court, the fact that another part could have been brought in the county court instead of in the High Court does not prevent the court awarding costs in respect of the whole proceeding. That conclusion derives some support from the contrast between the early words of s. 17 (2), which deals with jurisdiction and enables the county court to deal with "any claim or other proceedings," and the words in the last part which merely prohibit the awarding of costs if proceedings are taken in the High Court, which, I think, means the whole proceedings which could have been taken in the county court. Therefore, with that part of the decision I do not see any reason to quarrel.

A more difficult question, however, arises with which counsel for the tenant invited us to deal, and that is whether or not the learned judge in Smith (A. J.) & Co., Ltd. v. Kirby (2) was right in saying that the claim for rent could not have been brought in the county court. In that case, as I read the report, the claim was in respect of the contractual obligation. If, in the present case, the claim had been in respect of the contractual obligation, it would have been necessary for us to deal with this, as I think, difficult point which counsel has raised, but, as I read his pleadings, he is not relying on a breach of a contractual obligation. In his particulars of claim he sets out the material parts of the agreement of Dec. 31, 1943. Section 15 (1) of the Act of 1920 makes the terms and conditions of the contractual tenancy those of the statutory tenancy so far as they are consistent with the provisions of the Act. Then he sets out the notice to quit and he alleges that the tenant is a statutory tenant. He states as a matter of fact, but not as a measure of his claim, that he had delivered a schedule of repairs required to be done to the demised premises, and I think that is intended to refer to the work that was required to be done rather than to the amount specified in the schedule against those particular items. Non constat that an item of work which cost a certain sum in 1948 when the notice was delivered could have been performed for the same sum when the claim came to be assessed in 1950. In para. 7 he says:

"The [tenant] has failed to carry out the repairs specified in the said schedule or any part of them."

That seems to me to be alleging a breach as at Nov. 2, 1948. Breach of a repairing covenant is a continuing breach, and I think the right way in which to approach this question is to say that on each day on which the premises remained unrepaired a fresh breach occurred. That being so, it seems to me that when he alleges failure to carry out the repairs he is alleging that on Nov. 2, 1948, there was a breach of covenant by reason of the fact that on that date the premises were not in the state of repair required by the lease.

A That being so, it seems to me that the learned judge was quite right when he said that this case was not distinguishable in principle from Lee v. Roberts (1) and that he was bound by that case, and that Smith (A. J.) & Co., Ltd. v. Kirby (2) did not apply. True, that the measure of damages may be the same when the tribunal comes to assess them as they would have been if the landlord had chosen to rely on the breach which was committed on some date immediately before the end of the contractual tenancy, but, if he sues, as I think he was entitled to sue, solely for a breach of the statutory covenant to repair, I do not think it can be properly said that the question is outside the jurisdiction of the county court. If that be so, s. 17 (2) seems to me to be of great importance, B because it would involve that, had the landlord sued in the High Court, it might have been said against him that he could have taken proceedings in the county court. For these reasons I think the learned judge's conclusion was right and that the appeal should be dismissed.

C TUCKER, L.J.: I have felt considerable doubt during the argument in this appeal whether or not the contention of counsel for the tenant that the county court had no jurisdiction with regard to this claim was well founded. He pointed out with force that those parts of the particulars of claim which referred to the rateable value of the premises and the fact that the tenant is a statutory tenant were relevant only to the landlord's claim for possession, and that, so far as the point with which we are concerned arises, one has only to look at para. 1 (which sets out the agreement), para. 6 (which sets out the particulars of want of repair) and para. 7 (which alleges failure to carry out the repairs set out in the schedule), and it is with that claim alone that we are concerned. None the less, I am not prepared to dissent from the view expressed by COHEN, L.J., that, looking at the particulars of claim as a whole and bearing in mind that breach of a covenant to repair over a period of time involves a fresh breach from day to day, the true view of these particulars of claim is that they contain a claim for breach of the statutory obligation to comply with the terms of the original tenancy, and that, so construed, the case comes within the decision of this court in Lee v. Roberts (1). I would only add that I find it unnecessary to express any view whether or not Smith (A. J.) & Co., Ltd. v. Kirby (2) was rightly decided. I am not to be taken to be expressing any view E adverse to that decision. It may be necessary, and very desirable, that at some future date the whole position be re-considered, including the correctness or otherwise of that decision, for the assistance of practitioners in county courts. I would only observe for future reference that we have been told that as a result of further research, namely, a report in the ESTATES GAZETTE, dated Feb. 22, 1947, it has been ascertained that the subject-matter of Smith (A. J.) & Co., Ltd. v. Kirby (2) was a lease for twenty-one years from Sept. 29, 1928, so that it is clear that in that case the court was dealing with a claim under a contractual tenancy and not a claim to recover related to a statutory tenancy. For these G reasons I agree that this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Shipping—Passenger steamer—Fishing vessel used for pleasure trip—Need for certificate as to survey—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (c. 60), s. 267, s. 271 (1).

On June 12, 1949, two ships, classified as fishing boats for the purpose of the Merchant Shipping Acts, carried more than twelve persons from the quay at Berwick-on-Tweed on a pleasure trip to view one of H.M. ships which was anchored off the mouth of the river. No certificate from the Board of Trade as to survey had been issued in respect of either ship. On the question whether an offence had been committed against the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 271 (1),

HELD: the expression "passenger steamer" in s. 271 (1) meant either a steamer constructed to carry passengers or one either habitually or substantially used for carrying passengers. Consequently, the fishing vessels were not "passenger steamers" within the meaning of the section, and no offence had been committed.

CASE STATED by the recorder of Berwick-on-Tweed.

On Sept. 15, 1949, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Berwick-on-Tweed, informations were preferred by the appellant, a senior marine surveyor employed by the Ministry of Transport, against the respondents, the owners of two ships and the master of one of them, charging them with having carried passengers in the ships at Berwick-on-Tweed when the ships had not been surveyed and certified by the Board of Trade, contrary to the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 271 (1), and the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, s. 21. The respondents were convicted and each of them was fined £10 and ordered to pay £1 5s. costs. The respondents appealed to quarter sessions contending, inter alia, that the ships in question were not "passenger steamers" within the meaning of s. 267 and s. 271 (1) of the Act of 1894 and that, accordingly, they had not been guilty of any offence. At the hearing of the appeal it was admitted or proved that the ships in question were motor fishing vessels, that on June 12, 1949, each vessel had carried more than twelve members of the public from the quay at Berwick-on-Tweed on a pleasure trip to view H.M.S. Diadem, then lying off the river mouth, and that no payment was made in relation to the journeys by any of the persons carried. The learned recorder allowed the appeals and quashed the convictions, holding that the vessels were not "passenger steamers" within the meaning of s. 267 and s. 271 (1) of the Act of 1894 and that the persons carried were not "passengers" within the meaning of s. 267. The appellant appealed.

Pearson, K.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the appellant.

Hinchcliffe, K.C., and J. H. Robson for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the learned recorder of the borough of Berwick-on-Tweed before whom appeals were brought by the respondents against convictions by the justices of the borough for offences against s. 271 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

A On June 12, 1949, one of His Majesty's ships was visiting the neighbourhood of Berwick-on-Tweed and was anchored somewhere off the mouth of the river. A large number of people desired to see her, including the sheriff of the city and county, and two fishing vessels were put at their disposal without charge. The vessels used were classified as fishing vessels to which certain sections in the Act of 1894 do not apply. The information which was laid against the first respondent alleged that she

"being the owner of a ship called the Tweed did carry passengers thereon at Berwick-on-Tweed when the same had not been surveyed or certified by the Board of Trade contrary to the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 271, and the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, s. 21."

B Informations in similar terms were preferred against the other respondents, being the master and owners respectively of a ship called the Dolly Graham. I do not think that those informations were properly framed, but the material sections show what the substance of the alleged offence was.

C Section 267 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, is the first section in Part III of that Act, and is the starting point of the group of sections headed "Passenger and Emigrant Ships." The section provides:

"For the purposes of this Part of this Act—The expression 'passenger' shall include any person carried in a ship other than the master and crew, and the owner, his family and servants; and the expression 'passenger steamer' shall mean every British steamship carrying passengers to, from, or between any places in the United Kingdom . . ."

D In s. 743 of the Act of 1894 there is a provision that a ship that is propelled by mechanical power is included in the expression "steamship", so a motor ship is a steamship for the purposes of the Act. Section 271 (1) provides:

E "Every passenger steamer which carries more than twelve passengers shall—(a) be surveyed once at least in each year in the manner provided in this Part of this Act; and (b) shall not ply or proceed to sea or on any voyage or excursion with any passengers on board, unless the owner or master has the certificate from the Board of Trade as to survey under this Part of this Act, the same being in force, and applicable to the voyage or excursion on which the steamer is about to proceed."

F The learned recorder has found that the Dolly Graham and the Tweed were not passenger steamers within the meaning of the sections. He has also found that the one hundred or so persons who were carried in these vessels on the day in question paid no fare and gave no remuneration to anybody, though, in the view I take of this case, that is not the material point.

G It is said here, and at first, I confess, I was attracted by the argument of counsel for the appellant, that once one shows that there are passengers on board the ship, she thereby becomes a passenger ship, and an offence is committed if she goes to sea with more than twelve passengers on board without the certificate of the Board of Trade which is mentioned in s. 271 (1). The argument of counsel for the respondents, however, has satisfied me that the first opinion I formed was wrong, and I am now convinced that the learned recorder was right in the judgment he gave.

H It seems to me that, considering that s. 267 deals with passenger and emigrant ships, and provides that the expression "passenger steamer" shall mean "every British steamship carrying passengers," the court must first apply its mind to the question whether the ship can properly be called a passenger ship. The words are "carrying passengers," and that seems to point to the fact that the ship must be one that is either constructed to carry passengers or is used for the carriage of passengers, not a ship which may, although a cargo ship or a fishing vessel, on some particular occasion take somebody for a trip down the river. When one comes to s. 271, one finds the words:

"(1) Every passenger steamer which carries more than twelve passengers shall—(a) be surveyed once at least in each year in the manner provided in this Part of this Act; and (b) shall not ply or proceed to sea or on any voyage or excursion with any passengers on board . . ."

unless the owner or master has this certificate. Counsel for the appellant invited us to say that that was a piece of careless drafting, and that what it meant was that no steamer should go to sea with more than twelve passengers on board without a certificate, but that is not what the section says. The section begins:

"Every passenger steamer which carries more than twelve passengers . . . shall not ply or proceed to sea or on any voyage or excursion with any passengers on board . . ."

without a certificate. That seems clearly to point to the fact that the first thing to find out is whether the ship is a passenger steamer carrying more than twelve passengers, not a steamer which is carrying more than twelve passengers on some particular day. She has to be a passenger steamer, and that may be shown by evidence either that she is a steamer constructed to carry passengers, like an excursion steamer, or that she is a steamer which is ordinarily and habitually engaged in carrying people from place to place.

This point is not without authority. The first case to which our attention was called is Kiddle v. Kidston (1), an Irish case, decided in 1884, but which cannot be regarded as a wholly satisfactory authority. It was a decision of two judges against one. O'BRIEN, J., delivered a very strong dissenting judgment, and, although there are many passages in his judgment with which I should find it difficult to agree, I think the weight of his argument was much on the lines of the argument of counsel for the respondents before us to-day. That case was considered by this court in 1889 in Hedges v. Hooker (2), a case which is singularly like the present. In that case more than twelve persons were taken on board a steamer for an excursion down the River Orwell to Felixstowe and back. No charge was made for the use of the steamer, but a gratuity was given to the master and crew. The ship had been lent to take a choir for an outing, and LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in giving his judgment, did not rely entirely, as did HAWKINS, J., on the fact that it could not be said the vessel was plying for hire. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., said (60 L.T. 823):

"The justices set out all the facts, and then say that these persons were passengers within the meaning of s. 303 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. It is impossible to define exactly what constitutes a passenger steamer. Each case must stand on its own circumstances. For instance, take the case where a gentleman takes a party on his steam yacht up and down a river. I should say that such a case was too clear for argument. In the present case the respondents are the owners of a steamer on which they take a number of boys and girls who form a choir down the river for a trip and bring them back again, and they charge nothing for the use of the steamer. The question in the case is, whether the vessel was a passenger steamer, and these persons who were on board were passengers within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 303, which says that 'the word "passengers" shall be held to include any persons carried in a steamship other than the master and crew, and the owner, his family and servants; and the expression "passenger steamer" shall be held to include every British steamship carrying passengers to, from, or between any place or places in the United Kingdom, excepting steam ferry boats working in chains, commonly called steam bridges.' I think the sort of thing done here was not pointed at by the Act of Parliament, and that it would be straining the Act to include it."

A He goes on to say that they were not plying, and approves the judgment of O'BRIEN, J., in Kiddle v. Kidston (1). It will be observed that the learned Lord Chief Justice was clearly indicating that the first consideration to which one must apply one's mind is whether the vessel could be called a passenger steamer, and that not merely by a narrow reference to the definition section, which speaks of every British steamship carrying passengers to, from, or between any places in the United Kingdom. As HILBERY, J., pointed out in the course of the argument, the participle "carrying" is used for an express purpose as showing that it is a vessel the business or habitual use of which is for the carriage of passengers.

B There were two cases in the Court of Justiciary to which we have been referred. The first is Yeudall v. Sweeney, Yeudall v. Lynn (3). In that case it was held that the word "carries" does not mean "is fitted to carry" but "in fact carries"; and, accordingly, that a complaint which merely set forth that a passenger steamer, for which no certificate had been obtained, had, on a specified occasion, carried more than twelve passengers was relevant. I do not propose to deal with the judgments at length in that case because I do not think they were really aimed at the point we are now considering.

C A case much nearer to the present one is Young v. Docherly (4). There the use of an ordinary motor boat had been granted to some sea cadets to proceed from Greenock to Rosneath. The ship had not got the necessary certificate, and the boys paid 1d. towards the cost of the fuel, although no consideration was paid for the use of the boat. The sheriff-substitute dismissed the charge and that decision was upheld by the court. The LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL (LORD CLYDE) said (1929 S.C. (J.) 61):

E "I am not prepared, on the facts before us in these cases and on the arguments presented, to lay it down either expressly or by implication that, if the owner of a pleasure steam vessel asks a party of friends, numbering more than twelve, to join him in a trip on the Clyde—say, from Greenock and back—his vessel becomes a 'passenger steamer' and his friends 'passengers' within the meaning of the Act, to the effect of requiring him to qualify and apply for the statutory certificate. But this would be the result of affirming the prosecutor's bare argument on the terms of the Act . . . For these reasons I think the sheriff-substitute was right in thinking that there were not sufficient materials before him to entitle him to hold that the motor boats in question were 'passenger steamers' within the meaning of s. 271 . . ."

G No doubt there were in that case, exactly as there were in the present case, persons on board who could be called passengers, but evidently, in the opinion of the LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL, that was not enough, and it had to be shown that the vessel was a passenger steamer properly so-called. LORD SANDS said (ibid.):

H "And in order that the prosecutor may succeed in this case it is necessary that he should show that the vessels here in question were passenger steamers. Now, to succeed in that contention he must show that the clause may be thus paraphrased: 'The expression "passenger steamer" shall mean every British ship having for the time being on board, even incidentally, one person who is other than the master and crew or the owner and his family and servants on its way to or from places in the United Kingdom.' Now, that is a construction which would lead to results so extravagant that one would hesitate to adopt it unless one were constrained to do so. I do not think we are so constrained. I think that, when we have regard to the whole context of the Act and the scope of its different parts and provisions, we may fairly read the definition 'passenger steamer shall mean every British steamship carrying passengers to, from, and between any places in the United Kingdom' as meaning that every passenger steamer shall mean every British steamship carrying passengers to, from, and between any places in the United Kingdom as a matter of business either usually or on a particular occasion, and that the mere incidental presence on board a ship on a particular voyage of one person, or it may be more than one person, other than those excepted in the clause dealing with 'passenger,' does not make a ship a passenger steamer."

Contrast that case with the one to which counsel for the appellant called our attention—R. v. Fox (5). That was a case in which Messrs. Fox & Co., a well-known firm of shipping agents in Falmouth and agents to the Canadian Pacific liners, had been using the Durgan, a tug of their own, to convey from the shore to the ships members of the crews of the liners when in Falmouth harbour. The Board of Trade took the view that they were contravening s. 271 (1) of the Act of 1894 because the tug was not certified as a passenger steamer. On Mar. 18, 1924, the Durgan was noted to have on board to take back to the Empress of Scotland fifty-one or fifty-two members of the crew in addition to the tug crew, and, accordingly, there was a summons. It was clear that the vessel had been habitually used to take members of the crews of Canadian Pacific ships out to the ships lying in the Carrick Roads. The justices dismissed the summons for reasons which are not clearly stated, but this court reversed their decision, LORD HEWART, C.J., saying (21 Lloyd L.R. 72):

"That section [i.e., s. 267 of the Act of 1894] provides that for the purpose of Part III of the Act the expression 'passenger' shall include any passenger carried in a ship other than the master and crew and the owner, his family and servants. It is quite obvious that that means other than the master and crew of that ship; so that it does not mean that a person who is a member of the crew of one ship is thereby prevented from being a passenger upon any other ship."

Then he goes on to deal with the argument that those persons were not passengers but crew, and says (ibid.):

"Some doubt seems to have been thrown on the matter by the decision in Hedges v. Hooker (2), but that decision turned on the special facts of the case."

The special facts in Hedges v. Hooker (2) seem very near the special facts in the present case.

I have come to the conclusion without any hesitation that one cannot make sense of s. 271 (1) unless one reads the words: "Every passenger steamer which carries more than twelve passengers" as meaning that the steamer first has to be a passenger steamer, i.e., one that is either used habitually, or, at any rate, substantially, for carrying passengers, or is constructed as a passenger steamer. When the sub-section says: "Every passenger steamer which carries more than twelve passengers . . . shall not . . . proceed to sea . . . with any passengers . . .", it seems to me clearly that it has to be shown that the vessel is a passenger steamer quite apart from whether she has more than twelve persons on board. She is to be, first, a passenger steamer. Then, if she has more than twelve persons on board she must not go to sea without a certificate. But she must be a steamer constructed or used to carry passengers. In the present case the learned recorder has found—and it was clearly open to him to find whether this ship was a passenger steamer or not—that she was a fishing boat. In so holding, I think he came to the same conclusion as did the Court of Justiciary in Young v. Docherly (4), and, therefore, I feel that it is impossible to interfere with this finding, and this appeal fails.

HILBERY, J.: I was at first, I must say, attracted by the argument for the appellant, but, like my Lord, I am unable to make sense of s. 271 (1) unless that construction is given to the meaning of the words "passenger steamer" which my Lord has said is the proper construction. I agree with the judgment which my Lord has given.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

BEALE v. BEALE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), June 19, 20, 21, 1950.]

Divorce—Cruelty—Condonation—Revival of cruelty—Inference that conditional forgiveness has become absolute after lapse of time—Cruelty committed from 1930–38—Alleged revival after 1945.

D

The husband presented a petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's cruelty, and in her answer the wife asked for a decree on the ground of the husband's cruelty. Each relied on incidents alleged to have taken place between 1930 and 1938 and after 1945. Between 1938 and 1945, it appeared, the parties lived a normal married life. It was contended by each party that, if the earlier acts of alleged cruelty had been condoned, they had been revived by the later incidents which, it was alleged, amounted to matrimonial offences even if they did not constitute cruelty in law. The learned commissioner by whom the petition was heard was not satisfied that cruelty in law had been committed by either party in the period before 1938, and in regard to the events after 1945 he found that the matters of complaint could not be treated as cruelty by one spouse to the other or as reviving previous cruelty, had there been any, and, accordingly, he dismissed the petition and rejected the prayer in answer. Both parties appealed.

HELD [per BUCKNILL and SOMERVELL, L.JJ.]: on the evidence, the learned commissioner was justified in coming to the conclusion that no cruelty had been proved by either party in respect of either of the two periods.

Per DENNING, L.J.: I am prepared to assume that the episodes which took place twelve years ago or more amounted to cruelty, but, even so, I do not think that they can be made a ground for divorce. Beard v. Beard (1) and Richardson v. Richardson (2) establish the proposition that condonation is conditional forgiveness, the condition being that the guilty party should henceforward behave properly. He is, so to speak, taken back on probation. The probationary period does not, however, necessarily last for life, and a point may be reached where, by his good behaviour, the guilty party has proved himself worthy of the trust and confidence of the other. The further that past offences recede into the distance, so much the more does it become difficult to revive them, and the time may come when the proper inference is that the forgiveness is no longer conditional but has become absolute. This view seems to me to meet the objections so forcibly expressed by VAISEY, J. ([1945] 2 All E.R. 318), in his dissenting judgment in Beard v. Beard (1). It is also in accord with what BUCKNILL, L.J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 332), in Richardson v. Richardson (2):

"... I cannot believe that, if adultery has been condoned, say for seven years, a wife is entitled to say it is revived because the husband has on one occasion slapped her face."

Applying this principle, it appears that from January, 1938, to December, 1945, the parties lived a normal married life without untoward incidents. In those circumstances the violent episodes which, I assume, had taken place in the early years of the marriage must be regarded as having been forgiven by both sides absolutely and not conditionally, and they cannot be revived by the events after December, 1945. [His LORDSHIP held that the events after 1945 did not amount to cruelty by either party, and agreed that the appeals should be dismissed.]

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer and Harman, JJ.), June 19, July 17, 1950.]

Bankruptcy—Preferential claim—Assessed tax—Excess profits tax in respect of a chargeable accounting period other than last completed period before bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 33 (1) (a).

On Apr. 23, 1948, a receiving order was made against the debtor, and he was adjudicated bankrupt on May 3. On July 27, 1949, an assessment of £5,000 was made on him in respect of excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period of twelve months ended Dec. 31, 1944, and on Sept. 7, 1949, the Crown claimed preferential payment of this sum under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (1) (a).

Held: (i) on the true construction of s. 33 (1) (a) the Crown's right to priority in respect of an assessed tax was confined to the year of assessment which immediately preceded the bankruptcy, and, therefore, the Crown was not entitled to preferential payment of the £5,000 in respect of excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period ended Dec. 31, 1944.

Gowers v. Walker ([1930] 1 Ch. 262), and Re Cockell ([1932] W.N. 172), not followed.

(ii) the reference to Apr. 5 in s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914 merely denoted the end of a period, i.e., the fiscal year, and, therefore, in cases of excess profits tax there should be substituted for "Apr. 5" whatever might be the date which marked the end of the chargeable accounting period of any particular trade or business.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. As from July 5, 1948, para. (d) of s. 33 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, is repealed by the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, s. 89, and sched. IX, and para. (e) by the National Insurance Act, 1946, s. 65, and sched. IX, and a new paragraph, para. (f), has been added to s. 33 (1) of the Act of 1914 by the joint effect of the two Acts of 1946 in respect of "all amounts due, in respect of contributions payable during the twelve months before the date of the receiving order, by the bankrupt as the employer of any persons under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, or, either as the employer of any person or as a self-employed or non-employed person under the National Insurance Act, 1946."

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES, made at Brentford County Court on Apr. 26, 1950, on a motion by the Crown asking for the reversal of a decision of the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy rejecting the Crown's claim to rank as a preferential creditor in respect of the sum of £5,000 excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period of twelve months ended Dec. 31, 1944.

A receiving order was made against the debtor on Apr. 23, 1948. On May 3, 1948, he was adjudicated bankrupt. On July 27, 1949, an assessment of £5,000 in respect of excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period of twelve months ended Dec. 31, 1944, was made on him. On Aug. 13, 1949, it was issued. On Sept. 7 the Crown claimed preferential payment under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (1) (a), in respect of this sum and also in respect of income tax and sur-tax to which the debtor had been assessed for the year 1944/1945. The trustee in bankruptcy admitted the claim in respect of the income tax and sur-tax, but rejected the claim in respect of the excess profits tax on the ground that the Crown's preferential claim in respect of income tax, sur-tax and excess profits tax should be limited to precisely the same period in each case. The learned county court judge upheld the trustee's decision and dismissed the motion. The Crown appealed, and, during the hearing of the appeal, it appeared to the Divisional Court sitting in bankruptcy, that the real question in the case was whether the Crown was entitled to claim preference for an assessed tax in respect of a period other than the last completed period before the bankruptcy.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 17. ROMER, J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES in the Brentford County Court, made on Apr. 26, 1950, whereby he dismissed a motion by the Crown asking for the reversal of a decision of the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy rejecting the claim of the Crown to rank as a preferential creditor in respect of the sum of £5,000 excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period "year to Dec. 31, 1944."

A receiving order was made against the debtor on Apr. 23, 1948, and he was adjudicated bankrupt on May 3. The Crown lodged proofs for the following sums owing to it by the debtor, namely:

Excess profits tax: chargeable accounting period ended
Dec. 31, 1944	£5,000	0	0
Excess profits tax: chargeable accounting period ended
Dec. 31, 1945	222	0	0
Sur-tax, 1943/1944	139	15	9
Sur-tax, 1944/1945	792	4	0
Sur-tax, 1944/1945 (additional assessment, reduced from £712 3s.)	704	9	0

By letter, dated Sept. 7, 1949, the Crown claimed the sum of £7,652 13s. for payment preferentially, being in the whole (as it said) an amount not exceeding one year's assessed taxation. This amount was made up as follows:

Excess profits tax: chargeable accounting period ended
Dec. 31, 1944	£5,000	0	0

The sum of £653 5s. 9d., being the balance of the amounts for which the Crown proved, was claimed non-preferentially to rank with the other unsecured creditors.

The trustee in bankruptcy admitted the Crown's claim to rank preferentially under s. 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, in respect of the sur-tax and income tax to which the debtor had been assessed for the year 1944/1945, but with regard to the excess profits tax assessed for the chargeable accounting period ended Dec. 31, 1944, he communicated the following views to the Crown by a letter, dated Oct. 13, 1949:

"So far as I am concerned it is my contention that the revenue's preferential claim in respect of income tax and sur-tax and excess profits tax must be limited to precisely the same period in each case. In those circumstances I would be prepared to consider the admission preferentially of approximately three quarters of the item of £5,000 excess profits tax, i.e., that portion which refers to the same period as the other preferential claims."

By notice, dated Feb. 23, 1950, the trustee rejected the Crown's claim to preference for the £5,000 excess profits tax on the ground that preferential treatment had already been claimed and conceded in respect of claims covering a different period. In support of its notice of motion to the county court in which the Crown sought a reversal of this decision, it filed an affidavit by an Assistant Solicitor of Inland Revenue which stated:

"Excess profits tax is not computed upon the 'fiscal year' beginning Apr. 6 in one year and ending on Apr. 5 in the following year, as is the case with income tax and sur-tax. It is chargeable upon a 'chargeable accounting period,' which normally is a period of twelve months in respect of which the accounts of a trade are made up and during which the tax is exigible, in the present case a period of twelve months ending on Dec. 31, 1944. This period is unrelated to the fiscal year and falls in fact partly within the fiscal year 1943/1944 and partly within the fiscal year 1944/1945 in the present case."

The affidavit went on to urge that the assessment was, nevertheless, one "not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment," as required by s. 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. When the matter came before the learned county court judge, he said that he understood it was probably going to a higher court and, therefore, thought no good purpose would be served by his giving a reasoned judgment. He, accordingly, merely stated that, on consideration of the relevant statutes and of the cases cited to him, he thought that the trustee's decision was right, and he, therefore, dismissed the appeal. When the present appeal was opened before us, the main purpose of counsel for the Crown was to negative the view of the trustee, as communicated to the Crown, to the effect that taxes, in respect of which preferential payment is claimed, must be taxes which are assessed for one and the same period. It appeared to us, however, that the real question in the case was different from this, and that it was doubtful whether it was open to the Crown to claim preference for an assessed tax in respect of a chargeable accounting period other than the last completed period before the bankruptcy. An inquiry, accordingly, developed into this view of the matter, in the course of which certain other points, which we shall have occasion to mention later, also emerged.

Excess profits tax was first charged by Part III of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939. The chargeable accounting period of a trade or business for the purposes of the tax could end on Apr. 5 of any year, or it might end on some other date. Debts in respect of this tax were given preferential treatment in the following manner. Section 21 of the Act of 1939 provides:

"(1) Excess profits tax shall be assessed and collected by the commissioners, and shall be due and payable at the expiration of one month from the date of assessment, and shall be recoverable as a debt due to His Majesty from the person on whom it was assessed. (2) The provisions of sched. V to the Finance Act, 1937 . . . including the provisions therein enabling the commissioners to make regulations, shall have effect with respect to excess profits tax as they have effect with respect to the national defence contribution."

The Finance Act, 1937, sched. V, Part III, para. 5, provides:

"In a bankruptcy . . . the same priority shall be given to the national defence contribution as is, by the enactments relating to bankruptcy . . . required to be given to income tax."

The Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (1), states what that priority is:

"In the distribution of the property of a bankrupt there shall be paid in priority to all other debts (a) all parochial or other local rates due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, and having become due and payable within twelve months next before that time, and all assessed taxes, land tax, property or income tax, assessed on the bankrupt up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order, and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment."

This, then, is the degree of priority to which excess profits tax was entitled, and the Crown claims this priority for the £5,000 excess profits tax which is the subject of the present appeal.

There was handed up in the course of the hearing before us a copy of the assessment in respect of this £5,000. The assessment was made on July 27, 1949, and was issued on the following Aug. 13, and it was in respect of the chargeable accounting period of twelve months ended Dec. 31, 1944. At first sight, and having regard to the date of the receiving order in this case, viz., Apr. 23, 1948, this assessed tax would not appear to be within the category of taxes on which priority is conferred by s. 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, in that the assessment bears no relation either to Apr. 5 or to the chargeable accounting period next before the date of the receiving order. It is the contention of the Crown that it is not necessary for its purpose that the assessment should bear any such relation, and that it is entitled to priority for each assessed tax covering any one year of assessment earlier in date than the receiving order if the tax, when assessed for that year (whether before or after the receiving order), remains unpaid. The Crown contends that this has been the long established practice in bankruptcy matters and that it is supported by authority. The preferential treatment of tax was considered by EVE, J., in Gowers v. Walker (1) in relation to the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 209 (1) (a), which is in substantially the same terms as s. 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. In that case a receiver was appointed of the defendant company on Nov. 15, 1927, under a power contained in an instrument of charge which the company had effected. On May 1, 1928, the Special Commissioners made assessments to income tax on the company in respect of tax deducted from loan interest in each of the fiscal years 1922/1923 to 1926/1927 inclusive. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who were the plaintiffs in the action, claimed one year's assessment of income tax for the year 1923/1924 (that being the year in respect of which the largest amount of tax was due), to be paid by the receiver as a preferential debt. The receiver disputed the Crown's claim to preference, not on the ground that the year selected by the Crown for preference was not the year immediately preceding the receivership, but solely on the ground that the liability for income tax was not a debt which could be sued for when the receiver went into possession, as there had not, at that date, been an assessment. EVE, J., in a reserved judgment, after describing the receiver's point as being that the expression "income tax assessed on the company up to Apr. 5" must be read as referring to tax actually assessed before the date mentioned, and not as extending to tax for the period up to that date if assessed subsequently to that date, said ([1930] 1 Ch. 267):

"This contention seeks to impose on the expression 'up to Apr. 5' a construction equivalent to that which it might bear if the word 'before' were substituted for the words 'up to.' I can see no good grounds for supporting this view. The expression 'up to' is a well known one in accountancy, and when books are said to be written up, balances to be struck, and accounts to be vouched up to a particular date, no implication arises that any of the operations were completed before or even on the particular date, the true meaning being that the particular date is the one up to which the state of account has been ascertained. So here income tax assessed up to a particular date is not, in my opinion, confined to the tax actually assessed before that date, but includes all assessed tax up to that date, whether the assessment was made before or after the date. Nor can I see anything in the provisions of s. 209 to lead to the conclusion that anything else was intended. The section is an exhaustive enumeration of preferential payments, qualified in each case by reasonable limitations on the quantitative amount that is to be preferred."

Then, after referring to some of the other debts in respect of which priority was given by the section, the learned judge continued (ibid., 268):

"The income tax is the only item in the ascertainment of which a special date is substituted for the relevant date, and the reason for this is obviously to avoid all necessity for apportionment. Except the statutory limitation, I can detect in the section nothing which reduces the rights of priority in respect of income tax to income tax actually assessed before the date up to which it is to be assessed . . ."

and the learned judge decided in favour of the plaintiffs accordingly.

In Re Cockell (2), the headnote (16 Tax Cas. 681) is as follows:

"The sole executrix and universal legatee under the will of a testator who died on June 19, 1929, claimed that she was entitled to retain out of the estate, which was insolvent, sums in respect of debts due to her. A preferential claim for arrears of the deceased's income tax and super-tax for the fiscal year 1920/1921 had been made on behalf of the Crown under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33. The amount of the executrix's claim was such that, if it were met, the Crown's claim could not be satisfied. The executrix took out an originating summons to have it determined: (1) Whether her right of retainer could be maintained against the Crown's claim under s. 34 (1) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, and s. 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. (2) Whether the Crown's preferential claim for income tax could be made only for tax assessed for the year ending on Apr. 5 next before the testator's death or for any year before the testator's death."

A The first question went eventually to the House of Lords, which held that the executrix could not exercise her right of retainer in priority to the Crown's preferential claim. After this decision the summons came on again before BENNETT, J., for determination of the second question. It appears that counsel for the executrix, in contending that s. 33 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act did not give the Crown the right to choose any one year, but that it was obliged to claim in respect of the year immediately preceding the bankruptcy, referred to Gowers v. Walker (1) and to a dictum of ROMER, J., in Re Campbell (3), and said that, although there was no reasoning in either decision, the learned judge might feel that in view of these cases he could not decide in favour of the executrix. BENNETT, J., did take that view, and said (16 Tax Cas. 722):

C "I have indicated nothing. I will say nothing more than I have said. I simply follow EVE, J.'s decision."

D In Re Campbell (3) the point did not in any sense arise. After the death on Oct. 4, 1920, of an insolvent person who owed sums for super-tax in respect of each of the years 1916/1917 to 1919/1920 inclusive, the Crown claimed priority in respect of the year 1919/1920, viz., the year ending on Apr. 5 immediately preceding the debtor's death. The whole question before ROMER, J., related to a sum which the trustees of a settlement (under which the debtor had a life interest) had raised as an advancement for payment of the debtor's debts, including his arrears of super-tax. The amount raised had been, in part, applied in payment of his other debts, but not in payment of the super-tax, and the debtor's administratrix claimed to be entitled to appropriate the unapplied balance to payment of the super-tax owing for the year 1919/1920. ROMER, J., rejected this claim and held that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were entitled to appropriate the balance in the manner that they desired to do, viz., to payment in full of the assessed super-tax for the three years ending on Apr. 5, 1919, and as to the remainder on account of the assessed super-tax for the year 1919/1920. At the end of his judgment ROMER, J., said that he was not quite sure that the question of appropriation had any real materiality in it and, after some discussion, said (10 Tax Cas. 593):

G "If [counsel for the Crown] claims preference for one year, and it turns out that he has claimed preference for a year in respect of which he has been paid aliunde, I should have thought he would have a right of preference in the next biggest year. However, I do not know that it matters."

There the matter was left.

H In Re Winget, Ltd. (4) the question at issue was whether corporation profits tax was an "assessed tax" within the meaning of s. 209 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. The tax in question had been assessed for the accounting period of twelve months ending Mar. 31, 1921, and a receiver of the company's undertaking was appointed on Apr. 27, 1923. The Crown claimed priority of payment for the tax on the footing that it was an "assessed tax" and this was the only question argued or decided in the case. RUSSELL, J., held that it was and made an order under which the tax in question was accorded the priority conferred by s. 209 of the Act. The question whether it was open to the Crown to claim priority for a tax assessed for a year other than the accounting period ended Mar. 31, 1923, was not raised in the case,

The only other case which was cited to us on the point now under consideration was A.-G. v. Irish Steel, Ltd. (5), an Irish decision. In that case the defendant company was assessed to income tax amounting to £2,578 2s. 6d. for the year ended Apr. 5, 1946, and to corporation profits tax amounting to £6,377 18s. for the year ended Mar. 31, 1945. In January, 1947 (while these amounts were still unpaid), a receiver was appointed of the company's property by the debenture holders. The Attorney-General, on behalf of the Minister for Finance, claimed payment preferentially of the two above-mentioned amounts under s. 107 and s. 209 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. The defendant company contended that the Minister was entitled to preferential payment of only one of the two amounts, at his election. It further contended that, if preference extended to more than one tax, it must be in respect of one and the same year, i.e., a year with the same termini a quo and ad quem. It lodged in court with its defence the total amount claimed for corporation profits tax, viz., £6,377 18s., being the larger of the two amounts claimed. The Irish Supreme Court, reversing the decision of the High Court, held that the Minister for Finance was entitled to preferential payment of both the income tax and the corporation profits tax. It will be observed that the defendant company did not take the point that the Minister was not entitled to preference for tax assessed for any year other than the year ended Apr. 5, 1946. The point was not, indeed, open to it, for it had paid into court the amount of the corporation profits tax assessed for the year ended Mar. 31, 1945. In the course of his judgment in the Supreme Court, however, MURNAGHAN, J., did refer indirectly to this aspect of the matter, saying (Irish Tax Cases No. 67, p. 5):

“ ‘ In the whole ’ means, I think, when added up; but the limitation to one year's assessment means one year's assessment of any particular tax, and in case of arrears of any tax extending over a number of years, means a maximum amounting to one year's assessment.”

O'BYRNE, J., agreed with this view (ibid., p. 7).

So far as authority goes, then, the matter stands thus. The orders made in Gowers v. Walker (1), Re Winget (4) and A.-G. v. Irish Steel, Ltd. (5) all proceeded on the footing that preferential payment of tax is not confined to tax assessed for the year ending on Apr. 5 immediately preceding a bankruptcy, winding-up or receivership (as the case may be), but is accorded also to tax assessed for any previous fiscal year. Observations by MURNAGHAN, J., and O'BYRNE, J., in the Irish case support this view, as also does the dictum of ROMER, J., in Re Campbell (3), and BENNETT, J., decided in favour of the view in Re Cockell (2), though he expressed no opinion of his own on the point, which appears, indeed, not to have been seriously argued. There is, therefore, no decision which is binding on this court, and, having given the matter very careful consideration, we have arrived at the conclusion that the contention of the Crown in support of the view cannot be sustained.

The question turns entirely on the construction of s. 33 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. This sub-section has nothing whatever to do with the proof of debts—a consideration which cannot too clearly be borne in mind. All creditors who have proved their debts are entitled to have the debtor's assets distributed proportionately amongst them (s. 62 and s. 33 (7)). Certain creditors, and they alone, are entitled to preferential treatment, viz., they are to be paid certain debts in priority to the other creditors of the bankrupt. These privileged debts are specified in paras. (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e) of s. 33 (1). Leaving out of account, for the moment, the question of taxes, the feature that is common to all these debts (except para. (d), which was repealed by the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, and to which special considerations apply) is that they should have become due during a period immediately preceding the bankruptcy. Rates, wages or salary of clerks or servants, wages of labourers or workmen, and contributions under the National Insurance Act, 1911, and under the National

Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, are all characterised by the common requirement that they should have become due during the period that immediately preceded the bankruptcy. In the case of rates, the language of the section is express on the point. In the case of wages, salary and insurance contributions under the Act of 1911, the point is all the stronger for being left to implication. The same qualification is attached to purchase tax by s. 20 (1) of the Finance Act, 1942. The reason for this pre-requisite is, we think, reasonably clear and arises from the fact that the various privileged creditors may not have had time to get in the moneys owing to them before disaster overtook the debtor. Turning, now, to the assessed taxes, it is a mere matter of construction to see whether they are immune from the quality which attaches to the other debts referred to in the sub-section. The first thing that is noticeable is that they are included in the same paragraph as rates and that the only rates to which priority is accorded by that paragraph are those which have "become due and payable within twelve months next" before the date of the receiving order. The next thing one sees is that the taxes are linked with rates by the word "and," which is indicative of similarity of characteristic, and not by the word "but," which would be indicative of differentiation. Accordingly, one approaches the reference to taxes in the expectation that one will find continuity, rather than diversity, of treatment. That reference is to all assessed taxes, etc.:

"... assessed on the bankrupt up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order, and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment."

When it is appreciated that periods of assessment consist in general of one year ending on Apr. 5, then, surely, this language, even if read alone, ought to relate to taxes assessed for the fiscal year which preceded the bankruptcy, for, had it been intended to include earlier assessments, it would have been sufficient to say "assessed on the bankrupt before the date of the receiving order." The language, however, is not to be read in isolation, but it is to be read in conjunction with, and in the light of, the other considerations to which we have referred, and, when so read, it appears to us that the case for confining tax priority to the year of assessment which immediately preceded the bankruptcy is strong indeed. The only argument based on construction which was urged in favour of the contrary view was that this interpretation gives no effect to the concluding words "and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment." It was contended that, if the only relevant taxes are those assessed for the fiscal year which preceded the bankruptcy, no effect can be attributed to these words inasmuch as, on this hypothesis, it would be impossible for the one year's assessment to be exceeded. We think, however, that these words can be explained by the possibility of income or profits for a period exceeding one year being included in one and the same assessment. Be that as it may, the presence of these words, in our judgment, is insufficient to displace a conclusion founded on all the considerations to which we have referred.

We are conscious that, in arriving at this conclusion, we are giving effect to a view contrary to that which appears to have been acted on in the cases which we have cited. In only one of those, however, was the point decided, namely, in Re Cockell (2), and in that case counsel appear to have invited the judge, and he seems to have agreed, to express no opinion of his own, but merely to follow the order made by EVE, J., in Gowers v. Walker (1)—a case in which the particular question was (according to the report) neither argued by counsel nor considered by the learned judge. In these circumstances we are free to give effect to what we believe to be the true meaning of s. 33 and to hold, as we do, that the Crown is not entitled to priority for an assessment made for a period which ended over three years before the receiving order. Inasmuch as the contrary view would entitle the Crown to claim priority in respect of taxes assessed, say, fifteen years before the receiving order and still remaining unpaid, and, accordingly, to appropriate, possibly, the whole of a bankrupt's assets to the exclusion of all his ordinary creditors, we cannot say that we have arrived at our conclusion with regret. The Crown would, undoubtedly, be entitled to prove in respect of such arrears, however dilatory it might have been in taking steps to collect them, but there can be little justification, either in logic or in reason, in conferring on a claim so long outstanding a priority over the general body of creditors.

It is not necessary, having regard to the conclusion which we have expressed, to deal at any length with the other matters which were discussed in argument before us. One was the difficulty which arises in cases, such as the present, where a chargeable accounting period ends on some date other than Apr. 5. On a strict reading of s. 33 (1) (a), taxes assessed for such a period would either not qualify at all, or, alternatively, would only partially qualify for priority, because the period would not have the requisite terminus ad quem. On the other hand, it was the intention of the legislature, as expressed by the statutory provisions to which we have earlier referred, that excess profits tax should have "the same priority" in bankruptcy as income tax. In our opinion, this intention can only be achieved by applying this priority to excess profits tax mutatis mutandis, in other words, by treating the reference to Apr. 5 as merely denoting the end of a period, i.e., the fiscal year and, accordingly, substituting for it, in cases of excess profits tax, whatever may be the date which marks the end of the chargeable accounting period of any particular trade or business. Accordingly, in the present case the Crown would, in our judgment, have been entitled to priority in respect of income tax assessed for the year Apr. 6, 1947, to Apr. 5, 1948, and of any excess profits tax (had it still been assessable) assessed for the chargeable accounting period ended on Dec. 31, 1947.

Then the question was discussed whether EVE, J., was right in Gowers v. Walker (1) in holding that the Crown is entitled to priority in respect of tax which had not been assessed at the date of a receiving order but is assessed subsequently. The trustee's argument before us that the Crown is not so entitled was necessarily alternative to his main argument which we have already accepted, viz., that priority is only accorded to taxes assessed for the financial year or for the chargeable accounting period, as the case may be, immediately anterior to the bankruptcy; for, if priority is so limited and a receiving order was made, say, on Apr. 7 of any particular year, it is clear that the priority would be wholly defeated in respect of the previous year's income tax unless the Crown could rely on an assessment subsequently made. In the circumstances, we express no definite view on a point which would only have become material had we arrived at a different conclusion on the question which we have already decided. We think that there is force in the suggestion that s. 33 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act only confers priority on debts that are due and payable at the date of a receiving order and that tax is neither due nor payable until it has been assessed. However, the exact point was decided in the contrary sense by EVE, J., in Gowers v. Walker (1) and we do not wish to cast doubt on the accuracy of the decision of the learned judge when it is in no way necessary for our decision so to do. The grounds on which we have based our conclusion in this case necessarily involve that the trustee's concession of priority in favour of the Crown in respect of the income tax and sur-tax for the financial year 1944/1945 ought not to have been made. With this, however, we are not directly concerned and the trustee will, presumably, take such steps with regard to these assessments as he may be advised. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

BANQUE DES MARCHANDS DE MOSCOU (KROUPETSCHESKY)
(In liquidation) v. KINDERSLEY AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Singleton and Jenkins, L.J.J.), June 23, 26, 27, July 14, 1950.]

*Company—Winding-up—Jurisdiction—Company not carrying on business in

s. 338 (1), (2).*

Company—Winding-up—Election—Application for order that winding-up invalid —Previous application for leave to appeal out of time against rejection of proof—Consent to adjournment of application for leave pending decision on application for order that winding-up invalid.

In 1932 a Russian bank, which had been dissolved by decree of the Soviet regime in 1918, and which, while it had not a specific place of business in England, had transacted business here through a representative and had large assets here, was wound-up by an order of the Chancery Division under the Companies Act, 1929, s. 338 (1). In 1943 K., on behalf of a partnership firm, which had been dissolved and of which he had been a partner, sought to prove on behalf of the partnership firm in the liquidation against the bank for a sum which he alleged was the balance due to the firm from the bank. In 1949 the liquidator of the bank, by leave of the registrar under s. 191 of the Act of 1929, issued the writ in the present action against the surviving partners of the partnership firm claiming payment of a consolidated balance of moneys alleged to be due to the bank on various accounts. On Jan. 9, 1950, the liquidator served notice on the said defendants rejecting the proof which K. had put forward in 1943. On Jan. 25, 1950, the defendants applied for leave to appeal out of time against the rejection of the proof, but the hearing of an appeal to the judge against the dismissal of the application by the registrar was by consent adjourned pending the determination of the present application. On Mar. 8, 1950, the defendants issued this summons for an order dismissing or staying the action or to have the name of the bank struck out on the ground that the bank was non-existent and that the action had been commenced without authority. The defendants argued that the winding-up was a nullity because the bank had never had a place of business nor carried on business in England except through agents.

HELD: (i) by applying for leave to appeal out of time against the rejection of their proof in the winding-up and having the appeal to the judge on that question adjourned until the outcome of the present proceedings was known, the defendants had not made any such election as would be inconsistent with and preclude their asserting in the present proceedings that the winding-up order was invalid.

Evans v. Bartlam ([1937] 2 All E.R. 646), applied.

(ii) as the bank had assets in England and there were persons submitting to the jurisdiction who were interested in the proper distribution of the assets and there was no machinery under Russian law for the due distribution of the English assets, the primary conditions for the exercise by the court of its discretionary winding-up jurisdiction under s. 338 (1) (d) (i) of the Act of 1929 existed; that jurisdiction was not limited by s. 338 (2) of the Act, which must be regarded as expository only; and it was not also necessary to show that the bank carried on business directly and from some established, or specified, place or places in England.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of HARMAN, J., dated May 17, 1950, and reported ante, p. 105.

In an action by the Banque des Marchands de Moscou, in liquidation, the defendants applied by summons for an order dismissing the action, or an order that all further proceedings in the action be stayed, or that the name of the alleged plaintiff be struck out so as to bring the action to an end, on the ground that the alleged plaintiff was non-existent and that the action had been commenced without authority. HARMAN, J., dismissed the application.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 14. The following judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., was read by SINGLETON, L.J. This is an action for £28,990 11s. 1d., money alleged to be due to the plaintiffs (hereafter called "the plaintiff bank") from the defendants, who were the partners at the material date of the firm of Lazard Bros. & Co. The moneys are alleged to be due on an account of long standing between the plaintiff bank and Lazard Bros. & Co. After close of pleadings, the defendants applied by summons in the action that the name of the plaintiff bank be struck out of the action on the ground that the plaintiff bank was, at the date of the writ, a non-existent entity and that the solicitors, who appear on the record as solicitors for the plaintiff bank, had and could have had no authority whatever to issue the writ in the plaintiff bank's name. The application was refused by HARMAN, J. The present appeal is from that refusal.

The plaintiff bank is, or is said to be, in liquidation. The name "Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky)" is a French transliteration of the Russian name of a corporation formed in 1866 under the laws of the then Russian Empire for the purpose of carrying on in Moscow and elsewhere in Russia the business of banking. As part of its business the plaintiff bank financed, for or on behalf of customers in Russia, the purchase in England from English cotton brokers or others of raw cotton, and the account with Lazard Bros. & Co. is said to have arisen out of or in the course of such business. It is now conceded that, as a result of decrees recognised as effective for the purpose in Russia, the plaintiff bank was dissolved, and altogether ceased as an entity to exist, in Russia at some date about and not later than January, 1918, but on May 30, 1932 (at which time the effect and dates of the relevant Russian decrees had not been established in the English courts), EVE, J., purporting to act in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by the Companies Act, 1929, s. 338 (1) (d) (i), made in respect of the plaintiff bank a winding-up order. The present liquidator of the plaintiff bank is Mr. Owen Furnival Jones.

The defendants allege (as appears from their defence in the present action) that the account between the plaintiff bank and Lazard Bros. & Co. in truth shows that, so far from there being any moneys due from Lazard Bros. & Co., the balance is the other way and that Lazard Bros. & Co. are now creditors of the plaintiff bank for a substantial sum. In accordance with this allegation on Sept. 23, 1943, a proof was lodged by the first defendant on behalf of Lazard Bros. & Co. in the liquidation of the plaintiff bank; but this proof was rejected by the present liquidator on Jan. 9, 1950. The writ in the present action is dated Sept. 9, 1949, and the defendants' application, which is the subject of the present appeal is dated Mar. 8, 1950. On Jan. 25, 1950, Lazard Bros. & Co. had applied for leave to appeal out of time from the liquidator's rejection of their proof, and, the registrar having refused to grant leave, the defendants have now appealed to WYNN-PARRY, J. (the judge having jurisdiction in companies winding-up). By consent of both parties that appeal has been adjourned until after the determination of the present application.

It is not disputed that the appropriate leave was given by the court having jurisdiction in the winding-up to the liquidator, Mr. Furnival Jones, to institute the present proceedings. But the defendants by their summons challenge the validity of the winding-up order itself, which, though made eighteen years ago, and since substantially acted on, is (they say) not binding on them, the defendants. The ground of their challenge is this. They say that in order to give to the English court jurisdiction to wind-up a foreign corporation which has (like the plaintiff bank) been dissolved and extinguished by the law of its place of origin, it must be shown that such corporation had a branch in England or carried on in England directly by its agents and at or from some established, specified or identifiable place or places in England an English business; that EVE, J. (accepting this requirement) based his jurisdiction (as in fact he did) on evidence given before him on the part of a Mr. Czamanski to the effect that, purporting to act as servant or agent of the plaintiff bank and with its authority, in the early part of 1920 he had, pursuant to the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 274, filed particulars of the English business of the plaintiff bank, giving as its registered address No. 38, Lime Street in the city of London, which particulars remained on the register until their removal by Mr. Czamanski in March 1921; and that, as now appears and is conceded, the plaintiff bank having ceased to exist some time prior to the date of registration, Mr. Czamanski could then have had no authority from the plaintiff bank, with the result that such registration, on which EVE, J., exclusively relied, is now shown to have had no force and effect whatever, and that there was and is no evidence of such a carrying on of an English business by the plaintiff bank at any time as is required to support the validity of the winding-up order. The defendants also relied below on the circumstance that there had been no proper service of the winding-up petition. That objection is not, however, now pursued and may be disregarded.

The answer of the plaintiff bank or its liquidator to this challenge is of a twofold character. First, it says that the defendants, having sought to prove in the winding-up and persisting in that claim by their application for leave to appeal out of time against the rejection of their proof, cannot in these proceedings now be heard to impugn the validity of the winding-up proceedings. Secondly, it is said that although the particular matter on which EVE, J., relied in 1932 is now shown to be a broken reed, nevertheless, if there was such a condition as above mentioned to the jurisdiction to wind-up the plaintiff bank, there was, and is, sufficient evidence, apart from the purported registration in 1920, to satisfy the requirement, but that, in any case, where, as in the present case, there are (and were in 1932) substantial assets in England to administer, both in the form of cash and in the form of English debtors to the plaintiff bank and also English creditors of the plaintiff bank, there is in law no other condition required to found the jurisdiction to wind-up the dissolved plaintiff bank. More particularly, in such a case as the present it is not necessary to prove that the plaintiff bank had ceased to have an English business, as commonly understood; still less that there was some established, specified or identifiable place or places in England from which that business was conducted.

The main ground on which HARMAN, J., rested his decision was that first above-mentioned, viz., that the defendants are pursuing at one and the same time two inconsistent or incompatible courses of action. In these proceedings they are challenging the validity of the winding-up order and all the steps taken in the winding-up consequent thereon: at the same time they are seeking to assert a right to prove in the winding-up and thereby to take the benefit of the winding-up order. The judge said (ante, 109):

“This is an attitude of which I cannot approve, nor do I think that in law the defendants are entitled to adopt it. They are, as the Scottish lawyers have it, approbating and reprobating, or, in the more homely English phrase, blowing hot and cold.”

The phrases “approbating and reprobating” or “blowing hot and cold” are expressive and useful, but if they are used to signify a valid answer to a claim or allegation they must be defined. Otherwise the claim or allegation would be liable to be rejected on the mere ground that the conduct of the party making it was regarded by the court as unmeritorious.

From the authorities cited to us it seems to me to be clear that these phrases must be taken to express, first, that the party in question is to be treated as having made an election from which he cannot resile, and, secondly, that he will not be regarded, at least in a case such as the present, as having so elected unless he has taken a benefit under or arising out of the course of conduct which he has first pursued and with which his present action is inconsistent. These requirements appear to me to be inherent, for example, in Smith v. Baker (1), and Ex parte Robertson, Re Morton (2). See also in Evans v. Bartlam (3) the speech of LORD ATKIN ([1937] 2 All E.R. 649):

“I find nothing in the facts analogous to cases where a party, having obtained and enjoyed material benefit from a judgment, has been held precluded from attacking it while he still is in enjoyment of the benefit. I cannot bring myself to think that a judgment debtor, who asks for and receives a stay of execution, approbates the judgment, so as to preclude him thereafter from seeking to set it aside, whether by appeal or otherwise. Nor do I find it possible to apply the doctrine of election.”

and the speech of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN (ibid., 652):

Counsel for the plaintiff bank referred to the decision of this court in Public Trustee v. Pearlberg (4). In that case, a vendor had issued a writ claiming, exclusively, specific performance of his contract and damages in addition or substitution. While his action was still pending the vendor proceeded, pursuant to the terms of the contract, to give to the purchaser a notice making time of the essence of the contract and intimating that unless the purchase were then completed he would rescind the contract. It was held that so long as his claim for specific performance remained outstanding the vendor could not assert an inconsistent claim to rescind. In my judgment, that case provides no analogy to, or guide in, the circumstances of the present appeal. The vendor in Public Trustee v. Pearlberg (4), so long as he claimed, and claimed only, in his action specific performance of the contract or damages, was necessarily asserting his willingness to perform it according to its terms, and was, moreover, inviting the court by its order to determine the date for actual completion. It followed that by maintaining his action and, at the same time, by asserting a right to state his own and a shorter time for completion, and also to rescind, the vendor was seeking to affirm and disaffirm the same contract, or to assert under the same contract two inconsistent remedies. Counsel sought to say that in like manner in the present case the defendants were seeking at the same time to affirm and disaffirm the same instrument, namely, the winding-up order. But, in my judgment, this is not so.

What are the defendants doing in this case? In one respect it is to be noted that they have, by their counsel, made clear in this court a qualification of the course of conduct which offended the learned judge. According to his judgment it appears that in the court below the defendants claimed to be entitled, even if they succeeded on their present application and could thereby successfully resist any claim by the liquidator to recover sums owing on the alleged account by the defendants, they would nevertheless still be entitled in the winding-up to prove for sums standing to their credit in the same account. It is not surprising that such an assertion was obnoxious to the judge or that he indicated the impossibility of such a position. It is, to my mind, quite clear—and counsel for the defendants has plainly so conceded—that if the defendants should succeed on their present summons and take the benefit as a consequence of having disabled the plaintiff bank from suing to recover their claims, the defendants would indubitably have elected against the winding-up and could not be allowed to prove in the liquidation. But it does not, in my judgment, follow because the defendants have sought unsuccessfully to prove and are now seeking to keep alive, pending the present appeal, their right to appeal against the rejection of their proof, that they cannot in the present proceeding seek to defeat the liquidator's claim in limine by challenging his right to sue. As I have just stated, if the defendants succeed in this application, that will be an end of any claim on their part in any circumstances to enjoy the benefit of the winding-up. If, however, they should fail in their present application, but succeed on the merits of their defence, I can see no ground in principle or in law why they should not then persist in their assertion of a right to be creditors in the liquidation, and to prove accordingly. The substantial case between the parties is one which depends on the proper result, as I understand it, of a complex account between them, each alleging that on a true view of it the balance is in their favour. If the plaintiff bank were not in liquidation, the defendants would, no doubt, add a counterclaim to their defence. But since the plaintiff bank is in liquidation, the only way whereby one who seeks to rank as a creditor can recover is by way of proof. It is admitted that if the defendants had been willing to accept as final the liquidator's rejection of their proof, there could be no objection on the ground under discussion to their present summons. The fact of proving, therefore, cannot constitute the alleged election. If election there has been, it must consist in their seeking to appeal out of time against the rejection, and being parties to the adjournment of such application until after the present hearing. But I cannot see that such a proceeding, merely keeping alive whatever right they may have, when the matter is heard, to appeal against rejection of their proof, can amount to an election sufficient for present purposes, or can constitute or be taken to confer a benefit, the retention of which is inconsistent with their present application. If benefit there be, it is one derived from the rules of the court and not, as it seems to me, from the winding-up order, and brings the case by way of analogy more closely in line with the circumstances in Evans v. Bartlam (3).

In the ordinary case, where one party is seeking to pursue at the same time inconsistent courses of conduct, the other may be seriously embarrassed thereby, for by resisting one he may find himself inferentially conceding the other. There is in the present case plainly no such embarrassment, and I derive some support for my conclusion from the second of the grounds for rejection of proof put forward by the liquidator, namely, that the effect of the Russian Revolutionary Decrees in and after 1918 was to vest in Russian authority any claim against the plaintiff bank which the defendants might have. In my judgment, both parties to the present proceedings have made it plain that they are relying, as I think they are entitled to rely, on all defences they may have against claims on the part of the other. I, therefore, have reached a different conclusion on this matter from that of the learned judge below.

HARMAN, J., however, also expressed the opinion that the winding-up order of EVE, J., could be supported notwithstanding that, as now appears, the steps taken to effect registration of a business in this country by Mr. Czamanski, purporting to act on behalf of the bank, were taken too late, that is, at a time when his principal had ceased to exist. And on this point I agree with the learned judge. Counsel for the defendants accepted—as plainly he had to—the onus of showing, in the first instance, that the ground on which EVE, J., had relied for jurisdiction was unsound. But having so done the onus, according to counsel, then shifted; for, says he, it would be an absurd and impossible task for him to show that at no time since 1866 had the plaintiff bank ever had an English business. However that may be, I think that in a case such as the present, where the order impugned has stood for eighteen years and the rights of many people have been affected in proceedings taken on the assumption of its validity, and where, moreover, there are very substantial assets (there is a large sum of cash now held for the liquidator), numerous persons claiming as creditors and no other means of administering the affairs of the plaintiff bank in England, the court should not be slow to draw the necessary inferences from such facts as are available.

The evidence is, no doubt, somewhat slender. That is natural enough, for it is now 1950 and Mr. Czamanski, who could undoubtedly have given much information, died some time ago. HARMAN, J., said that the evidence before him was not sufficient to satisfy him that the plaintiff bank had ever in fact carried on business in England, but added that he was far from saying that such fact could not have been proved in 1932. In my judgment, and having regard to the circumstances to which I have just alluded, the necessary inference—and I am assuming that it is necessary—can and should be drawn. The evidence, in addition to the facts of the existence of assets and creditors, consists of an affidavit of this same Mr. Czamanski sworn in February, 1932. The affidavit was not sworn in the winding-up proceedings, and it was directed to a purpose wholly unconnected with the present question. The deponent's signature has, however, been identified in these proceedings and the affidavit has, pursuant to the Evidence Act, 1938, or otherwise, been accepted as admissible. Paragraphs 2 and 3 are as follows:

“(2) Prior to the revolution in Russia in 1917 I was for many years associated with the banking industry in that country, and in the year 1912 I was offered and accepted a post with the above named defendant company. The post involved my having charge of what was known as the goods section of the bank. This was the department that dealt with the financing of the bank's customers' purchases of goods from foreign countries, and some very large transactions were entered into in this connection particularly with regard to the purchases of cotton through English merchants. This necessitated my visiting England on behalf of the bank on various occasions to conduct negotiations with firms dealing in cotton in London, Liverpool and elsewhere. In the year 1916 I was elected by a general meeting of shareholders one of the five members of the board of the Moscow Merchants Bank. The bank was incorporated under the laws of the old Russian Empire, and it had a very large business. Its head office was at Ilkina, Moscow. It had branches in Petrograd, Kieff, Kharkoff, Rostov-on-Don and Kokand. Prior to the revolution it had no branches outside Russia, and conducted its business with various foreign countries through various agents. (3) After the revolution took place in Russia the whole of the bank's assets in Russia were seized by the Soviet authorities, and it was impossible to continue to carry on business there. I and my fellow directors had to escape from Russia as best we could. I succeeded in reaching England in November, 1918, and on doing so considered what steps I could take to preserve the assets of the defendant bank in the interests of its creditors and shareholders. In consequence of my being acquainted with a number of influential English firms as a result of the business conducted by me, as set out in para. 2 of this my affidavit, I thought the best method to adopt would be to start a branch of the bank in England. At that time, I, in common with many other people, thought that the disturbances in Russia were only of a temporary character, and that ultimately the old state of affairs would be restored. It was, of course, within my knowledge that the Midland Bank had in London a very substantial amount standing to the credit of the defendant bank. I was advised by English solicitors, who were then acting for me, Messrs. Roney & Co., of New Broad Street, London, to effect the registration of the defendant company as a company carrying on business in England. I understand that the necessary steps were taken by them and that the registration was, in fact, effected. The address registered was 38, Lime Street in the city of London where it was my intention to carry on the business of the bank."

In my judgment, the proper inference from para. 2 is that from 1912 onwards Mr. Czamanski was doing business, in the ordinary acceptation of that phrase, on behalf of his principal, the plaintiff bank, in England with persons resident here, and although there is no evidence on the point one way or the other it seems to me impossible to resist the conclusion that in some degree the assets now available and the creditors now claiming to participate in the winding-up should be attributed to this business conducted in England. I cannot attach to the fact that (as stated by him) Mr. Czamanski's "business" is described as "conducting negotiations with English firms" or to the statement that, prior to the revolution, the plaintiff bank conducted its business with foreign countries "through" as distinct from "by" various agents, the significance, as counsel for the defendants would have me do, that the plaintiff bank had not itself and directly any "business" in England at all. It seems to me that the references in para. 3 to the steps taken by Mr. Czamanski "to preserve the assets" of the plaintiff bank and to his acquaintance with influential English firms "as a result of the business conducted by me" point strongly in the other direction, and go far to show that the use Mr. Czamanski sought to make (futile as it now turns out) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 274, was with a view to maintaining and "preserving," until (as he thought) better days should come, a goodwill and business connection belonging to the plaintiff bank which already existed. It is true that there is no evidence of the establishment, prior to 1918, of anything in the nature of a "branch" or any specific or regular "place" of business in this country. But, if I am right in concluding that Mr. Czamanski on the occasion of his visits to this country did in fact transact the business of the plaintiff bank, then he must have done so at or from some "place." In circumstances not dissimilar, COHEN, J., held in the Rabenek case (Re Tovarishestvo Manufactur Liudvig-Rabenek (5)), that, assuming a specific or identifiable "place" of business was requisite, the Midland Hotel, Manchester (where the Rabenek company's agents stayed when visiting England on their principal's business) sufficiently answered the description: and counsel for the defendants did not challenge the correctness of COHEN, J.'s decision. Mr. Czamanski may have varied his patronage; but whether or not he did, there must, in my opinion, have been a "place" or "places" of business in this country as a matter of principle no less satisfactory than was the Midland Hotel, Manchester, in the Rabenek case (5).

I, therefore, am of opinion that, if proof of the conduct of business in England by the plaintiff bank is a condition necessary to the existence of jurisdiction in the English courts to wind-up the plaintiff bank, that condition is, on the evidence, satisfied. I agree, however, with HARMAN, J., that in the case of a foreign corporation (such as the plaintiff bank) which has, ex hypothesi, been dissolved and extinguished in the country where it was established, it is not necessary, as a statutory condition of jurisdiction in the English courts to wind it up, to prove that it had, prior to its dissolution, established at some place in England a branch or other business and that such business had ceased.

The winding-up order made in the present case was made (as already stated) in pursuance—or purported pursuance—of sub-s. (1) (d) (i) and not under sub-s. (2) of s. 338 of the Act of 1929 (now respectively ss. 399 (5) (a) and 400 of the Act of 1948): and so far as I am aware all winding-up orders in like cases have been similarly made. It will be convenient to deal first with the scope of, and jurisdiction conferred by, sub-s. (1) (d) (i) without regard to the effect on the construction of the section of sub-s. (2) which, having been first enacted as s. 91 of the Companies Act, 1928, was introduced by the consolidating Act of 1929 into our winding-up legislation. Section 338 (1) of the Act of 1929 provided:

"(d) The circumstances in which an unregistered company may be wound-up are as follows:—(i) If the company is dissolved, or has ceased to carry on business, or is carrying on business only for the purpose of winding-up its affairs . . ."

This form of words is substantially identical with that which has consistently appeared in all the relevant legislation since the Act of 1848 (11 and 12 Vict., c. 45). As a matter of language it is plain that the three conditions named are independent and not cumulative. Assuming, therefore, in the case of a foreign corporation, which has by its local law been extinguished, that it is covered by the words "is dissolved"—which words must, as it is conceded, be taken to mean "has been dissolved"—it would appear from the language used that no other condition has to be fulfilled in order to confer on the English court jurisdiction to wind it up.

As a matter of general principle, our courts would not assume, and Parliament should not be taken to have intended to confer, jurisdiction over matters which naturally and properly lie within the competence of the courts of other countries. There must be assets here to administer and persons subject, or at least submitting, to the jurisdiction who are concerned or interested in the proper distribution of the assets. And when these conditions are present the exercise of the jurisdiction remains discretionary. Prima facie, if the local law of the dissolved foreign corporation provided for the due administration of all the property and assets of the corporation wherever situate among the persons properly entitled to participate therein, the case would not be one for interference by the machinery of the English courts. In the present case; there are substantial assets standing in the name of the plaintiff bank or its liquidator, and there are persons within the jurisdiction having claims to participate in the distribution of those assets. At the same time, by reason of the total extinction

A in Russia of the plaintiff bank and the absence of any machinery under Russian law for the due distribution of the assets among the persons regarded as properly having claims on them, the result is that, unless the machinery of winding-up under the Companies Act is available, no means of any kind exist for the administration of the English assets. The existence of assets here, the presence here of persons claiming as creditors of the plaintiff bank or said to be indebted to it, seem to constitute at least the indicia of a business in some sense formerly conducted here. Where, therefore, the circumstances exist which, on the general principle above referred to, would make the case appropriate for the exercise by our court of its winding-up jurisdiction, it would appear that the question whether the foreign corporation carried on business in this country would generally be academic unless it is also necessary to show that such business was carried on directly and from some established, or specified, place or places in this country.

B The question was considered by COHEN, J., in the Rabenek case (5). In that case, it was not disputed that the dissolved Russian company had formerly carried on business in England; but it was argued for the Crown (who appeared on the petition) that it was necessary to show, in order to found jurisdiction to wind-up the company, that the company had had an office or other established place of business in this country. The learned judge, in my opinion rightly, rejected that argument. But the learned judge was also of opinion that the dissolved foreign or unregistered corporation must have had a "place" of business in this country of some kind. The learned judge said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 560):

D " . . . the provisions of s. 338 (1) in my opinion make it clear that an unregistered company cannot be wound-up under Part X of the Act unless it has a place, not an established place, of business in Great Britain, for unless it has such a place of business, no question can arise as to whether the place of business in England or the place of business in Scotland is the principal place of business."

E In the case before him the learned judge was able to surmount the difficulties in the petitioner's way by arriving at the somewhat artificial conclusion that the Midland Hotel, Manchester (where the company's agents were proved to have stayed when visiting England and transacting business) must be treated as having been the company's "place" of business in England, and I have already given my reasons for thinking that, if this requirement must be satisfied in the present case, then, since Mr. Czamanski has stated that he visited England from time to time on the business of the plaintiff bank and must, on such occasions, have stayed somewhere in England, it is sufficient that the place or places (though unspecified) where he stayed constituted the plaintiff bank's place or places of business in England. But, in my judgment, it is not necessary, F in order to found jurisdiction, to prove that the dissolved foreign corporation had any specified or identifiable "place" or "places" of business in England. G It is true that in paras. (a) and (b) of s. 338 (1) reference is made to the consequences which follow "if it has a principle place of business" in England or Scotland or both. But it does not, in my judgment, follow that the courts in England (or Scotland) have no jurisdiction to wind-up a dissolved foreign corporation if it is not shown to have had a principal or any place of business H in either.

In the Rabenek case (5), COHEN, J., referred to Re Lloyd Generale Italiano (6), and quoted at length the judgment in that case of PEARSON, J. That judgment, and more particularly this sentence in it (29 Ch.D. 220):

"I am decidedly of opinion that the Act is confined to English companies, and foreign companies carrying on business in England with, so to speak, a residence of their own—a branch office—in this country," has constituted the authority for the view expressed by the textbook writers, that the existence of such a "residence" was necessary to found the jurisdiction of our courts to wind-up a dissolved foreign corporation. Thus it is, for example, stated in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS, 7th ed. (1897), edited by the author, at p. 466, that:

"... there is no jurisdiction to wind-up a company established in a foreign jurisdiction which has no office or branch in this country but which carries on business here by means of agents."

And (to take a modern example) in PALMER'S COMPANY LAW, 15th ed. (1933), edited by JUDGE TOPHAM and A. M. R. TOPHAM, at p. 473, occurs the sentence:

"Before 1929 a company which had been carrying on business in England through an agent but without any branch in this country, could not be wound-up in England, though it was being wound-up abroad."

In both cases the sole authority for the view expressed is Re Lloyd Generale Italiano (6). As observed by COHEN, J., not only in the case cited had there been no place of business of any kind in England, but there were no assets in England—nothing which the English court could in any case administer. In my judgment, Re Lloyd Generale Italiano (6) ought not to be regarded as an authority for the view that proof of the existence of a "place" of business in England, whether established or otherwise, is a condition to the existence of jurisdiction in the English court to wind-up a dissolved foreign corporation.

I have so far discussed the matter by reference only to sub-s. (1) of s. 338 and without regard to sub-s. (2). The latter sub-section provides:

"Where a company incorporated outside Great Britain which has been carrying on business in Great Britain ceases to carry on business in Great Britain, it may be wound-up as an unregistered company under this Part of this Act, notwithstanding that it has been dissolved or otherwise ceased to exist as a company under or by virtue of the laws of the country under which it was incorporated."

There can be no doubt, having regard to the history of the sub-section, that it was enacted with particular reference to the problems which arose as a result of the Russian revolutionary legislation affecting Russian corporations. And, if the matter were free from authority, there would, as it seems to me, be much to be said for the argument that, sub-s. (2) having been introduced into the section, that sub-section and sub-s. (1) must be read and construed together, with the result that, notwithstanding the wide and general terms of sub-s. (1) (d) (i), all cases (and particularly the Russian cases) falling within the terms of sub-s. (2) must be treated as governed exclusively by that sub-section, and subject, therefore, to the limitation (whatever might be its effect) of the phrase "which has been carrying on business in Great Britain, etc." When Re Russian and English Bank (7) came before BENNETT, J., that learned judge was of opinion that the words "ceases to carry on business in Great Britain" must be strictly construed to refer only to the future. He held, therefore, that the sub-section could have no application to a case where the Russian company concerned had long since ceased to carry on such business, and, treating the sub-section as not intended to alter the existing law, made a winding-up order under sub-s. (1) (d) (i), a precedent which appears, as I have said, to have since been consistently followed. The latter part of BENNETT, J.'s conclusion (though not the former) was accepted by COHEN, J., in the Rabenek case (5), and has also received support in the House of Lords in Russian and English Bank and Florance Montefiore Guedalla v. Baring Bros. & Co., Ltd. (8) in which it was decided that where a winding-up order has been made in regard to a dissolved Russian corporation, and the necessary leave has been obtained (as in the present case) from the registrar in companies winding-up, the liquidator can bring an action in the name of the foreign corporation notwithstanding that it is a mere nominis umbra, and has altogether ceased as an entity to exist.

Before referring to the speeches in the Baring Bros. case (8), I would observe that the construction placed on sub-s. (2) by BENNETT, J., seems to involve the notion that a foreign corporation which has been "dissolved or otherwise ceased to exist as a company" may still be regarded as carrying on business in this country. And, as JENKINS, L.J., stated during the course of the argument, A having regard to the uncertainty which existed in 1928 and 1929 as regards the effect of the Russian revolutionary decrees, it may not be irrational to suppose that Parliament was intending to provide that for the purposes of winding-up jurisdiction, steps taken to establish and register businesses in this country in the names of Russian corporations should not be treated as ineffective on the ground merely that such corporation and the authority purported to be B exercised on their behalf had already ceased to exist. On that view of the sub-section, the winding-up order of EVE, J., in 1932 could not be impeached on the ground that Mr. Czamanski in 1920 had, as now appears, no authority to do what he then did. It is, in my judgment, unnecessary to pursue these matters further.

I turn first to the speech in the Baring Bros. case (8) of LORD BLANESBURGH. C After referring to the view of BENNETT, J., of the meaning to be attributed to the phrase in s. 338 (2) of the Companies Act, 1929, "ceases to carry on business in Great Britain" LORD BLANESBURGH said ([1936] 1 All E.R. 510):

"My Lords, I am not prepared, as at present advised, to take so strict a view of the sub-section. I can see no reason, in principle, for a line of demarcation so arbitrary: nor am I forgetful, although its effectiveness was D thereby held in reserve, that the sub-section had appeared in the Act of 1928. It must also be remembered in relation to a measure of pure consolidation like the Act of 1929, that normally the date of its commencement is, subject, of course, to any unambiguous direction in any particular instance, the most irrelevant of dates for any effective purpose."

E From LORD ATKIN's speech, I venture to quote at greater length. Referring to the Russian revolutionary legislation he said (ibid., 515):

"The material date is said to be some time in the year 1918. The resulting position was embarrassing. There were what appeared to be assets in this country, some doubtless acquired during the period of trading by the nonentity: there were creditors of the pre-dissolution and post-dissolution period. The obvious course was to wind-up the companies, F if that could be done. By the Companies Act, 1862, s. 199, there was power to wind-up unregistered companies 'whenever the company is dissolved or has ceased to carry on business or is carrying on business only for the purpose of winding up its affairs.' Under this provision it was accepted law that the courts could order a winding-up of a company G incorporated abroad which had carried on business in this country. But there had been no decision as to the power to wind-up an incorporated company which had in fact been dissolved though there may have been a very occasional order made in such cases without any direct notice of the point. It was in these circumstances, and I have no doubt with direct reference to the difficulties as to the Russian banks disclosed by the litigation to which I have referred, that the legislature in the Companies Act, H 1928, an amending Act, s. 91, provided: 'where a company incorporated outside Great Britain which has been carrying on business in Great Britain ceases to carry on business in Great Britain it may be wound-up as an unregistered company . . . notwithstanding that it has been dissolved or otherwise ceased to exist as a company under or by virtue of the laws of the country under which it was incorporated.' The section is now found in the Companies Act, 1929, the consolidation Act, in Part X, entitled

'Winding-up of unregistered companies' as sub-s. (2) of s. 338. Section 338 (1) enacts: 'Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, any unregistered company may be wound-up under this Act, and all the provisions of this Act with respect to winding-up shall apply to an unregistered company.' . . . Sub-section (1) (d), repeating the provisions of the Act of 1862, s. 199, and the similar s. 268 of the Act of 1908, provides: '(d) the circumstances in which an unregistered company may be wound up are as follows:—(i) if the company is dissolved, or has ceased to carry on business, or is carrying on business only for the purpose of winding-up its affairs'. I for myself come to the conclusion that s. 91 of the Act of 1928 was introduced as s. 338 (2) into the Act of 1929 for the removing of doubts and to make it clear that the words 'if the company is dissolved' were meant to apply to an incorporated company dissolved according to the law of its constitution, and not intended to give a new enabling power only applicable to a company which should cease to carry on business after the passing of the Act. Such a construction would in fact in reference to the Russian banks have defeated the immediate object of the legislature."

As regards the "doubts" which LORD ATKIN thought were intended to be removed by what became sub-s. (2) of s. 338 of the Act of 1929, it is to be remembered that the word "dissolved", which, as I have already observed, has consistently appeared in all our legislation for the winding-up of companies since 1848, took its rise from the old partnership conception, and might, therefore, reasonably be taken to refer to the step or process of dissolution as understood in partnership affairs as distinct from the final extinction of the corporate entity. I refer finally to the speech of LORD MACMILLAN in the Baring Bros. case (8) (ibid., 525):

"Now the purpose of pronouncing a winding-up order is to secure the collection and distribution of the assets of the company to which it relates. The logical inquirer may ask how a company which has ceased to exist can have any assets. But when the legislature authorized the making of a winding-up order in the case of a dissolved company, it must be presumed to have intended such order to be effective and to result in the collection and distribution of assets. To hold that the legislature has authorised the collection of the assets of a dissolved company, but has withheld the power of recovering these assets, would be to attribute a singular ineptitude to Parliament."

In the light of the judicial pronouncements to which I have referred in the House of Lords, and also by COHEN, J., and BENNETT, J., Parliament re-enacted in ss. 399 and 400 of the Companies Act, 1948, the exact language of sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 338 of the Act of 1929. It follows, in my judgment, that sub-s. (2) of s. 338 must be regarded as expository only, and as not having been intended to give jurisdiction to wind-up dissolved foreign corporations (such as the plaintiff bank) subject to special limiting conditions not applicable to the more general jurisdiction conferred by sub-s. (1); and that by the opening words in sub-s. (2) "where a company incorporated outside Great Britain which has been carrying on a business in Great Britain" and so on is intended (subject to the suggestion of JENKINS, L.J.), no more than a reference to the fact that some commercial subject-matter on which a winding-up order can operate is a natural and necessary requisite for the exercise of winding-up jurisdiction.

In my judgment, therefore, the language of sub-s. (2) does not qualify the conclusion which I have reached on sub-s. (1). I think that in circumstances such as exist in the present case it is unnecessary as a foundation for a winding-up order to prove that the plaintiff bank had any branch or office in England or carried on its business operations in England from some established or specific or identifiable place of business, and that EVE, J., had jurisdiction to make the order which he did make in May, 1932, apart from the matter on which he expressly relied. It follows from the Baring Bros. case (8)—and it is not disputed—that the present liquidator was entitled to institute the action in the name of the plaintiff bank, and that the defendants' application fails.

A I refer in conclusion to one other matter. On the hearing in 1932 of the winding-up petition by EVE, J., the Crown was represented as interested in bona vacantia. I asked during the hearing of the appeal whether the Crown desired again to be represented. Counsel for the plaintiff bank read to us a letter from the Treasury Solicitor stating that the Crown did not desire to appear separately, but was content that the matter should be argued by counsel for the liquidator. For the reasons I have given, I think the appeal should be dismissed.

B SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls and I do not wish to add anything.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree and have not anything to add.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Food and Drugs—Selling to the prejudice of the purchaser—Information—Validity—Charge of selling milk “not of the nature, substance, and quality” of the article demanded—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 3 (1).

F The first respondent was summoned under s. 3 (1) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, for selling “a certain article of food, namely milk, which was not of the nature, substance and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser.” Under s. 38 (1) of the Act the first respondent laid an information against the second respondents who had supplied him with the milk. It was proved that water had been added to the milk, but the justices were of opinion that there was a reasonable doubt who had added the water and acquitted both respondents.

G HELD: although the justices found that the first respondent had not added water to the milk he was not entitled to be acquitted under s. 83 (1) unless he proved that the contravention of the Act charged was due to the act or default of the second respondents or their servant, and also that he (the first respondent) had used due diligence to secure compliance with the provisions of the Act, and, if he failed to do this, he must be convicted of an offence under s. 3 (1).

(1) Bastin v. Davies, [1950] 1 All E.R. 1095; 114 J.P. 302.

CASE STATED by Lancashire justices.

On Mar. 15, 1950, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Warrington, an information was referred by the appellant, a sampling officer, against the first respondent, David Ray, that he did through his servant and agent unlawfully sell to the prejudice of the appellant a certain article of food, namely, milk, which was not of the nature, substance and quality demanded by the purchaser, contrary to s. 3 (1) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938. Availing himself of the defence provided by s. 83 (1) of the Act the first respondent laid an information against the second respondents, Percy L. Rigby & Sons, Ltd., the suppliers of the milk, alleging that the contravention of the Act was due to the act or default of them or their servants. At the hearing it was proved that the sample contained added water and that the milk had not been interfered with while it was in the possession of the first respondent. The second respondents called evidence to show that water could not have got into the milk at their factory, but that a lorry driver had loaded the milk in cans which were not locked on a lorry which he had left unattended in the open near his home all night, and had delivered the milk to the first respondent on the following morning. For the appellant it was contended that, as the milk contained extraneous water, one of the respondents must be held responsible under the Act. For the first respondent it was contended that the extraneous water could not have got in the milk while in his possession, that the contravention was due to the act or default of the second respondents, and that he had used all due diligence to secure compliance with the provisions of the Act. The justices, being of the opinion that there was a reasonable doubt as to who was responsible for the presence in the milk of the extraneous water, dismissed both informations.

Cantley for the appellant.

Stenham for the first respondent.

The second respondents did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The first respondent was summoned for an offence under s. 3 (1) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, and he availed himself of the provisions of s. 83 (1) of the Act and laid an information against the second respondents, alleging that they were the persons responsible for the contravention in respect of which he was summoned. That sub-section provides:

"A person against whom proceedings are brought under this Act shall, upon information duly laid by him and on giving to the prosecution not less than three clear days' notice of his intention, be entitled to have any person to whose act or default he alleges that the contravention of the provisions in question was due brought before the court in the proceedings, and, if, after the contravention has been proved, the original defendant proves that the contravention was due to the act or default of that other person, that other person may be convicted of the offence, and, if the original defendant further proves that he has used all due diligence to secure that the provisions in question were complied with, he shall be acquitted of the offence."

So, two people can be convicted—the original defendant, if he has not used all due diligence, and the person guilty of the actual contravention—or the original defendant can escape conviction and (if the original defendant has used all due diligence) the person who is responsible for the contravention alone can be convicted.

The justices in the present case found that the first respondent did not add the water, but I do not know whether they appreciated that, unless he could prove that the second respondents were guilty of the contravention, he must be convicted, because he did, in fact, sell an article to the prejudice of the purchaser. It may be that the justices thought that they had to find either that the first respondent or that the second respondents had added water by one of their servants. That, however, is not what the Act provides. Even if the justices
A did not think that the first respondent added water, he had no defence under s. 83 (1) to this prosecution unless he could also show, not only that he acted with all due diligence, but that the second respondents had committed the offence. I think, therefore, this case must go back to the justices with the direction that, if they cannot find that the first respondent has proved that the contravention was due to the act or default of the second respondents or their servant, they
B must convict the first respondent. If they find that he has satisfied them that the contravention was due to the act or default of the second respondents or their servant and that he (the first respondent) used all due diligence to secure that the provisions of the Act were complied with, they should convict the second respondents and not the first respondent. The costs of this Special Case ought to depend on the result. Whoever is ultimately convicted should pay the costs of
C this appeal.

There is another thing I must say about this case. It has for many years been common form to lay informations under the Food and Drugs Acts as they were laid in this case, i.e., to charge "unlawfully selling to the prejudice of the purchaser a certain article of food which was not of the nature, substance and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser." Section 3 (1) is in these words:

D "If a person sells to the prejudice of the purchaser any food or drug which is not of the nature, or not of the substance, or not of the quality, of the food or drug demanded by the purchaser . . ."

he shall be guilty of an offence. He may be guilty of an offence if he sells something which offends against the statute in any one of three different respects or E in all of those respects, but, as we pointed out in Bastin v. Davies (1), there are three separate offences, and the defendant is entitled to know in which respect he is said to have offended against the section—whether the article sold is alleged to have been not of the nature, or not of the substance, or not of the quality, demanded. In Bastin v. Davies (1) an information was preferred against the respondent charging him with having sold "to the prejudice of the purchaser . . .
F a certain article of food . . . which was not of the nature or not of the substance or not of the quality demanded . . ." We held that the information disclosed more than one offence, and, therefore, was bad as being contrary to s. 10 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848. I think the same objection applies if the word "and" is used instead of the word "or," because the section does not say "which is not of the nature, and not of the substance, and not of the quality." It says: "not of the nature, or not of the substance, or not of the quality."
G In future clerks to magistrates, sampling officers, and inspectors should know that they must state in which respect it is alleged that the offence has been committed. If they are in doubt, they can lay more than one information. As that point is not taken to-day, we do not give a formal ruling on it. I merely state that for the guidance and information of these inspectors and clerks to H magistrates.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Byrne, JJ.), July 19, 1950.]

Street Traffic—Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Validity of policy—Policy covering facts constituting offence against Road Traffic Acts—Use of tractor with two trailers covered—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 18 (1), s. 35 (1).

An insurance policy indemnified the appellant "against liability at law for compensation and claimant's costs and expenses in respect of (1) death of or bodily injury to any person caused by or arising out of the use of" his tractor, and it was expressly declared to be operative while the tractor was drawing two trailers. The tractor was on a highway drawing two trailers which were both laden, in contravention of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 18 (1). The owner was convicted under s. 35 (1) of the Act for using the vehicle on a highway without there being in force in relation to its user such an insurance policy or security against third party risks as complied with Part II of the Act, on the ground that the indemnity contained in the policy was against the consequences of an illegal act, and was, therefore, void as being against public policy.

HELD: the policy was valid because it insured the appellant, not against the consequences of the illegal user of the tractor, but against the consequences of its being negligently driven.

CASE STATED by Lincoln (Parts of Holland) justices.

The respondent, an inspector of police, preferred an information against the appellant, a farmer, charging him with having, on Feb. 15, 1950, at Fishtoft in the Parts of Holland, unlawfully used a motor tractor on a road, there not being in force in relation to the user of the vehicle a policy of insurance or such a security in respect of third party risks as complied with the requirements of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, contrary to s. 35 (1) of that Act. The information was heard by a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Boston on Mar. 15 and 29, 1950. It appeared that the insurance policy held by the appellant permitted two loaded trailers to be attached to the vehicle, but it was contended by the respondent that, as the appellant was using his tractor in an illegal manner by towing two loaded trailers on the highway in contravention of s. 18 (1) (b) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, he was not covered in respect of such user by his insurance policy, since an indemnity against the consequences of an illegal act was void as being contrary to public policy. For the appellant it was contended that he was covered by the policy when two loaded trailers were attached to the tractor, that a third party suffering injury while the tractor was being so used would have been entitled to recover damages from the insurers under the Road Traffic Act, 1934, s. 10 (1), and that an indemnity against the consequences of an unlawful user of the tractor was not contrary to public policy because it was the intention of the Road Traffic Acts that insurance cover should be provided in respect of all third party risks arising out of the use of vehicles on highways. The justices found the offence proved and imposed a fine of £3. The appellant appealed.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Lincoln (Parts of Holland) who convicted the appellant of driving a motor vehicle without a policy against third party risks being in force in respect of that vehicle. In the opinion of the court, the justices were wrong, but I hope they will not think it is any reflection upon them when I say that. All courts go wrong at times. In many cases arising under s. 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, justices are faced with questions of insurance law, and some ingenious advocate takes a point which is often well calculated to confuse justices who are not trained lawyers. Points which might properly be discussed in the commercial court are discussed in a court of summary jurisdiction, and justices are asked to decide questions of first importance in insurance law.

An ordinary policy of insurance was issued to the appellant in respect of his tractor, insuring him, as the Act requires, against the consequences of the negligent driving of the tractor. So far as a third person was concerned, the insurers under the policy undertook to indemnify the appellant “against liability at law for compensation and claimant’s costs and expenses in respect of (1) death of or bodily injury to any person caused by or arising out of the use of any vehicle described in the schedule hereto (including the loading and/or unloading of such vehicle).”

There was an endorsement on the policy which enabled the tractor to be used with two trailers.

It is an offence against the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 18 (1), for a trailer to draw two laden trailers. When this vehicle was being driven on the road and was stopped by the police it was drawing two trailers and they were both laden. The policy says nothing about laden trailers. It simply allows the vehicle to be used with two trailers, and, whatever else this policy does, it certainly does not insure the appellant against the consequences of using the tractor in that manner. If the policy had insured him against using the tractor illegally, to that extent it would have been ineffective, but I am far from saying that such a term would have vitiated the whole policy. There may be more than one insurance contained in a policy, and if it were possible to imagine an insurance company insuring a person against the consequences of a breach of the Road Traffic Acts—which has nothing to do with injury to third persons—I daresay that that part of the policy would be void. This, however, is an insurance against the consequences that may arise owing to the negligent driving of the vehicle, because a third party can only claim if there has been negligent driving. If there has been negligent driving, it matters not whether there were two trailers behind the tractor or whether there were no trailers behind it. If a tractor is driven negligently, an injured person has a right to compensation, and under this policy the insurance company promise to indemnify the appellant. This is nothing more than a policy which insures the appellant against the consequences of negligent driving. There is nothing illegal in that, and, in my opinion, this conviction should be quashed.

LONDON GENERAL CAB CO., LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 12, 13, 1950.]

Profits Tax—Exemption—Statutory undertaker—“Authorised person” limited by enactment as regards charge for service—Carriage of passengers by road—Taxi-cab proprietors—Cabs licensed under statute—Maximum fares prescribed—Relationship between driver and company that of bailee and bailor of cab—Finance Act, 1937 (c. 54), s. 19 (5).

The Finance Act, 1937, s. 19 (1), as amended by the Finance Act, 1946, s. 44, provides for the imposition of profits tax on the trading profits of all trades and businesses of any description carried on in the United Kingdom. Sub-section (5) of s. 19 exempts from the tax, inter alia, the profits of a trade or business carried on by statutory undertakers and consisting wholly or mainly in the rendering of any of the various services therein set out, including the carriage of passengers by road, the expression “statutory undertakers” being defined as meaning “any local or public authority authorised by or by virtue of any enactment to render any of the services aforesaid . . . and any other person so authorised who is precluded by or by virtue of any enactment from charging any higher price for those services than that authorised by or by virtue of the enactment . . .”

The taxpayers, a company who carried on the business of taxi-cab proprietors, owned a fleet of some four hundred cabs which were licensed to ply for hire by the Commissioner of Police under s. 6 of the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act, 1869, and the London Cab Order, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 1346), and the maximum fares which could be charged were thereby prescribed. The cabs were driven by licensed drivers who were not engaged under any contract of employment, but drove the cabs under an arrangement whereby they paid to the taxpayers a proportion of the money received by them as fares from passengers. The taxpayers bore the expenses of supplying, maintaining, insuring and running the taxi-cabs, and they also prescribed the hours of work of the drivers and had power to prescribe the district in which they were to work. It was admitted that for certain purposes the relationship between the taxpayers and the drivers was that of bailors and bailees. The taxpayers claimed that they, being the owners of registered and licensed vehicles, the fares of which were authorised by an enactment, were statutory undertakers in the trade or business of rendering the service of carriage of passengers by road, and that, as such undertakers, they were exempt from profits tax.

HELD: it being admitted that for certain purposes the relationship between the taxpayers and the drivers was that of bailor and bailee, if the service of carriage of passengers by road was being rendered at all, it was the drivers, and not the taxpayers who rendered it; but, even assuming that the taxpayers were rendering the service, they were not statutory undertakers within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1937, s. 19 (5), since the “authorisation” under s. 6 of the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act, 1869, and the London Cab Order, 1934, was not the kind of authorisation envisaged by s. 19 (5).

CASE STATED by General Commissioners of Income Tax under the Finance Act, 1937, sched. V, Part II, para. 4, and the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149.

The taxpayers, the London General Cab Co., Ltd., appealed against an assessment to profits tax for the chargeable accounting period ending Dec. 31, 1947, in an estimated sum on which the profits tax payable was £8,000. The taxpayers contended that, since their business consisted wholly or mainly in the rendering of the service of the carriage of passengers, they were "statutory undertakers" within the meaning of s. 19 (5) (i) of the Finance Act, 1937, and the profits from their business were, therefore, not chargeable to profits tax. The general commissioners, on the facts found by them, and on the taxpayers' admission that for certain purposes the relationship between them and their licensed drivers was that of bailors and bailees of the taxi-cabs, were of opinion that the case was governed by Smith v. General Motor Cab Co., Ltd. (1) (a case in which the House of Lords refused to set aside a finding of fact of the county court judge that the relationship between the owners of taxi-cabs, which they let out to licensed drivers, and one of their drivers was that of bailors and bailee of the taxi-cab). Accordingly, the commissioners took the view that the taxpayers did not themselves render the service of carrying passengers and they confirmed the assessment. The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

Cyril King, K.C., and Tribe for the taxpayers.

C. N. Shawcross, K.C., and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

VAISEY, J.: The taxpayers are the London General Cab Co., Ltd., who were assessed to profits tax for the chargeable period ending on Dec. 31, 1947, in a sum on which the tax payable amounted to some £8,000. The substantial point which arises is as to the construction and effect, regard being had to the circumstances of this particular case, of s. 19 (5) of the Finance Act, 1937. The taxpayers appealed to general commissioners against that assessment, and their appeal was dismissed and the assessment confirmed.

The facts are all agreed, and are set out in the Case. The taxpayers were incorporated as a company in 1928, when they took over the undertaking of another company. The objects for which the company was incorporated were stated in a comprehensive and wide form in its memorandum. They included the carrying on of the business of taxi-cab, omnibus, cab, fly and other public or private conveyance and garage proprietors, and the carrying on within the city and county of London and elsewhere of the business of running motor and taxi-cabs of all kinds, the transport of passengers and goods, and so forth. At all material times the business which the taxpayers carried on is found in the Case to have been the business of taxi-cab proprietors and not any other business, and it is found that their taxi-cabs ply for hire in various parts of the metropolitan police area. The profits of the company appear to be derived, with the exception of a comparatively small amount which it receives for advertisements, from the moneys which are paid to it by the drivers of its taxi-cabs in respect of the fares received by them from the public, who are also, by a somewhat curious use of language, themselves described as the "fares." If a driver has a bad day and takes up no passengers, the company gets nothing so far as regards the taxi-cab driven by that driver, and it, therefore, depends on the success of each driver in his plying for hire whether the company makes a profit from its business. All the taxi-cabs belonging to the taxpayers are licensed by the Commissioner of Police under the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act, 1869, s. 6, and under the provisions of the London Cab Order, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 1346). The applications for those licences are made by the taxpayers to the Commissioner of Police, and specimen forms of such applications, and of the licence itself, form part of the Case. A

The taxpayers own some 400 taxi-cabs, and they employ, or use—the word in the Case is not “employ” but “use”—some six hundred taxi-cab drivers and a number of employees, such as mechanics and clerical staff. There appear to be no written agreements between the taxpayers and their drivers, but the terms which subsist between them may be briefly summarised in this way. The taxpayers bear the expense of the cab, pay for it, keep it in repair, insure it and maintain it, and pay for its garaging. They also provide the taximeter, and fix the hours of work in the case of each driver who takes out one of the cabs. Each driver must have a cab driver's licence under s. 8 of the Act of 1869. The driver usually takes the same cab every day, and there is the further provision that the taxpayers can prescribe the territory in which the driver is to work, although in practice the driver can choose his own “pitch.” The division of the takings between the taxpayers and the driver appear to be, or was at the time at which the point arose, two-thirds to the taxpayers and one-third to the driver, and the driver retained any tips and extra charges, such as charges for luggage and passengers beyond two. For the purpose of the National Insurance Act, 1946, the drivers are treated as being in the category of persons gainfully occupied under an employment, that is to say, employed under a contract of service, but no one has suggested, and I certainly should be very slow to accept the suggestion, that that is necessarily conclusive of the relationship between the taxpayers, on the one hand, and their drivers, on the other. There is nothing like the wearing of livery by the drivers, or anything of that kind, and, in contrast to the assumed position under the National Insurance Act, 1946, it has been agreed between the parties that the taxpayers have never included their drivers in any return of employees, nor have they ever deducted income tax from the proportion of money retained by the drivers. There is no doubt that, as owners of these taxi-cabs, the taxpayers are under a number of obligations. They are deemed to be the licensees of each taxi-cab. They must keep their taxi-cabs in good order, under the London Cab Order, 1934, art. 14 (j), and they must also produce the driver before a magistrate, in certain circumstances, if required to do so. They are also liable to pay compensation and costs in the case of the misbehaviour of any driver. These facts are said to be admitted and there follows this paragraph: B C D E F

“It was admitted on behalf of the company that for certain purposes the relationship between the company and its drivers was that of bailor and bailee of the cab.” G

Section 19 (1) of the Finance Act, 1937, charged on the profits arising from certain trades or businesses a tax which was originally called the national defence contribution [but was re-named the profits tax by the Finance Act, 1946, s. 44] of an amount of five per cent. of the profits in a case where the trade or business was carried on by a body corporate, and four per cent. of the profits in any other case. That fiscal provision continued, save that, by the Finance Act, 1947, s. 30 and s. 47, as amended by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, s. 7, the rate of profits tax was increased to twenty-five per cent. with respect to any chargeable accounting period falling after the end of the year 1946. Section 19 (1) of the Finance Act, 1937, attaches this charge to the profits arising from any trade or business to which the section applies, and sub-s. (5) of the section specifies certain trades or businesses to which it is not H to apply. The claim which is put forward in the present case is that the business of the taxpayers is within the exceptions provided for in sub-s. (5) which provides:

"This section shall not apply to any trade or business carried on by statutory undertakers and consisting wholly or mainly in the rendering in the United Kingdom . . . of any of the following services, namely:—

(a) the supply of water, gas, electricity or hydraulic power; (b) the provision or maintenance of a canal or other inland waterway, or a harbour, dock, quay, pier, road, bridge, ferry or tunnel; (c) the conservancy of a river; (d) the carriage of goods or passengers by railway, or the carriage of passengers by road, or the carriage of goods by canal or inland navigation."

That sub-section exempts from the provisions of the Act any trade or business carried on by statutory undertakers rendering in the United Kingdom the service of (isolating the material words) the carriage of passengers by road, and the point which I have to decide is whether the business of the taxpayers is a business carried on by them as statutory undertakers for the carriage of passengers by road. In passing, I am bound to say that it is a little surprising to find that a business which consists of the running of taxi-cabs in any form, or of any kind, should be regarded as a business of a statutory undertaker.

Sub-section (5) goes on to define what is meant by "statutory undertakers" as follows:

"(i) The expression 'statutory undertakers' means any local or public authority authorised by or by virtue of any enactment to render any of the services aforesaid in the United Kingdom . . . and any other person so authorised who is precluded by or by virtue of any enactment from charging any higher price for those services than that authorised by or by virtue of the enactment or, in the case of a body corporate, is either so precluded or precluded by or by virtue of any enactment from paying a dividend at any higher rate . . ."

The submissions which were made on behalf of the taxpayers were that the company are "statutory undertakers" within the meaning of sub-s. (5). They emphasised that submission by contending that the trade or business of the company consists, mainly, in the rendering in the United Kingdom of the service of the carriage of passengers by road. Then they submitted that by virtue of the section profits tax is not chargeable on their profits, and that the assessment ought to be discharged. On the other hand, the Crown contends that the company do not render the service of the carriage of passengers by road, but that they merely let out taxi-cabs to individual drivers who are independent contractors; secondly, that the company is not precluded by or by virtue of any enactment from charging more than a specified price for letting the taxi-cabs to the drivers; and, thirdly, that the company are not statutory undertakers within the meaning of the sub-section, and that, accordingly, s. 19 does apply to the taxpayers' trade or business, and that the assessment appealed against was rightly made.

The only reported decision to which the Case refers is Smith v. General Motor Cab Co. Ltd. (1), a decision of the House of Lords, and with regard to that the finding of the commissioners was :

"The commissioners who heard the appeal considered that on the facts agreed and proved as above, viz., paras. 1 to 7, the Case was governed by the decision in Smith v. General Motor Cab Co., Ltd. (1), and confirmed the assessment, subject to the ascertainment of the correct figures."

H

Then the figures were stated to be agreed, and the assessment of £8,000 was reduced to £7,679 2s.; and this appeal is brought by the taxpayers from that decision of the commissioners.

A great deal of discussion has taken place as to the precise relationship which subsists normally and in particular circumstances between the man who owns a taxi-cab, the man who drives the taxi-cab, and the man who is called the "fare" or the hirer of the taxi-cab, and members of the public who may be affected by the use or misuse of the vehicle. Having listened to the authorities I have come to the conclusion that I can adopt, with great respect, the observation of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Gates v. Bill (R.) & Son (2) ([1902] 2 K.B. 41):

"I cannot say that I consider the decisions [i.e., the decisions on the rights of the proprietor, the driver, and the fare] which have been given on this subject altogether satisfactory."

I think that a good deal of ground may still remain to be explored, this being one of those cases in which a quite simple, ordinary, every-day relationship, contractual or quasi-contractual, is found on examination to be, from the legal point of view, of an extremely complicated, and in some respects ambiguous, character. I have formed the conclusion that the authorities are not altogether easy to reconcile, and every case, no doubt, will have to be considered in the light of its own particular circumstances. It may well be that in one case the driver is the agent of the owner, in another case he may be the servant of the owner, and a third case may be one of a simple bailment. I also think that it may be two or more of those classes of association when viewed from different angles, that is to say, the driver may be, for the purpose of the National Insurance Act, 1946, a servant of the owner, and for the purpose of the returns of income tax he may be regarded as an independent contractor. Indeed, I am disposed to think that this very peculiar relationship, in which the owner, the driver, the fare, and the cab itself seem to be described in almost interchangeable terms, is, or may be in certain circumstances, a sort of association which is in some senses, perhaps, sui generis, and that it is very difficult to ascertain in any set terms and as a matter of general principle what the relationship may be. It may be very difficult to predicate that the relationship is for all purposes (whatever it may be for some purposes) within any one of the categories which I have suggested. It is curious that it is not the driver who plies for hire, but the cab. No doubt, the driver may in some contexts and in some circumstances be only another name for the owner, but the position is anomalous, and in some respects very difficult to define.

An interesting case, decided by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in 1856, was Powles v. Hider (3), where a cab plying in the streets of London was hired by Mr. Powles to carry his luggage and the luggage was lost owing to the fault of the driver. On the cab there was the name of Mr. Hider, who was not the driver but the proprietor, and the man who was driving the cab was a licensed driver. Mr. Powles, desiring to get some compensation for the loss of his luggage, sued Mr. Hider on the basis that there had been a contract between them for the carriage of Mr. Powles' luggage, and Mr. Hider denied liability. In that case there was very much the same arrangement, it appears, as between the driver and Hider, the owner of the cab, as the arrangement which exists in the present case. The driver each day paid a sum of money to Hider for the use of the cab and two horses, he deposited his licence with Hider before he took the cab out, in compliance with the Metropolitan Hackney Carriage Acts, and the driver made what he could by the use of the cab and horses. It was held that for that purpose the driver must be taken to be the agent of Hider, with the result that he had authority to make contracts for the employment of the cab on his (Hider's) account, and that the action for the loss of the luggage was rightly brought against the proprietor. That case has been observed on, followed and approved on many occasions, and, no doubt, for the purposes for which the action was brought, it is a case which still has authority.

In Keen v. Henry (4) the headnote reads ([1894] 1 Q.B. 292):

". . . so far as the public is concerned, the registered proprietor of a hackney carriage is responsible for the acts of the driver whilst he is plying for hire, as if the relationship of master and servant existed between them, even though it does not in fact exist."

I mention that to show the strange position which arises in this curious relationship, that for some purposes the relationship may be one thing and for some other purposes it may be something different.

In Smith v. General Motor Cab Co., Ltd. (1), the headnote begins by the statement ([1911] A.C. 188):

"The findings of fact by a county court judge sitting as an arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, cannot be set aside if there was evidence to support the findings. The question whether there was evidence is a question of law."

Then we come to the facts (ibid.):

"The respondents let out a taxi-cab to the appellant, who was injured by an accident while he was driving the cab. Upon an application for compensation under the Act there was evidence that the relation of the respondents to the appellant was that of bailor and bailee of the taxi-cab, and the county court judge found as a fact that that was the true relation and that there was no contract of service."

It was held that the finding could not be set aside, and from the judgment of the county court judge this statement is taken (ibid., 189):

"I should describe the drivers as clients of the company and bailees of the cabs."

LORD ATKINSON, in his opinion, said (ibid., 191):

"The facts relied upon by the respondents were undoubtedly evidence of a bailment of the cab, upon which the county court judge could properly act; those relied upon by the appellant may have been evidence, strong evidence if you will, that the driver was the respondents' servant, but if so, the finding of the county court judge that the appellant was a bailee was a finding on conflicting evidence on an issue of fact. So that the appellant is driven to this position, that he must contend that, had the case been tried before a judge and jury, the judge would have been bound to direct the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff, on whom the burden of proof of service lay, a contention absolutely unsustainable."

When I look at the Case Stated in the present case, I find these two passages which I desire to put side by side. Paragraph 7:

"It was admitted on behalf of the company that for certain purposes the relationship between the company and its drivers was that of bailor and bailee of the cab."

Paragraph 10:

"The commissioners who heard the appeal considered that on the facts agreed and proved as above, viz., paras. 1-7, the case was governed by the decision in Smith v. General Motor Cab Co., Ltd. (1) and confirmed the assessment, subject to the ascertainment of the correct figures."

Looking at that admission, that the relationship between the taxpayers and their drivers was that of bailor and bailee of the cab, coupled with the finding that on the facts agreed this case was governed by Smith v. General Motor Cab Co., Ltd. (1), it seems to me that what the commissioners have really done is this. It being agreed or admitted on behalf of the company that for some purposes the relationship of bailor and bailee subsisted between the owners and the drivers, the only construction which I can give to the finding that the decision in Smith v. General Motor Cab Co., Ltd. (1) governed this case is that the commissioners found that that relationship did subsist for the purpose of deciding the appeal which was before them.

I do not see my way to disturb the finding of the commissioners. It seems to me that they have found, in effect, that the admitted bailment was the material matter for them to take into consideration, that there was not the relationship between the company and its drivers of principal and agent, or master and servant, and that the people who were really carrying on the trade or business, whatever it may be, or however one may describe it, were not the company, but the drivers who were the bailees under the arrangement which the commissioners found existed between the parties.

I do not think that the taxpayers were in fact "rendering a service" within the meaning of s. 19 of the Act. It is true that there was no obligation on them to do anything, but I do not think that that necessarily is material. This was not the rendering of the service of carrying passengers by road in the sense in which one would have expected that expression to be used in conjunction with the preceding headings in the Act, the supply of water, gas or electricity, the provision or maintenance of a canal, the conservancy of a river, or the carriage of goods or passengers by railway. If such a service was being carried on (which I do not decide, and as to which I express no final opinion) I do not think it was being carried on by the taxpayers. If it was being carried on, and if such services were being rendered, they were being rendered by those to whom the cabs were bailed; and further, on the question whether this company are statutory undertakers within the meaning of the section, I think they are a long way off from bringing themselves within the definition contained in the proviso to s. 19. In a sense they were authorised to render the service (assuming that they were rendering a service) by the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act, 1869, and by the London Cab Order, 1934, but just in the same way as many persons who are the subjects of His Majesty are authorised to do things under the provisions of Acts of Parliament, and I do not think that this is the kind of authorisation to which, in its context, that proviso was looking forward. I feel bound to dismiss this appeal with costs.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether on the death of John Sheen Downes, who died on Jan. 25, 1947, (a) the defendant, Marjorie Chernocke Russell, became entitled under the joint effect of the will, dated Dec. 31, 1941, of the said John Sheen Downes and the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 176 (1), or otherwise, to two undivided third shares in certain trust funds (being the proceeds of sale of Manor Farm, Kytes Hardwick, Warwickshire), to which the said John Sheen Downes was at his death beneficially entitled as tenant in tail in possession, or (b) whether the said two third shares devolved on certain other trusts.

K. J. T. Elphinstone for the plaintiff, one of the trustees of the trust funds.

H. A. Rose for the first defendant, Marjorie Chernocke Russell.

J. A. Brightman for the second and third defendants, who claimed as trustees of a settlement dated Apr. 3, 1922, to be entitled on the failure or determination of the estate tail.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This is a short point, on which there appears to be as yet no direct authority. A testator, John Sheen Downes, at the date of his will (Dec. 31, 1941) and also at the date of his death (Jan. 25, 1947) was entitled to a freehold farm known as the Manor Farm at Kytes Hardwick, in the county of Warwick, as follows:—As to one equal undivided third share thereof in fee simple in possession and as to the other two equal undivided third shares thereof as tenant in tail general in possession. By his said will the testator disposed or attempted to dispose of the said farm in the following words:

F “I give devise and bequeath all my one third share and all other my estate and interest in the family property at Kytes Hardwick and in the proceeds of sale thereof to” the first defendant, Marjorie Chernocke Russell (therein called Marjorie Russell), absolutely. There is no doubt that “the family property at Kytes Hardwick” sufficiently describes the said farm. The question is whether the will effectively disposed of the two third shares under and by virtue of the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 176 (1).

G That section provides:

H “A tenant in tail of full age shall have power to dispose by will, by means of a devise or bequest referring specifically either to the property or to the instrument under which it was acquired or to entailed property generally—(a) of all property of which he is tenant in tail in possession at his death; and (b) of money (including the proceeds of property directed to be sold) subject to be invested in the purchase of property, of which if it had been so invested he would have been tenant in tail in possession at his death; in like manner as if, after barring the entail, he had been tenant in fee simple or absolute owner thereof for an equitable interest at his death, but, subject to and in default of any such disposition by will, such property shall devolve in the same manner as if this section had not been passed.”

Since the death of the testator the trustees for sale under the statutory trusts affecting the property have sold it for a net sum of £5,882 6s. 10d. One-third of that sum, namely, £1,960 15s. 7d., has been paid to and received by the first defendant as representing the one-third share to which the testator was absolutely entitled, and the remaining two-thirds thereof, namely, £3,921 11s. 3d., is retained and held by the trustees pending the decision of the present question. By the Law of Property (Entailed Interests) Act, 1932, the last-mentioned sum is deemed to be held for an entailed interest corresponding to the former interest in the said two-thirds of the property itself.

The question is, I think, this: Does the devise in the testator's will "refer specifically" (within the meaning of s. 176 (1)) to the property of which the testator was tenant in tail in possession at his death? Now "the property" must, I think, for this purpose be, not the Manor Farm, but two undivided third shares in the Manor Farm. Can it be said that those two undivided shares are "specifically referred to"? The argument for a negative answer to that question points out that the first-mentioned "one-third" is obviously the one-third in which the testator's interest was absolute—I agree with that—and that the "other estate and interest" is not quantified, and, therefore, not specified or specifically referred to. It was admitted, however, that if it had been quantified incorrectly—e.g., by being called nine-fifteenths instead of ten-fifteenths—the case might have been treated as one of a false demonstration. In my judgment, however, the reference is, in fact, specific. The testator refers to his "other estate and interest," and note that the words are in the singular, not the plural. Id certum est quod certum reddi potest, and it is a matter of no difficulty to render certain the "other estate and interest" of the testator in the property. I am not sure that the reference to the family property itself might not be sufficient, for the object of the section and of the form in which it is cast must surely be to avoid any risk of a disentail being effected by inadvertence or involuntarily. A specific reference need not, in my judgment, be a completely accurate and detailed description. Indeed, there is little difference between reference and allusion. What the testator is, in effect, saying is: "I own one-third of the property, and I have also another estate and another interest in it. I am now disposing of the entirety." The other view, that the reference is not specific, seems to pay too little regard, not only to the expressed intention of the testator, but also to the probable intention of the Act, and to be of too technical a nature to commend itself to me.

I was referred to two reported cases. In Roberts v. Roberts (1) it was held that the chattels in a bill of sale are not "specifically described" as required by the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 4, unless there is something in the nature of an inventory of them, but I think that a specific description requires far more particularity than a specific reference. Campbell's Trustees v. Adamson (2), in the House of Lords, decided that general words of disposition in a will do not cover property which has to be "expressly bequeathed." There again the words are different. Neither of these authorities seems to me to be really in point. I will make the declaration confirming the title of the defendant, Marjorie Chernocke Russell.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties to be taxed as between solicitor and client and raised and paid out of the sum representing the two-third shares.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Byrne, JJ.), July 18, 1950.]

Young Person—Approved school order—Order against young person aged sixteen—Appeal by parent to quarter sessions—Young person over seventeen when appeal heard—Jurisdiction to hear appeal—Children and Young Persons Act, 1933 (c. 12), s. 62 (1) (a).

On Oct. 13, 1949, a girl who was born on Nov. 22, 1932, and, therefore, was then under seventeen years of age, was ordered by a juvenile court to be sent to an approved school. Her father appealed. When the appeal came before quarter sessions, the girl had attained the age of seventeen, and quarter sessions held that they had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal or make an order that a person over seventeen be sent to an approved school.

HELD: the appeal to quarter sessions was by way of re-hearing, but when quarter sessions re-heard the case they did so as in the same state of affairs as that in which the justices below had heard it; the juvenile court had had jurisdiction to make the order; and, therefore, quarter sessions had jurisdiction to hear the appeal.

CASE STATED by the appeal committee of the county of Southampton quarter sessions.

On Oct. 13, 1949, an order under the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, s. 62 (1) (a), that one M.D., then aged sixteen years and ten months, should be committed to an approved school until she attained the age of nineteen years as being a young person in need of care or protection within the meaning of s. 61 (1) (a) of the Act was made by the Ryde juvenile court on the application of the appellant, a police inspector. The order further provided that the respondent, the father of M.D., should pay 23s. a week towards her maintenance. The respondent appealed to quarter sessions against the order, and before the appeal came on for hearing M.D. attained the age of seventeen years. The respondent contended that where a person's age was relevant to found jurisdiction or allow the court to make a particular order, that age must be determined as at the date of the hearing at which the order was made, and that at the date of the hearing of the appeal M.D. was no longer a "young person" within the Act of 1933. The appellant contended that, as M.D. was a young person at the time of the order of the juvenile court, the appeal committee could only reverse the order on the ground that it was defective in law when made or on the merits. The appeal committee, being of opinion that M.D. was no longer a "young person," allowed the respondent's appeal, and quashed the order. The appellant appealed to the Divisional Court.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by quarter sessions for the county of Southampton. A girl was brought before the Ryde juvenile court on an application by the appellant, a police inspector, for an order under s. 61 and s. 62 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, on the ground that she had a parent "not exercising proper care and guardianship" and was "exposed to moral danger," and that, therefore, she was in need of care or protection. At that time the girl was aged sixteen years and ten months, and the court made an order sending her to an approved school and directing her father to contribute 23s. a week towards her maintenance. The father lodged an appeal to quarter sessions. By the time the appeal committee sat the girl had become seventeen. The order of the juvenile court was that she should go to an approved school and, under s. 71 (1) of the statute, she would have to stay there till she was nineteen. It was, therefore, a continuing order. Objection was taken that quarter sessions could not hear the appeal because the girl had become seventeen. Quarter sessions gave effect to that contention.

That seems to me to be completely wrong. An appeal to quarter sessions is an appeal by way of re-hearing, but that is only a procedural matter, there being no formal record of proceedings in a justices' court. When a case goes to quarter sessions it is re-heard and the person seeking an order must prove the case over again. That means that the appeal committee takes the place of the petty sessions, but it is none the less an appeal, and the order appealed from was properly made so far as jurisdiction was concerned at the time it was made. Quarter sessions have to re-hear the case as in the same state of affairs as those in which the justices below heard it. If the matter could be made any clearer, it seems to me it is only necessary to look at the Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Act, 1933, which, in s. 1, substitutes for s. 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, an amended section which provides:

"(viii) Quarter sessions may by their order confirm, reverse or vary the decision of the court of summary jurisdiction, or may remit the matter with their opinion thereon to a court of summary jurisdiction acting for the same petty sessional division or place as the court by whom the decision appealed against was given, or may make such other order in the matter as they think just, and by such order exercise any power which the court of summary jurisdiction might have exercised; and any order made by quarter sessions shall have the like effect and may be enforced in the like manner as if it had been made by the court of summary jurisdiction . . ."

The court of summary jurisdiction had jurisdiction to entertain this application. The basic requirement then was that the girl should be under seventeen, and she was under seventeen when the order was made. That order was perfectly good from that point of view, but quarter sessions said they could not hear the appeal. In my opinion, they were wrong, and the case must go back to quarter sessions to be heard.

YATES v. MORRIS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Singleton and Jenkins, L.J.J.), July 14, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Nuisance—Suffering premises to be used for immoral purposes—Order for possession suspended indefinitely—Right of landlord to immediate possession—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 5 (2) (as substituted by Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (c. 32), s. 4)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1), sched. I, para. (b).

The landlord of a house which was subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts sought possession under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), and sched. I, para. (b), on the ground that the tenant had suffered the premises to be used for immoral purposes. The county court judge found that the offence was proved and that the landlord was entitled to possession, and he ordered possession in twenty-eight days, but, taking the view that the tenant was largely innocent of the use which was being made of the premises by her sub-tenants or lodgers, he suspended the order for possession "provided no further nuisance occurs." On an appeal by the landlord, HELD: (i) there was a difference between a case where relief against forfeiture was sought under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (2), and a case arising under sched. I, para. (b), to the Act of 1933, in that, in the former class of case, the landlord had forfeited the lease and the question was whether the court, in the exercise of its discretion, should relieve the tenant against forfeiture, while, in the latter class of case it had to be shown, first, that an event had occurred which gave the court jurisdiction to make an order for possession, and the court had then to decide whether it was reasonable to make the particular order which it was about to make; but, notwithstanding this difference, when the discretion in each kind of case came to be exercised, it was proper that considerations which were applicable in the one case should prima facie be applicable in the other. The protection given by the Rent Restrictions Acts was not intended to apply where premises were being used for immoral purposes, and, therefore, the principle, which applied in cases under s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925, that the discretion would not be exercised in favour of a tenant who suffered the premises to be used for immoral purposes, was one that should be applied in cases under the Rent Restrictions Acts, and, in a case such as this, prima facie there should be an order for immediate possession.

(ii) the judge, however, had discretion, under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 5 (2), as substituted by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 4, or otherwise, to make an order for possession which was suspended indefinitely, and, as he was not shown to have misdirected himself, the order was not open to review by the Court of Appeal.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE DRUCQUER, at Westminster County Court, dated May 24, 1950, in an action claiming possession of premises to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, on the ground that the tenant had been guilty of conduct which was a nuisance or annoyance to adjoining occupiers, within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (b), in that she had suffered the premises to be used for immoral purposes.

There was some complaint in 1945 in regard to the user of the premises by a sub-tenant or lodger of the tenant, and in 1948 the tenant was warned by the police on behalf of the Westminster City Council. In September, 1949, the police kept observation on the house for three days, and on each day a woman named Clarke, to whom the tenant had given a sub-tenancy of a room in the house, and who was a known prostitute, was seen taking different men into the premises, sixteen men being taken at different times. A police sergeant gave evidence that the tenant spoke to or saw Clarke at various times when she was going in or out of the premises with men. This evidence was corroborated by another police officer, but denied by the tenant. After this matter was brought to the tenant's attention, she ended Clarke's sub-tenancy. She then gave a key of the house to a friend, Sally Waters, and in April, 1950, after the action was commenced, the police, who again kept observation on the house for a period of three days, saw Waters take twelve men into the house during that time, but there was no evidence that the tenant was seen with Waters on these occasions. The learned county court judge found that the landlord was entitled to possession, and made an order for possession in twenty-eight days, but suspended the order "provided no further nuisance occurs." In the Court of Appeal it was contended inter alia on behalf of the landlord that the learned judge had no jurisdiction to suspend the order which he had made, or, if he had the jurisdiction, he should not have suspended the order.

C. G. A. Cowan for the landlord.

Power for the tenant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This case has, I confess, caused me very considerable anxiety. To put it briefly, the landlord of premises comprised within the ambit of the Rent Restrictions Acts has sought an order for possession against the tenant, who is, admittedly, a statutory tenant, on the ground, stated in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (b), that "... the tenant or any person residing or lodging with him or being his sub-tenant has been guilty of conduct which is a nuisance or annoyance to adjoining occupiers ..."

The particular acts relied on are that on certain dates persons, who were lodgers or sub-tenants of rooms by arrangement with the tenant, were using their respective rooms for immoral purposes, viz., the exercise of their trade as prostitutes.

In cases arising under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (2), similar problems have recently come before the court—similar, because in those cases the question was: If there had been a breach of covenant not to use or permit premises to be used in the way which I have indicated, could the tenant, when the landlord had forfeited the lease, obtain relief against forfeiture? The problems were, as I have said, similar, but, in my judgment, they were not the same. In forfeiture cases the position is that the tenant has committed a breach of contract entitling the landlord, according to the contract, to forfeit, the landlord has forfeited, and the lease has ended. The question then is: Should the court in its discretion relieve the tenant against the forfeiture? It has been laid down many times that such relief will not be granted if the breach is not capable of remedy. In the present case, the emphasis is, I think, somewhat different. In the case of a rent controlled house, where there is a statutory tenant as occupant, the court cannot order possession at the suit of the landlord, save in certain circumstances. First, it must be shown that some one of the events enumerated in sched. I to the Act of 1933 has occurred which gives the court jurisdiction to make an order under s. 3 (1) of the Act, and, secondly, the court must come to the conclusion that it is reasonable to make the particular order for possession which it is about to make. There is, therefore, I think, a difference in emphasis. Nevertheless, it is also, to my mind, true to say that, when the discretion in each kind of case comes to be exercised, it is proper that considerations which are applicable in the one case should prima facie be applicable in the other. Thus, in Borthwick-Norton v. Romney Warwick Estates, Ltd. (1) LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivering the leading judgment of the Court of Appeal, said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 801):

"The discretion which is given by s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925 is not to be exercised in favour of people who suffer premises to be used as a brothel, and the learned judge, having found that the defendant company was suffering these premises to be used as a brothel, was justified in refusing to exercise discretion in their favour."

In that case HILBERY, J., had refused to exercise discretion in the tenants' favour, and this court was asked to overrule the exercise of his discretion.

I have read that passage, and I have made those observations, because, to my mind, if premises within the Rent Restrictions Acts are proved to be used to the knowledge of the tenant for purposes of this kind, prima facie I think the court ought not to refrain from making an order for possession. The Rent Restrictions Acts were designed to protect persons in the occupation of their homes at a time of housing shortage, and, if a statutory tenant is shown to be suffering the premises to be used for immoral purposes, then it seems to me prima facie that the case is not one which could be within the protection intended by Parliament. Therefore, I think that, had I been trying this case, I should have been less charitable to the tenant than was the learned judge below, but, of course, I did not see her, and in any question of discretion the importance of having seen the witness cannot, I think, be too strongly emphasised.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The relevant part of the learned county court judge's reasons for his judgment is as follows. He said that he had grave doubts whether he should exercise his discretion, but he had been "... moved to do so by the following considerations. I am satisfied that when complaint was made in 1948 and 1949, the [tenant] immediately evicted the offending person. I accept the evidence of Mrs. Baylis that there were grounds of complaint in 1945, but apart from that there is not much, if any, evidence that the neighbourhood was disturbed by the conduct of the house. I think the [tenant] did her best to prevent the nuisance. As regards Waters, [the tenant] said she knew nothing about her conduct, but it cannot be overlooked that she allowed her a key of the house. With the consent of Mr. Bond, a surveyor and estate agent [and the predecessor in title of the appellant], [the tenant] had permission to sub-let her rooms to provide a living for herself, she invested her all in the premises, a sum of £300 or £400 she states, in improving the premises for that purpose. Since 1944 Mr. Bond had been from time to time on the premises. He had no ground for complaint against her. The names of her sub-tenants have been disclosed to the [landlord]. Some have been there since 1944, and no complaint has been received from any of them. I am prepared to give her another chance, but it is a very serious case, and unless she looks after the property properly she will have to go. I shall allow her to stay, but it is a very extreme case."

I read those findings as amounting to this, that, though the judge thought that the tenant had not been careful or astute in her observation, he was not prepared to disbelieve her evidence that she was innocent of the use being made of the premises by persons to whom she had let rooms, or whom she had admitted as lodgers. I think that he was also influenced by the fact that Mr. Bond, the predecessor in title of the landlord, had frequently been on the premises and had made no complaints against the tenant. I mention these facts because counsel for the landlord has said that, since his client is the present head lessee, and is subject to a covenant in the head lease in regard to user, justice requires that he should be protected by an immediate order for ejectment against the tenant, although there is no suggestion that he himself is using or suffering a user of the premises for immoral purposes. It seems to me quite plain that on those facts the head lessee would be protected by the courts if there was any attempt to forfeit by his landlord. A

To return to the subject-matter of the user of the premises, I think that in cases of this kind the court should be ready to make immediate orders for possession. As I have said, I cannot think that, where user of this kind is proved, the premises were intended by Parliament to be within the protection of the Acts. It is, however, a matter of discretion. The learned judge who tried the case is a judge of great experience. I am not persuaded that, either in regard to his consideration of the Borthwick-Norton case (1) or on any other ground, the judge is shown to have misdirected himself, or to have so exercised his discretion as to give rise to an injustice against the landlord, or otherwise not to have exercised his discretion judicially. I do not, therefore, on the whole, think that it would be right for this court to interfere. B C

Another point was taken by counsel for the landlord. He contended that the judge, having first by the terms of his order said that possession must be given, then had no jurisdiction to suspend the order conditionally, in effect, on the tenant taking proper steps to see that there is no further improper use of any room, or, if he had the jurisdiction to suspend the order, he ought not to have suspended it. So far as jurisdiction is concerned, I do not think the point is open to counsel. It was not taken below, and I do not think it is among the grounds of appeal. In any case, I think that there is jurisdiction, either under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 5 (2), as substituted by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 4, or otherwise, to make an order in this form in a case arising under the Rent Restrictions Acts. Whether it is a very convenient form is perhaps another matter. The intention of the order clearly is that, should there be any ground for saying that the immoral user of these premises is continuing, then (on application to the court, if necessary), the suspension would immediately cease. It would terminate automatically. It is, perhaps, right to state that, as I read the judgment, it would be no answer on the tenant's part to say that she did not know. She has been told to manage her premises properly. That being the intention of the order, I do not think there would be any practical difficulty in giving effect to it if occasion should arise, and for the reasons I have indicated I think that there was jurisdiction. The case is quite different from Sheffield Corpn. v. Luxford (2), in which the premises were not within the Rent Restrictions Acts. The plaintiff in that case proved that the lease had determined, and that he was entitled to immediate possession. The question there arose because, under the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 138, there was a general power for the court to suspend the operation of its order, but, where there is an absolute right to possession, that discretion, if it be exercised judicially, can only be exercised so as to give reasonable opportunity to the trespassing tenant to remove himself and his belongings from the premises. People cannot be expected, or reasonably asked, to go at two minutes' notice, but, for no particular reason to give a suspension of as long as twelve months could not have been judicially to exercise the discretion. That seems to me to be quite different from the present case where the making of an order for possession, whether an immediate one, or in six months' time, or suspended indefinitely, is wholly in the discretion of the judge. Although I am clear in my mind that prima facie, in cases such as this, there should be immediate orders for possession, in the particular circumstances here proved I am not D E F G H prepared to say that we ought to interfere with the discretion exercised by the learned county court judge.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I, too, have been greatly troubled by this case. I have felt considerable doubt whether the learned county court judge had the power to make an order in the terms in which he made it. He found that

“ . . . the [landlord] is entitled to possession on these grounds, and I, accordingly, order possession in twenty-eight days and give judgment for the rent due up to Mar. 25, 1950.”

Later in his judgment, having considered the facts further, the learned county court judge said: “ Judgment for possession in twenty-eight days suspended provided no further nuisance occurs.” The result of that is to make an order for possession in twenty-eight days, but to grant an indefinite suspension of it, so that the latter part of the order stultifies and renders of no effect the former part of it. I confess I have doubts whether such an order can be properly made, but I agree, if I may say so respectfully, with that which my Lord has said, that the matter was not pointed out to the learned county court judge on the hearing of the action, and the notice of appeal does not appear to cover that point. So that it may well be that it is not open to this court to interfere on that ground. If that ground goes, the matter becomes more simple.

Assuming that the county court judge had power to make an order of this kind, I think it is a question for his discretion. The only consideration which enables me to say that, in my opinion, this court ought not to interfere, is that in virtually every case the county court judge is entrusted with the decision, and final decision, of questions of fact. If there was evidence on which he could decide such a question as he did, this court would not interfere. If this had been a case in which forfeiture was claimed for breach of a covenant under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146, there would, in a case of this kind, have been no question of relief, as the decision in Borthwick-Norton v. Romney Warwick Estates, Ltd. (1) shows. This is not a case under the Act of 1925. It is a case under the Rent Restrictions Acts, and, though the wording of the various Acts bring into play somewhat different considerations, I should not like to think that the practice is wholly different.

[His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and said:] I think it is almost unconceivable that the tenant did not know what was going on. The learned county court judge has taken a charitable view of her behaviour. I confess I could not have looked on the matter in the same light as he appears to have done. The tenant had been warned, but she continued in the same way. I recognise, however, that the learned county court judge is a judge of fact, and this court is bound by the findings of fact if there is any evidence on which he could so find. That is the reason which allows me to say that I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree that for the reasons stated by the Master of the Rolls this appeal should be dismissed. The tenant, in my judgment, has been extremely lucky and, as at present advised, so far as I can judge from the notes of the evidence, as opposed to seeing and hearing the witnesses, I would not myself, if I had been dealing with the matter at first instance, have been disposed to grant a similar indulgence. The question, however, whether any, and, if so, what, suspension of the order should be granted was essentially a matter for the discretion of the learned county court judge, and, although he had certainly taken a very lenient view, I cannot find that in so doing he has committed any error in law such as would make his order properly open to review in this court. Accordingly, I agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

DAVIES v. DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT CO., LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Somervell, L.J., sitting as an additional Judge of the King's Bench Division), July 5, 6, 1950.]

Factory—Safe means of access to place of work—Maintenance of floors and passages—Passage leading to canteen—Rainwater collected on floor of passage—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 25 (1), s. 26 (1).

Master and Servant—Provision of safe place for servant to work—Rainwater on floor of passage leading to canteen—Workman slipping and suffering injury.

The plaintiff, who was employed by the defendants at their factory, was walking along a passage at the factory on his way to the canteen during a morning break, when, on turning a corner, he slipped on a patch of oil or of water in which some mud or oil might have been present and which had accumulated, possibly in a depression, on the concrete floor. He caught his foot between some machine tools standing nearby, and was injured. On a claim by him for damages for breach of the defendants' duties under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (1) and s. 26 (1), and at common law,

HELD: (i) section 26 (1) had no application to the facts because at the time of the accident the plaintiff was using the passage as a means of access to the canteen and not to go to any place at which any person had to work.

(ii) the existence of an unexplained patch of oil or of a patch of water on the passage did not amount to a failure properly to maintain the floor and the passage as required by s. 25 (1).

(iii) in the circumstances there was no failure by the defendants to take reasonable care to protect those employed from unnecessary risk.

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants in their factory, where some five thousand persons were employed. On Oct. 14, 1948, during the morning break the plaintiff was walking along a passage at the factory towards the canteen when, on turning a corner, he slipped, his foot caught between some machine tools which were standing near, and he fell and broke his ankle. The machine tools were stored at that spot for want of more suitable storage space. The passage was fifty-two inches wide. The plaintiff stated in evidence that he slipped on a patch of oil or grease, but, having regard to other evidence, SOMERVELL, L.J., found that there was not a patch of oil at the spot, although some rain water had collected, possibly in a slight depression in the concrete floor, and it was possible that mud or oil from men's boots was also present. The tools had been in the same position for three years, and had not been re-greased during that time. The plaintiff claimed damages for breach of the defendants' duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (1) and s. 26 (1), and at common law.

R. M. Everett for the plaintiff.

John Thompson for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J. [having recited the facts and considered the evidence]: The plaintiff relies first on the Factories Act, 1937, s. 26 (1), which provides:

"(1) There shall, so far as is reasonably practicable, be provided and maintained safe means of access to every place at which any person has at any time to work."

The plaintiff was going to the canteen, and, therefore, it does not seem to me that he comes within those words. Counsel for the plaintiff argued that if the plaintiff had been returning, he would have been going from the canteen to his work, and it would be absurd if the section applied in that case and not if he were going towards the canteen. Although this section has been given, as I accept, a rather wider meaning than some persons have suggested that it is intended to have, my own view is that the provisions of the Factories Act, 1937, which are intended to apply to a passage of this kind are in s. 25 (1), and, therefore, I would lean against an overlapping of the sections in a case which I do not think s. 26 (1) aptly fits. So far as the evidence goes, the passage was a means of access to the canteen and not a means of access to a place at which a person had at any time to work, and I think (although I have not got to decide it) that it would be outside s. 26 (1) whether the plaintiff was going to the canteen or coming from it.

Section 25 (1) provides:

"All floors, steps, stairs, passages and gangways shall be of sound construction and properly maintained."

"Maintained" is defined in s. 152 as

". . . maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair."

That is the duty of maintaining. Assuming that there was, as I have found, water that might be slippery at the time in question, or assuming that there was an unexplained patch of oil, I do not think that that amounts to a failure by the defendants to comply with the duty imposed on them by those words. The fact that for an uncertain period and in circumstances which no one can explain there was a patch of oil does not seem to me to amount to a failure to maintain. I hold that the facts do not amount to a breach of this requirement. Equally (and the evidence on this must be very carefully considered because it was not the plaintiff's case), if there was a slight depression in the concrete in which water collected when it rained so that the floor became slippery, I do not think that, on the evidence, that amounts to a breach of s. 25 (1). It would be impracticable to maintain passages and roads and pathways so that there was never a slippery place, especially after rain, on which a man might slip. Slipping is quite a common incident of life, and usually no harm is done. The victim usually suffers no permanent injury, but, unfortunately, the plaintiff received serious damage to his ankle.

So much for the statute, and, in my view, the same general approach which leads me to the opinion that there was no breach of duty imposed by the statute leads me to hold that there was no breach of duty at common law. It was generally agreed that the duty was accurately stated in the often-quoted words of LORD HERSCHELL, in Smith v. Baker & Sons ([1891] A.C. 362):

"It is quite clear that the contract between employer and employed involves on the part of the former the duty of taking reasonable care to provide proper appliances, and to maintain them in a proper condition, and so to carry on his operations as not to subject those employed by him to unnecessary risk."

I find it impossible to say that the mere existence of that which I have found might have resulted in the plaintiff slipping indicates any failure to take reasonable care to protect those employed from unnecessary risk. For these reasons I think this claim fails.

WILLIAM CORY & SON, LTD. v. CITY OF LONDON CORPORATION.

Affirmed. C.A. [1951] 2 All E.R. 85.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), July 4, 1950.]

Contract—Repudiation—Anticipatory breach—Contract with corporation for removal of refuse—Undertaking by contractors to observe bye-laws—Sealing of new bye-laws—Substantial additional burden on contractors.

The City of London Corporation, as the sanitary authority, made a contract for the removal of refuse by the River Thames under which the contractors undertook to use lighters and barges fitted with "temporary coamings and coverings to be secured to the permanent coamings." The contractors also undertook to comply with the bye-laws of the corporation as health authority for the port of London. In April, 1948, when the contract still had a prospective life of some twenty years, the corporation, as the port health authority, sealed new bye-laws which were due to come into force in November, 1950. One of these bye-laws required any vessel transporting refuse to be provided with "permanent coamings and close-fitting hatches to such coamings, capable of completely covering the refuse, and . . . water-proof sheeting for covering such hatches." It was not disputed that the additional burden thrown on the contractors by this bye-law was such as would entitle them when the bye-law ultimately came into force to treat the contract as having been frustrated.

HELD: the repudiation of a contract must be a conscious act with reference to the contract which is said to be repudiated; in the present case the corporation legislated in discharge of their duty as port health authority without reference to the contract into which they had entered as sanitary authority; and, therefore, the sealing of the bye-laws did not amount to a repudiation of the contract entitling the contractors to treat it as determined forthwith.

[AS TO REPUDIATION OF CONTRACT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 7, pp. 227-230, paras. 311-315; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 12, pp. 338-345, Nos. 2830-2874.]

CASE STATED by the town clerk of the City of London pursuant to an arbitration clause in an agreement.

The claimants were a company of lightermen and barge-owners who had contracted with the respondents, the City of London Corporation, for the removal of refuse by the River Thames. Under the agreement they had also undertaken to comply with the bye-laws which had been made by the respondents as port health authority. The claimants contended that they were entitled to treat the contract as determined on the ground that it had been repudiated by the respondents when they sealed new bye-laws, one of which imposed so substantial a burden on them in equipping their barges as to entitle them, when it came into force, to treat the contract as frustrated.

Harold B. Williams, K.C., and Wilfrid Hunt for the corporation.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Special Case stated by the town clerk of the city of London pursuant to an arbitration clause in an agreement dated Dec. 16, 1936, between the respondents, the City of London Corporation, and the claimants, William Cory & Son, Ltd., relating to the loading and discharge of refuse at Letts Wharf. The claimants, a firm of lightermen and barge-owners, undertook to load the refuse and take it down to Hornechurch to a "dump." The contract is of an indefinite character. It was to be for a certain period and then to continue until the "dump" at Hornchurch had reached a certain height. The arbitrator finds, and there is no contest about it, that under its terms in all probability the contract would remain in force until about 1969.

The claimants' case is that by the sealing of some bye-laws in April, 1948, an action which was confirmed by the Minister of Health in July, 1948, the corporation have, in effect, repudiated the contract. The terms of the contract are conveniently stated in the Special Case. By cl. 1 it is provided:

A "The contractors shall at all times during the continuance of this agreement provide at Letts Wharf on the River Thames such a number of staunch and strong lighters and barges which shall for the purpose of this agreement be fitted and maintained with temporary coamings and coverings to be secured to the permanent coamings as will be sufficient to remove the materials aforesaid from Letts Wharf aforesaid and in particular they shall

B at all times have so many lighters and barges moored alongside Letts Wharf aforesaid as will in the opinion of the director of public cleansing be sufficient for the reception of the materials aforesaid as the same are brought or conveyed to Letts Wharf."

Then there is a clause which provides that the corporation are to give daily

C loadings to the contractors of not less than thirty thousand or more than eighty thousand tons, and by cl. 13 it is provided:

"Subject to the provisions of cl. 1 hereof the contractors shall at all times observe and comply with the bye-laws of the port health authority of the port of London."

D The corporation are the sanitary authority whose duty it is to clear the streets and dispose of refuse, and they are also, by the Public Health (London) Act, 1936, s. 5 (1), the port health authority for the port of London.

The bye-laws in force when this agreement was made were made on Apr. 8, 1897, and allowed by the Local Government Board on May 21, 1897. Under those bye-laws provision was made for the prevention of nuisance arising from the carriage of filth or other matter by any ship, boat, or vessel, but it was not

E provided that there should be temporary coamings and coverings to be secured to the permanent coamings as provided in cl. 1 of the contract. The only meaning I can give to cl. 13 is that it imposes on the contractors an obligation not only to observe and comply with the bye-laws, but also to comply with the requirements of cl. 1. It is also intended to make clear that the provisions

F of cl. 1 are to prevail notwithstanding the fact that the bye-laws which were then in force do not go as far as does cl. 1. Clause 24 of the contract deals with temporary interference with the performance of the contract, and provides that if, by certain matters such as an act of God, the acts of the King's enemies, or the regulations of any county council, parochial or local authority, or by any government interference, the contract is hindered or prevented, it is to be

G suspended so long as the performance is so hindered and prevented. That is a clause dealing only with temporary hindering of performance.

In July, 1948, a bye-law was confirmed by the Minister of Health which, when it becomes effective in November, 1950, will throw a very considerable burden on barge-owners or lighter-owners who are engaged in this trade. This bye-law provides:

H "A person who shall remove or transport or cause to be removed or transported in or upon any vessel, within the district of the port health authority, any refuse, shall: (a) Remove or transport, or cause to be removed or transported, such refuse in a sound, suitable and watertight vessel provided with permanent coamings and close-fitting hatches to such coamings, capable of completely covering the refuse, and provide waterproof sheeting for covering such hatches capable of being properly and securely attached to such coamings. (b) Except during the process of loading or unloading properly and securely cover and keep covered or cause to be so covered and kept covered all such refuse with close-fitting hatches, and completely cover or cause to be so covered such hatches with waterproof sheeting properly and securely attached to the said coamings of the vessel. (c) Not place or deposit or cause to be placed or deposited therein any refuse above the level of the said coamings thereof."

The claimants have found that it will cost them between £400 and £500 per barge to comply with that bye-law. It is not disputed that when that bye-law does come into force the contract will come to an end because it will have been frustrated. As a business proposition the claimants cannot be expected, with the 6s. a ton they receive under the contract for the removal of refuse, to spend £400 or £500 per barge in fitting their barges to comply with this bye-law. If they do not want to do that they can say: "Now the terms are quite different from those which prevailed when we entered into the contract. The requirements of the bye-law alter the matter to such an extent that it is commercially impossible for us to carry on the contract." They want to go further, however, and say: "As in 1948 you gave notice that this bye-law was coming into force in 1950, that amounts to a repudiation of the contract because you are going to require us in 1950 to alter our barges or lighters, if we are to carry out the business, in such a way that it will be commercially impossible. You are, therefore, not going to allow us to carry out the contract in the way it was stated it should be carried out at the time it was entered into."

The question I have to decide is whether the act of the corporation in sealing a new bye-law amounted to a repudiation so as to entitle the claimants to treat the contract as determined on Sept. 21, 1948, when the claimants first took the point that the contract had been repudiated? In my opinion, it did not. In sealing the bye-law the corporation were acting, no doubt, as a subordinate legislative authority, as all bye-law-making authorities act. They were making a bye-law of perfectly general application. It was not a bye-law which would apply to the claimants only; it would apply to all persons who engage, or might hereafter engage, in the trade or business of refuse removal or any of the other matters dealt with in the bye-laws. It seems to me that it cannot be said because the corporation, as the port health authority, are entrusted by Parliament with the duty of making bye-laws with the object of securing the health of the port, and think it right and necessary to pass a particular bye-law, they are thereby repudiating a contract. It may be, as in this case, that the effect of the bye-law will give reason to the claimants to say that a contract will be frustrated in the future, that is to say, in November, 1950, but it does not seem to me that what occurred in 1948 amounted to a repudiation by the corporation of the contract. It is not an anticipatory breach of contract, because I do not think the corporation were committing a breach of contract at all.

The doctrine of anticipatory breach, as it is generally called, depends on one party repudiating his obligation under a contract. If one party so repudiates his obligation the other party can say: "I will treat the contract as at an end." But before there can be a repudiation there must be something in the nature of a wrongful act. The wrongful act can either be a breach of contract or it may be the commission of a tort. In my opinion, it is impossible to say that the corporation, acting as the port health authority, committed a wrongful act or broke their contract because they imposed a bye-law on the port of London which incidentally will affect this particular contract.

The meaning of the words "to repudiate" are, according to the OXFORD DICTIONARY, "to refuse to discharge or acknowledge a debt or other obligation." Repudiation, it seems to me, for this purpose must be a conscious act in relation to the contract in question. That distinguishes it from the frustration of a contract as it is usually called, as was pointed out by LORD SUMNER in Hirji Mulji v. Cheong Yue S.S. Co., Ltd. (1). This is not a question whether the corporation can divide themselves into two parts, and whether one is to regard them qua sanitary authority as one body and qua port health authority as another. As a corporation they are one and indivisible, but they have distinct duties, and if one of their duties is to act as the port health authority I cannot see that the making of a bye-law of general application and affecting all persons on the River Thames can in any way be said to be an act repudiating a contract entered into for another purpose altogether, although, incidentally, it may affect it. It is not disputed that, if some outside authority—Parliament or the London County Council or some other local authority—had made a bye-law which affected the contract, that might have had some effect on it, though it could not amount to repudiation. I think the repudiation with which the well-known doctrine of law is concerned must be a conscious act with reference to the particular contract which is said to be repudiated. In this case I think that all that happened is that the corporation legislated in discharge of their duty as port health authority. That legislation will, no doubt, affect the contract when the legislation comes into force. I am willing to assume that the effect of the bye-law will be to frustrate the contract and prevent its further application as commercially impossible in November, 1950, when the bye-law becomes effective, but I cannot hold that what has happened here amounted to a repudiation. I, therefore, decide that the claimants were not entitled to treat the contract as rescinded and of no effect after Sept. 21, 1948, and the corporation will have the costs of this argument.

Award upheld with costs against the claimants.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Byrne, JJ.), July 17, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Trial—Plea of Not Guilty—Withdrawal—Admission of guilt—Need to take verdict of jury.

On arraignment the appellant pleaded Not Guilty to charges of stealing and receiving. He was put in charge of the jury and the trial proceeded, but during the opening of the case for the prosecution his counsel said that he (the appellant) wished to change his plea to one of Guilty of receiving and asked that the jury should return a verdict accordingly, but the recorder said that that was not necessary and he passed sentence without a verdict being returned.

HELD: (i) the statement by his counsel that he wished to plead Guilty was not sufficient, for a prisoner himself must plead.

(ii) once a person had been put in charge of a jury he could only be convicted or discharged by the verdict of the jury; this trial, therefore, was a nullity, and the court could have ordered a re-trial; but in the circumstances they would not take that step, but would quash the conviction.

APPEAL against sentence.

The appellant pleaded Not Guilty at Bolton Quarter Sessions to charges of stealing and receiving, but, after being put in charge of the jury, he changed his plea to one of Guilty. The recorder sentenced him to three years' imprisonment without the jury having returned a verdict. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

C. E. Goolden for the appellant.

Corcoran for the Crown.

The following judgment of the court was delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The appellant was charged before the recorder of Bolton on an indictment containing charges of stealing and receiving bicycles. When arraigned, he pleaded Not Guilty to all the charges. During the opening of the case by counsel for the prosecution the appellant indicated that he wanted legal aid, whereupon the recorder granted this request and counsel undertook the case. Counsel then indicated that his client desired to withdraw his plea of Not Guilty and plead Guilty to receiving. By this time, however, he was in charge of the jury. The transcript of the shorthand note of the proceedings does not indicate that the appellant himself was asked to plead. It merely contains a statement that his counsel said that he wished to plead Guilty. That is not enough. A prisoner must himself plead. After the jury had heard that the appellant wished to withdraw his plea and admit his guilt, the proper proceeding was to direct them to return a verdict. Apparently, indeed, counsel suggested to the recorder that that was the proper course, but the recorder said it did not matter. It does matter, because once a prisoner is in charge of a jury he can only be either convicted or discharged by the verdict of the jury. As there was no verdict of the jury here, the trial was a nullity, and we could set aside the proceedings and order a re-trial or venire de novo. We are not, however, going to do that in this case. We are simply going to quash the conviction, because the appellant is a man of good character, there is no previous conviction against him, and he has already been awaiting this appeal for two months. There is no fault of learned counsel in this case on either side.

Conviction quashed.

WALTER v. ETON RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), July 19, 1950.]

Local Government—Superannuation—Decision of claim by “authority concerned” —Scheme administered by county council—Employees of rural district council entitled to participate—Claim to annual superannuation allowance by former employee of rural district council—Claim admitted by rural district council, but rejected by county council—Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937 (c. 68), s. 8, s. 35.

The plaintiff, who was employed by a rural district council, was entitled under the Local Government Act, 1937, s. 4, to participate in the benefits of a superannuation fund which was maintained and administered by the county council. The fund was a composite one and the contributory employees of some twenty district councils were entitled to participate in its benefits. On giving notice to the rural district council of his intention to resign on the ground of permanent ill-health, the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to an annual superannuation allowance under s. 8 (1) (a) of the Act. His claim was admitted by the rural district council, but rejected by the county council, and his appeal from the decision of the county council was dismissed by the Minister of Health. The plaintiff brought an action against the councils claiming a declaration that he was entitled to a superannuation allowance. The county council contended that he was not entitled to the declaration because, under s. 35 of the Act, the Minister's determination of the question was final. The plaintiff contended that the question was not one for the decision of the Minister under s. 35, because the rural district council, as the "employing authority," were "the authority concerned" within the meaning of the section, and, as they had accepted his claim, the county council, as the "administering authority" were merely under a duty to pay him.

HELD: as the fund was a composite one in which a number of different local authorities were interested, the county council, as the "administering authority," had to deal with it as trustees; in each case of a claim to a superannuation allowance under s. 8 of the Act they had to be satisfied that the necessary facts were established which would justify them in paying sums out of the fund; and, therefore, for the purpose of s. 8, the "administering authority" were "the authority concerned" within the meaning of s. 35, and, accordingly, the Minister's determination was final and the plaintiff was not entitled to the declaration asked for.

Decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 796), affirmed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff, a former employee of the Eton Rural District Council, from an order of LORD GODDARD, C.J., dated Mar. 13, 1950, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 796, dismissing his action against the rural district council and the Buckinghamshire County Council for a declaration that he was entitled, under the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, s. 8, to an annual superannuation allowance out of the superannuation fund which was maintained and administered by the county council and in the benefits of which the contributory employees of the rural district council were entitled to participate. The plaintiff's claim to an allowance was admitted by the rural district council, but rejected by the county council who contended that he was not entitled to the declaration as the Minister of Health had dismissed his appeal from the decision of the county council, and, under s. 35 of the Act, the determination of the Minister was final. LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that the county council, as the "administering authority" of the fund, were the authority who had to satisfy themselves that an employee had brought himself within the provisions of s. 8 of the Act, and, therefore, they were the "authority concerned" within the meaning of s. 35, and the Minister's determination on the appeal from their decision was final. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Gardiner, K.C., and M. Lyell for the plaintiff.

Rowe, K.C., and W. L. Roots for the Buckinghamshire County Council.
The Eton Rural District Council did not appear.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in favour of the defendants in an action brought by the plaintiff, Mr. Edward Frank Walter, against the rural district council of Eton and the county council of Buckinghamshire. On this appeal we are only concerned with the county council as an effective party, the rural district council of Eton not having taken any part in the appeal.

The plaintiff, who was a former employee of the Eton Rural District Council, brought his action claiming

"... a declaration that he is entitled to be paid an annual superannuation allowance under the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, at a rate calculated in accordance with the minute of the first named defendants dated May 27, 1947, from July 31, 1947, until the happening of some further event which shall determine or modify his right to the said allowance."

The plaintiff entered the service of the rural district council as a clerk in 1930. He became a committee clerk, and, on May 13, 1947, he wrote a letter, addressed to the clerk of the Eton Rural District Council, intimating his intention to resign on the ground of permanent ill-health resulting from, or contributed to by, his long service with the council. He ends his letter by saying: A

"I shall be glad if you will submit this letter to the next meeting of the council or the staff and accommodation committee when in view of the facts mentioned above I hope the council will be able to see its way clear to take the necessary action with a view to securing for me an allowance under the Local Government Superannuation Acts on the ground of my resignation being due to ill-health." B

When the matter was considered by the rural district council, the recommendation of the staff and accommodation committee was accepted. The recommendation was: C

"That Mr. Walter be granted, as from the operative date of his resignation, namely, July 31, 1947, an allowance under the Superannuation Acts based upon the maximum possible service performed by him and allowed for under the Acts and by treating non-contributory service as contributory (converting one-hundred-and-twentieths into sixtieths) and that the clerk and treasurer be instructed to take all necessary steps in connection therewith and to approach the Bucks County Council as necessary, as the authority administering the superannuation scheme." D

The plaintiff claims that that decision of the rural district council was properly taken by the council as "the authority concerned" to deal with the matter, and that under it he is entitled to receive his pension. The matter was subsequently considered by the Buckinghamshire County Council who claimed to be "the authority concerned" in the matter and refused to grant the pension. From that decision the plaintiff appealed to the Minister of Health and his appeal was dismissed. It is not now suggested that by appealing from that decision of the Minister the plaintiff is in any way precluded from contending that the matter was properly dealt with by the resolution of the Eton Rural District Council. E F

The Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, s. 35, provides:

"Any question concerning the rights or liabilities of an employee of a local authority, or of a person claiming to be treated as such an employee, under any of the provisions of Part I or this Part of this Act, or any regulations made under this Act, shall be decided in the first instance by the authority concerned, and if the employee is dissatisfied with any such decision or with the authority's failure to come to a decision, shall be determined by the Minister, and the Minister's determination shall be final." G

The whole question in this appeal is: Were "the authority concerned" with this particular matter the Eton Rural District Council or the Buckinghamshire County Council? H

The plaintiff's claim to a pension arises under s. 8 (1), which provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, a contributory employee of an employing authority shall be entitled, on ceasing to be employed by them, to receive an annual superannuation allowance if he either (a) has completed ten years' service and is incapable of discharging efficiently the duties of his employment by reason of permanent ill-health or infirmity of mind or body; or . . .”

Then there are certain other conditions which, if fulfilled, entitle him to a pension. Section 8 (2) provides:

A “The superannuation allowance to be made to a contributory employee under this Part of this Act shall be on the following scale, that is to say: (a) in respect of every completed year of contributory service, one sixtieth of his average remuneration; (b) in respect of every year of non-contributing service, one one-hundred-and-twentieth of his average remuneration: Provided that: (i) in the case of any particular employee, the employing authority may, on his becoming entitled to a superannuation allowance, resolve that there shall be substituted for the said fraction of one one-hundred-and-twentieth any larger fraction not exceeding one sixtieth.”

B Section 8 (4) provides:

C “Every superannuation allowance under this Part of this Act shall be paid out of the appropriate superannuation fund, but any extra charge resulting from any resolution passed by an employing authority under proviso (i) to sub-s. (2) (b) of this section shall be repaid to the fund by that authority.”

D Under the scheme of this Act it is provided, by s. 1 (1), that superannuation funds shall be maintained by “the council of every county, county borough and metropolitan borough” and “the council of every county district having on the day six months before the appointed day one hundred or more employees.” By s. 4, which provides, among other things, for the case of authorities who have less than one hundred employees:

E “(1) The appropriate superannuation fund in relation to the contributory employees of an employing authority shall, where that authority are an administering authority, or are a constituent authority under a combination scheme for the time being in force, or were immediately before the appointed day a party to an admission agreement made with an admitting authority, be the fund maintained by the employing authority, or, as the case may be, by the joint committee or by the authority who were the admitting authority. (2) In any case not falling within the preceding sub-section, the appropriate superannuation fund in relation to the contributory employees of an employing authority shall be the superannuation fund maintained by the council of the county or county borough within which the area of the employing authority, or the greater part of the area of that authority, is situate . . .”

F Then there is a provision that, in certain circumstances,

G “the Minister may order that the contributory employees of any particular employing authority shall be entitled to participate in the benefits of the superannuation fund maintained by some other administering authority.”

H Section 4 (3) provides:

“If at any time the Minister is satisfied that the number of contributory employees entitled to participate in the benefits of the fund maintained by an administering authority who are the council of a county district is, and is likely to remain, below one hundred, he may order that those contributory employees shall be entitled to participate in the benefits of the superannuation fund maintained by the council of the county, or, if that council are a local Act authority, or if the Minister for other reasons, after consultation with the authorities appearing to him to be concerned, deems it expedient, the superannuation fund maintained by some other administering authority, and the Minister shall include in his order all such directions as he deems necessary for the transfer of the superannuation fund of the first-mentioned authority and the liabilities thereof, and with respect to other consequential and incidental matters."

Therefore, as regards the authorities with less than one hundred employees, the scheme is that a composite superannuation fund is established. We are told that in the case of Buckinghamshire there are some twenty such authorities and one fund is created for dealing with calls on this fund, and I think the decision in this case turns very largely on the nature of that fund.

To return to s. 8, the question is: Who are the appropriate authority for dealing with claims to pension arising under s. 8 (1)? Are they the "administering authority" in a case where the "administering authority" are different from the "employing authority," or are they the "employing authority"? It is argued by counsel for the plaintiff that it is only reasonable to suppose that such matters as decisions with regard to infirmity of mind or body, permanent ill-health, and incapacity to discharge duties efficiently would be better dealt with by the employing authority, who would be familiar with the case of the employee in question, rather than by some more distant authority who knew nothing about him. I think there is a good deal of force in that argument. On the other hand, it is said that the administering authority, dealing with this fund in which a number of different local authorities are interested, are in the position of trustees and that they have to be satisfied that the necessary facts are established in each case which will justify them in paying sums out of the fund, and that, if it had been intended that they should merely act as bankers and pay out on the order of the employing authority, it would have been very easy to say so.

In the present case it is not necessary to decide who are "the authority concerned" under the various sections to which we have been referred. All we have to decide is: Who are "the authority concerned" with the matters dealt with in s. 8? I think, however, that some light is thrown on these matters by some of the other sections to which we have been referred. Counsel for the plaintiff relied very strongly on s. 3 (2). Section 3 deals with persons who are to be contributory employees, and s. 3 (2) provides:

"The persons referred to in the preceding sub-section are . . . (b) every servant, or part-time officer, of such a local authority as aforesaid who belongs to a class or description which the authority have by a statutory resolution specified as a class or description the members of, or persons falling within, which are to be contributory employees."

The Local Government Superannuation (Administration) Regulations, 1938 (S.R. & O., 1938, No. 574), were made by the Minister of Health on the basis that "the authority concerned" with creating this class are the employing authority, and art. 5 of those regulations deals in terms with that matter. Counsel for the county council concedes that, having regard to the regulations which have been made, the employing authority are the persons charged with that duty. Whether he would have so conceded but for those regulations, I know not, but, for present purposes, I am prepared to assume that the regulations were properly made, allocating these duties to the employing authority.

We were then also referred to s. 6 of the Act, and, particularly, to s. 6 (5), which provides:

"If, in consequence of his incapacity to continue to discharge efficiently the duties of his post, a contributory employee is transferred to another post at a reduced remuneration, or otherwise suffers a reduction of remuneration, he shall be entitled to continue to contribute to the superannuation fund the like amount as if his remuneration had not been reduced."

Counsel for the plaintiff argues that that, again, is a matter more appropriate to be dealt with by the employing authority. Whatever may be the correct view of that matter, I pass to s. 10 (2), which provides:

"A contributory employee of an employing authority who, before becoming entitled to a superannuation allowance under this Part of this Act, ceases to be employed by them by reason of his voluntary resignation, or his resignation or dismissal in consequence of inefficiency, shall be entitled to receive out of the appropriate superannuation fund a sum equal to the aggregate amount of his contributions to the fund."

A That is to be contrasted with s. 10 (4), which provides:

"Where a contributory employee of an employing authority ceases to be employed by them in consequence of an offence of a fraudulent character, or ceases to be employed by them in consequence of misconduct and is not entitled to a superannuation allowance under this Part of this Act, the employing authority may, if they think fit, direct the return to him out of the appropriate superannuation fund of a sum equal to the whole or a part of the aggregate amount of his contributions to the fund, or, if he ceases to be employed in consequence of an offence of a fraudulent character, the payment out of that fund of an equivalent sum to his wife or family."

B It is to be observed that under s. 10 (4) the matter is discretionary, whereas under s. 10 (2) the person concerned is entitled in those circumstances to a return of his contributions. Counsel for the county council points out that, in effect, the contention of counsel for the plaintiff is that the function of the administering authority is as provided under s. 10 (4), i.e., their duty is merely to pay out on the direction of the employing authority. Counsel for the county council says that, if that had been the intention of the legislature, it would have been easy to say so, and that when they did so intend, as in the case of s. 10 (4), they expressed their intention in clear language.

C I do not think that this matter is by any means free from difficulty, but, having considered the arguments and the sections to which we have been referred, and, in particular, s. 22, which deals with the periodical valuations to be made in connection with superannuation funds, I have come to the conclusion that the argument of counsel for the county council should prevail. Section 22 provides for quinquennial valuations, the manner in which actuarial calculations are to be made, and the consideration of the reports. Section 22 (6) provides:

"Where by any valuation and report under this section a deficiency or a disposable surplus is disclosed, the administering authority shall, within three months after receiving the valuation and report, make a scheme for making good the deficiency or, as the case may require, for disposing of the surplus."

F Counsel for the plaintiff has drawn our attention to the Local Government Superannuation (Actuarial Valuations) Provisional Regulations, dated Mar. 18, 1939, with regard to the actuarial valuations made under s. 22 (3) of the Act. These regulations set out the manner in which the actuarial reports are to be made. Article 6 (2) provides:

G "In the report on the first valuation made under the Act, the statement referred to in para. (1) of this article shall be supplemented by a statement . . ."

and it sets out certain matters which have to be certified. Article 6 (3) provides:

H "This part of the report shall close with a recommendation as to the aggregate annual amount which should be paid into the fund during a period not exceeding forty years from the valuation date by each authority interested in the fund to meet such estimated liabilities as are certified under paras. (1) and (2) (a) of this article to have been imposed on funds."

Then, under the heading, "Valuation Results," art. 8 (1) provides:

"The following information shall be furnished in the fourth part of the report . . . (c) if a deficiency is disclosed, a statement indicating generally the factors which have caused the deficiency and a recommendation for the allocation of the deficiency among the authorities interested in the superannuation fund, indicating the basis adopted for the proposed allocation and the manner in which the deficiency should be liquidated."

When those reports have been received and considered, it will remain for the administering authority to make a scheme for dealing with a deficiency under s. 22 (6) of the Act, and, although I have no doubt that, in the main, the deficiency will normally be allocated to the different authorities interested in the fund proportionately to the claims which have arisen on the fund from their respective areas, the fact remains that it is one entire fund and no local authority have any right to any one particular portion of that fund. The administering authority have to deal with the fund as trustees, and, in my opinion, before they authorise the drawing of any cheques on the fund they have to be satisfied that circumstances have been established which justify their making payments.

In the result, I have come to the same conclusion as was arrived at by LORD GODDARD, C.J., viz., that for purposes of s. 35 of the Act "the authority concerned in this case are the administering authority, namely, the Buckinghamshire County Council and not the Eton Rural District Council. For those reasons, I think the appeal must fail.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. It was common ground between the parties, first, that the question turns on the meaning of the expression "the authority concerned" in s. 35 of the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, and, secondly, that this phrase does not necessarily connote either of the following two authorities, both of whom are defined in the Act, (i) the employing authority, or (ii) the administering authority, but that it might be one or the other according to the nature of the question to be decided under s. 35. Counsel for the plaintiff said that LORD GODDARD, C.J., rejected the second of those points, and held that "the authority concerned" must in all cases be the administering authority. I do not so read his judgment. Dealing with s. 8 and summarising the argument of counsel for the county council in the court below, he said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 797):

"[Counsel for the county council] points out that s. 8 of the Act merely gives an employee the right to receive a superannuation allowance if certain conditions are fulfilled, and does not confer a right or duty on any authority to make a decision, and, therefore, it is the authority who have to pay, i.e., the 'administering authority,' who must satisfy themselves that the employee has brought himself within the provisions of s. 8, and, if he has not done so, the 'administering authority' cannot pay, and have the right and the duty to refuse to pay . . . If they decide that he is not entitled to be paid, and the employee is dissatisfied with their decision, then, under s. 35 of the Act, the question concerning the rights of the employee is to be determined by the Minister . . ."

I think that LORD GODDARD, C.J., meant by that that the test to be applied was: Whose act gives rise to the question which falls for decision under s. 35? In the present case, and, indeed, in any case where a pension is refused under s. 8, the question arises because the administering authority refuse to pay, and, therefore, the administering authority are "the authority concerned." As I read it, that is the effect of the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., and with this reasoning I respectfully agree.

Counsel for the plaintiff gave a number of illustrations which, he said, threw light in particular cases on who are the administering authority. Like TUCKER, L.J., I do not derive very much assistance from those illustrations, because what we have to decide is who are "the authority concerned" in transactions under s. 8, but let me take two sections on which, I think, counsel for the plaintiff primarily relied. The first was s. 3 and on that, he said, it was plain that "the authority concerned " would be the employing authority. That was clear from the Local Government Superannuation (Administration) Regulations, 1938. Let me, however, consider the matter apart from the regulations and on the assumption that no regulations had been passed. How would the question arise? Section 3 deals with contributory employees, and if any person is a contributory employee he becomes subject to the contributions provided for in s. 6. If, therefore, an employing authority decide (whether or not they communicate their decision to the employee) that a person is a contributory employee, they will immediately deduct five per cent. of his remuneration from the employee's salary in accordance with s. 6. The question will then arise between the employee and the employing authority, because the employee will object to the deduction. That would clearly be a case where the employing authority are " the authority concerned " within s. 35. Let me suppose, however (an almost incredible thing to arise) that the deductions are made and that no objection is taken by the employee, that deductions go on quite happily until he retires from the service of the employing authority, and that he then demands from the administering authority payment of the pension to which he claims he is entitled under s. 8. It may well be (though it is not necessary for us to decide) that, if the administering authority were then to refuse payment, alleging that the employee had never become a contributory employee, that would be a question for the administering authority, and the contributor's only remedy for the refusal of his pension would be to appeal to the Minister. As I say, that does not arise for decision, and I only mention it because I do not think that, although counsel for the county council admitted that, having regard to the regulations passed by the Minister pursuant to his powers under s. 36 (6), it is clear that in questions arising under s. 3 the employing authority is " the authority concerned," we must necessarily conclude that his admission would have been the same if there had been no regulation.

The only other section to which I wish to refer is s. 10 (4). Counsel for the plaintiff said that it was quite clear that, in a case under s. 10 (4), " the authority concerned " must be the employing authority. I am not sure that I should draw the same conclusion from that sub-section as he would. No doubt, the employing authority are given power in that case, and in that case only, to direct the administering authority to return to an employee who has been dismissed for an offence involving fraud a sum equal to the whole or a part of the aggregate amount of his contributions to the fund. Let me suppose, however, that that direction is given, or that the employing authority thinks they have given that direction, but that, when the employee demands payment from the administering authority, the administering authority refuse payment, saying that the document relied on is not a direction which complies with the section. That would, it seems to me, be a question between the administering authority and the employee, and the Minister would have to decide whether or not the document was a direction which complied with the section. If the dispute was whether the employee had been dismissed for misconduct, and he claimed payment under s. 8, then, quite clearly, I think, for the reasons which TUCKER, L.J., has given, the position would be the same as in any other question whether the employee had been discharged in circumstances entitling him to a pension under s. 8, and the matter would be one for the decision of the administering authority who would be " the authority concerned."

Another point on which I wish to say a word is on the argument that was addressed to us that " he who pays the piper calls the tune." It was said that in the present case the whole of the fund out of which the employees of the Eton Rural District Council get their pension is provided by the rural district council, and, therefore, they must be the authority to decide whether or not the employee had fulfilled the conditions specified in s. 8 (1). I agree with TUCKER, L.J., that you cannot properly regard any part of the moneys in the pooled fund under the control of the Buckinghamshire County Council as the Eton Rural District

Council's own money. If during any quinquennial period any employee of the Eton Rural District Council became entitled to a pension, he would be entitled to be paid out of the full fund, though the payment of that pension to him might involve drawing on moneys which had not been contributed by the Eton Rural District Council. True it is that there are provisions in the Act which would enable the Buckinghamshire County Council to put forward a scheme under which the Eton Rural District Council would have to reimburse any excess drawings, but non constat that they are bound to do so or that necessarily that scheme would become law. In those circumstances, I do not think that the argument based on "he who pays the piper calls the tune" justifies us in departing from what, I think, is the true interpretation of the sections which we have had to consider. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), July 10, 11, 1950.]

An aircraft owned by the plaintiffs was damaged by a motor truck owned by the defendants and driven by a person alleged to be their servant or agent. The plaintiffs sued the defendants for damages for negligence and in their defence the defendants denied that the driver of the truck was negligent or that he was their servant or agent. Before a claim was made by the plaintiffs correspondence passed between the defendants and their insurance brokers and insurers, for which privilege was claimed. The plaintiffs disputed the claim to privilege on the ground that the documents did not belong to the class of documents which were privileged, and that in any case the court ought to look at them before deciding the question of privilege. E

HELD: (i) where, as in the present case, the circumstances were such that there could have been no doubt, even before a formal claim for damages was lodged, that a claim would ensue, prima facie communications between the assured and the insurance company, whether direct or through the brokers of the assured, were of a character in respect of which a claim to privilege was justified. G

(ii) if, looking at the affidavit of documents, the court found that the claim to privilege was formally correct, and that the documents in respect of which it was made were sufficiently identified and were such that, prima facie, the claim to privilege would appear to be properly made in respect of them, the court should, generally speaking, accept the affidavit as sufficiently justifying the claim without going further and inspecting the documents.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of PARKER, J., dated June 9, 1950, partly allowing the defendants' appeal from an order of a master ordering the defendants to disclose further documents, being communications between them and their insurers regarding the accident which gave rise to the action. The facts appear in the judgment of SINGLETON, L.J.

C. N. Shawcross, K.C., and Bickford Smith for the plaintiffs.

R. M. Everett for the defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of PARKER, J., who allowed in part an appeal from a master on a question of discovery of documents. The action was commenced on May 12, 1949, the statement of claim was delivered on May 14, and the defence on June 10. An amended statement of claim was delivered on Nov. 8. This alleges that the defendants were the owners of a motor truck and that the plaintiffs at all material times were the owners of a De Havilland "Dove" aircraft which was forced to land on a road in the district of Kuwait in the principality of Kuwait on the night of Nov. 25, 1947. Whilst the aeroplane was stationary, it is alleged, the motor truck was driven into it and caused severe damage to it. It is alleged, further, that at the time the truck was in the charge of the defendants' servant or agent, one Jackson, and driven by their servant or agent, one Hough. By their defence the defendants admit that they were the owners of the truck. They plead that neither of the individuals mentioned as being in charge of, or as driving, the truck was their servant or agent, and they deny negligence.

On Sept. 29, 1949, the defendants delivered a list of documents. It is not surprising that this was regarded by the plaintiffs' advisers as insufficient. The letter sets out a few documents in the first part, and below "documents for which privilege is claimed." There are four groups of them, and the only one which I need read is as follows: "Correspondence passing between the defendants and their insurers which by its nature is privileged." The plaintiffs contested the question of privilege and applied for an affidavit of documents and on May 18, 1950, the master made an order. In para. 2 he dealt in this way with the question of the documents for which privilege was claimed as I have stated:

"That the defendants do on four days' notice being given produce at the office of Messrs. Hair & Co., solicitors for the said defendants . . . the following documents, namely, correspondence between the defendants and their insurers listed in the second part of the defendants' list of documents dated Sept. 29, 1949, and that the plaintiffs be at liberty to inspect."

A

The defendants appealed to the judge in chambers, who adjourned the matter. On June 6, 1950, two affidavits were sworn by Mr. Angeloni, secretary of the defendant company. On June 9 the matter came before PARKER, J., again, and he allowed the appeal so far as it related to para. 2 of the order. It is against that part of his order that the plaintiffs appeal.

B

The first affidavit of Mr. Angeloni deals with the subject-matter of para. 2 of the order of the master, and says:

"The defendant company have in their possession or power documents passing between the defendants and their insurers set forth in the schedule hereto."

The schedule embraces some fifty documents, beginning with a letter of Dec. 19, 1947. The affidavit also says:

C

"The defendant company object to produce any of the documents set forth in the schedule hereto upon the ground that they came into existence and were made after litigation was in contemplation and in view of such litigation for the purpose of obtaining and furnishing to the solicitors of the defendant company evidence and information as to the evidence which could be obtained and otherwise for the use of the solicitors to enable them to conduct the defence in this action and to advise the defendants."

D

That claim is in a form which has been frequently before the courts. The appeal of the plaintiffs is purely in relation to the documents which are set forth in the schedule to this first affidavit, and in respect of which the defendants claim privilege.

The defendants have disclosed the first document mentioned in the schedule. That is a letter from the Tanker Insurance Company, Ltd., insurance brokers of the defendants, to the Royal Insurance Company, Ltd., dated Dec. 19, 1947. That letter says:

"Dear Sirs, Motor Vehicle Insurance, Kuwait Oil Company, Ltd. We enclose herewith a copy of a memorandum received to-day from Kuwait in connection with an accident occurring on Nov. 25 last. Pending any advices you may have, we are deferring acknowledgement of their communication."

The memorandum enclosed was a letter from the defendants' resident accountant at Kuwait to their London office, dated Dec. 3, 1947, and it is important to notice that that memorandum, as well as another memorandum, was disclosed by the defendants in a list of documents in the other affidavit, a list in respect of which privilege is not claimed.

G

In the second affidavit the secretary, having set out certain facts with regard to the ownership and use of the lorry, enclosed in the schedule of documents which are disclosed a memorandum from Mr. Campbell, the defendants' resident accountant in Kuwait, to the defendants in London, dated Nov. 27, 1947, and also a memorandum from Mr. Campbell to the defendants in London, dated Dec. 3, 1947, which is the document enclosed with the letter of Dec. 19. The second affidavit contains a number of other documents, but the plaintiffs have applied for, and have had access to, the two memoranda which I have mentioned, and, in particular, the one sent with the letter of Dec. 19, 1947, the letter being the first document, among others, for which privilege is claimed. The schedule to the first affidavit includes the item "Letter Claims Superintendent of Royal Insurance Company to Tanker Insurance Company, Dec. 22, 1947." Then the next item is: "Letter Claims Superintendent of Royal Insurance Company to Tanker Insurance Company, Dec. 23, 1947." The next document is a letter from the defendants to Mr. A. C. Wright, of the Tanker Insurance Company, dated Dec. 31, 1947, and to that document counsel for the plaintiffs, in his reply, said he attached considerable importance. It is of interest to notice that formal notice of claim in respect of this accident was given on Dec. 29, 1947, that is, before the date of the letter from the defendants to Mr. Wright of the Tanker Insurance Company, who were acting as their insurance brokers.

It is quite clear from the document enclosed with the letter of Dec. 19, 1947 (the memorandum from the Kuwait Oil Company, Kuwait, to the defendants in London), that there was more than a probability of litigation at the time of the writing of the memorandum which was prepared in December, 1947. That memorandum is in these terms:

"At about 7.30 p.m. on November 25 a Dove aircraft belonging to the Westminster Airways made a forced landing on the Burgan Magwa road about two miles from Magwa. Through electric storms and inability to make contact with Basrah airport the pilot had lost his bearings and landed where he did to inquire of his whereabouts from someone at Magwa. A few minutes later a Pickup [the truck] coming from the direction of Burgan crashed into the aircraft which was still on the road and caused extensive damage. The accident was peculiar, to say the least of it, and we were advised by a member of the staff of airworks who are here that the Ministry of Civil Aviation would probably require a court of inquiry. The political agent was asked to do this and agreed, but subsequently stated that to take evidence on oath a case would have to be raised against the driver of the vehicle who was Mr. H. H. Hough, a driller, who, incidentally, had tendered his resignation some few days previously. We were not prepared to state a case against Hough but the pilot of the aircraft did so and Hough was tried in the political agent's court for driving without due care and in such a way as might cause hurt. The result of the case was that Hough was found guilty and a fine of Rs.500 was imposed. The political agent has left Kuwait for a few days, but on his return we will obtain from him a certified copy of the particulars, evidence etc., in the case and forward it to you so that if any legal action follows the facts will be available to you."

That document has been disclosed, as has the earlier memorandum to which I referred.

The formal claim is from Lloyd's sub-agent on Dec. 29, 1947:

"Dear Sirs, Dove Aircraft G/AKET. Under instructions from Lloyd's, London, we hereby give you formal notice of their intention to lodge a claim against you for the loss of, and damage to, the above aircraft on Nov. 25, 1947."

It is obvious from the nature of the accident and from the document of Dec. 31, 1947, that litigation was anticipated before the actual claim was received.

Counsel for the plaintiffs claims that the further documents set out in the schedule to the first affidavit are not privileged, and, furthermore, he submits that the court ought to look at them before deciding that they are privileged. PARKER, J., did not think it necessary to do so, nor do I. The court ought to regard the defendants' affidavit as covering the question unless there is some reason to cast doubt on it. The defendants have now disclosed documents up to a time when it was clear beyond doubt, if not it was not clear before, that litigation was imminent, and the documents thereafter came into existence for the purpose of providing information on which the defendants' solicitors could meet any claim which was made, and which they anticipated would be made.

In support of the appeal counsel for the plaintiffs relied chiefly on two authorities. The first is Jones v. Great Central Ry. Co. (1), the headnote of which is as follows ([1910] A.C. 4):

"A member of a trade union who had been dismissed by his employers furnished the union authorities, as required by the rules, with information in writing to enable the authorities to decide whether he was entitled to bring an action for wrongful dismissal at the expense of the union and with the assistance of their solicitor. The information comprised the evidence available in support of the action and the names of the witnesses. The union authorities sanctioned an action brought by the member, with their solicitor acting as solicitor for the plaintiff. Upon a summons for discovery taken out by the defendants:—Held, that the letters containing the information did not fall within the established rule as to the privilege between solicitor and client and must be produced."

LORD LOREBURN, L.C., said (ibid., 5):

"The question arises as follows: Godfrey Jones, a servant of the defendant railway company, had a dispute with his official superiors which ended in his dismissal. He thought himself aggrieved and brought this action. He was a member of a trade union on terms which entitled him to a variety of benefits, and among others to the right of receiving legal assistance in case of unjust dismissal. In such case he was bound by the rules to give full particulars to the authorities of the trade union, and the sanction of the executive committee or of the general secretary was needed before a solicitor was engaged. In the present instance certain letters passed between Godfrey Jones and the officials of the union, containing information about the dispute. They were written before any action was brought in order to satisfy the union authorities that they ought to sanction the employment of a solicitor and to furnish information by which the solicitor should be enabled to conduct the action which the workman contemplated and desired."

The learned Lord Chancellor held, and the other Law Lords agreed, that those documents were not privileged. That case seems to be quite different from the case before this court.

The other authority was Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia (2), the headnote of which is:

"A bill was filed against a banking company to compel them to replace a sum of money alleged to have been improperly transferred by them from one account to another at their branch bank in Oregon. Before the bill was filed, but after litigation had become highly probable, the manager in London telegraphed to the manager in Oregon to send full particulars of the whole transaction. On an application by the plaintiffs in the suit for production of documents, the bank resisted production of the letter sent in answer, as being privileged:—Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the letter was not privileged, and must be produced."

Counsel for the plaintiffs relied chiefly on the judgment of JAMES, L.J., in the Court of Appeal, but it is useful to look at the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. The Master of the Rolls, having referred to the words of LORD BROUGHAM, L.C., in Greenough v. Gaskell (3) and to LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.'s summary of that decision in Reid v. Langlois (4), went on to say ((1876) 2 Ch.D. 649):

"The object and meaning of the rule is this: that as, by reason of the complexity and difficulty of our law, litigation can only be properly conducted by professional men, it is absolutely necessary that a man, in order to prosecute his rights or to defend himself from an improper claim, should have recourse to the assistance of professional lawyers, and it being so absolutely necessary, it is equally necessary, to use a vulgar phrase, that he should be able to make a clean breast of it to the gentleman whom he consults with a view to the prosecution of his claim, or the substantiating his defence against the claim of others; that he should be able to place unrestricted and unbounded confidence in the professional agent, and that the communications he so makes to him should be kept secret, unless with his consent (for it is his privilege, and not the privilege of the confidential agent), that he should be enabled properly to conduct his litigation. That is the meaning of the rule. Now, as to the extent of the rule. It goes not merely to a communication made to the professional agent himself by the client directly, it goes to all communications made by the client to the solicitor through intermediate agents, and he is not bound to write letters through the post, or to go himself personally to see the solicitor; he may employ a third person to write the letter, or he may send the letters through a messenger, or he may give a verbal message to a messenger, and ask him to deliver it to the solicitor, with a view to his prosecuting his claim, or of substantiating his defence."

The judgment of JAMES, L.J., appears to me to limit the privilege rather more strictly than has been done in some of the other cases. I do not propose to read it all, but there is one short passage which I think I ought to read (ibid., 656):

"Looking at the dicta and the judgments cited, they might require to be fully considered, but I think they may possibly all be based upon this, which is an intelligible principle, that as you have no right to see your adversary's brief, you have no right to see that which comes into existence merely as the materials for the brief."

It was held on the facts of that case both by the Court of Appeal and by the Master of the Rolls in the court of first instance that the document—the report from the manager in Oregon to the general manager—was not privileged. Again, I think, that case can be distinguished from the present case. In matters of this kind which, as counsel for the defendants put it, involve a certain amount of discretion, it really is a question on which side of the line a case falls.

I need only refer to two authorities cited in support of the order of PARKER, J. The first, Birmingham and Midland Motor Omnibus Co., Ltd. v. London and North Western Ry. Co. (5). The headnote states:

"In an affidavit of documents on behalf of the defendants in an action of negligence privilege was claimed for certain documents in a schedule to the affidavit on the ground that 'they came into existence and were made after this litigation was in contemplation and in view of such litigation for the purpose of obtaining for and furnishing to the solicitor of the defendant company evidence and information as to the evidence which could be obtained and otherwise for the use of the said solicitor to enable him to conduct the defence in this action and to advise the defendants.' A judge at chambers, after inspecting the documents under the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 19A (2), made an order by which some of the documents were protected and others were ordered to be disclosed, the dividing line being drawn at the date on which the plaintiffs first preferred their claim against the defendants:—Held, first, that the judge at chambers and the Court of Appeal were entitled under R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 19A (2), to inspect the documents for the purpose of deciding on the validity of the claim of privilege, as no particular formula of words in the affidavit could be conclusive against evidence furnished by the documents themselves; and, secondly, after inspecting the documents, that protection had been appropriately claimed for them by the affidavit and that the dividing line drawn by the judge in chambers was inappropriate in the particular case. It is not necessary that the affidavit should state that the information was obtained 'solely' or 'merely' or 'primarily' for the solicitor, if it was obtained for the solicitor in the sense of being procured as materials upon which professional advice should be taken in proceedings pending, or threatened, or anticipated."

There are three matters which come to mind in regard to that decision. The first is that the claim of the defendants to privilege was upheld on the wording of the affidavit and that the wording of the present affidavit in the present case is similar in all respects; the second is—as it makes quite clear, and, indeed, the rule itself makes it clear—that it is open to the court to look at the documents themselves in order to ascertain whether they are privileged or not, if the court thinks it necessary so to do. The third is that the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs that one cannot determine whether a document is privileged or not without looking at it must be considered in regard to the affidavit, and it is not necessary that the affidavit should state that the information is obtained solely for the use of the solicitor. There may be other purposes allied to that purpose of a kind which would not of themselves be privileged.

In the course of his judgment BUCKLEY, L.J., said ([1913] 3 K.B. 856):

"The question for determination here is I think whether the documents in question fall within the principle of"

Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia (2) or within that of Southwark Water Co. v. Quick (6). BUCKLEY, L.J., continued, referring to Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia (2) (ibid., 856):

"The resulting document was not privileged, and this upon the ground that it was not a confidential communication obtained by or for the solicitor or as materials forming, as it is called, part of the brief of the party making the affidavit."

HAMILTON, L.J., said (ibid., 858):

"Although an affidavit of discovery cannot be controversially challenged, as by cross-examination, counter-affidavit, or administration of interrogatories, Jones v. Monto Video Gas Co. (7) lays down authoritatively how and how far it can be challenged otherwise: 'If from the affidavit itself, or from the documents therein referred to, or from an admission in the pleadings of the party from whom discovery is sought, the master or judge is of opinion that the affidavit is insufficient, he ought to make an order for a further affidavit, but except in cases of this description no right to a further affidavit exists.' Now that r. 19A (2) has given the judge power to inspect documents as to which there is a disputed claim of privilege, the documents which are not disclosed are available, either at the instance of the opposite party or in the discretion of the judge himself, as material on which to shew the insufficiency of the affidavit, because both are equally 'documents therein referred to'."

Dealing with the facts of the case, HAMILTON, L.J., said (ibid., 861):

"Hence I should not have been disposed to interfere with the order which BUCKNILL, J., in his discretion made as to particular documents, but on examining them I think he has proceeded on a wrong principle. He has drawn his distinguishing line by the date at which the defendants first received a letter of claim from the plaintiffs, a test which, though often unexceptionable, and particularly so in mercantile disputes, is inappropriate in such a case as the present, where, as in Collins v. London General Omnibus Co. (8), at the very moment when the accident occurs an ordinary employee can anticipate that litigation in respect of it will probably ensue."

The formal notice of claim in the case under appeal was not made until Dec. 29, but if ever a claim could be anticipated after an accident, I should think this is the case. It was, indeed, an unusual case. Heavy damage was done, it is claimed by the statement of claim, and I should think myself that everyone must have anticipated at once that a claim would follow. The privilege claimed is in respect of documents at a date considerably after the date of the accident.

A The other case on which counsel for the defendants relied is Adam S.S. Co., Ltd. v. London Assurance Corpn. (9). It is not necessary to go into the facts of that case, but I draw attention to the judgment of BUCKLEY, L.J., where, on an affidavit in much the same form as the present one, he said ([1914] 3 K.B. 1259):

B "To my mind that is a complete and satisfactory claim of privilege based upon the grounds recognised in Birmingham and Midland Motor Omnibus Co., Ltd. v. London and North Western Ry. Co. (5). The question to be answered is this: Is the judge satisfied that the documents, which are sought to be protected, were bona fide obtained for the solicitor, though not actually by him? Were they documents obtained for the purpose of being used, not necessarily in an existing litigation, but in an anticipated litigation?"

KENNEDY, L.J., said (ibid., 1260):

C "Assuming that to be so, these letters were written after the first step had been taken which put the parties, as has been said, at arm's length. The defendants in their list of documents, which is to be treated as if it were an affidavit of documents, claim privilege for them. To my mind they clearly appear privileged. They were letters which passed between the salvage association and their agents in Perim for the purpose of being used by the underwriters in a litigation which was obviously threatened and impending, and they were letters written for the purpose of obtaining or giving advice on the subject; and counsel has assured us that the only letters for which privilege is claimed are of that character. Upon principle as well as upon authority the documents are privileged."

E In my view, the documents set out in the schedule to the first affidavit fall within the line of authorities relied on by the defendants rather than upon those relied upon by the plaintiffs, and I am of opinion that the order of PARKER, J., was right, and that the claim to privilege is established. I do not find it necessary, for the reasons I have given, to look at the documents themselves. I am satisfied on the whole that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

F JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The claim for further discovery, as developed in argument before us, was not to the effect that the claim to privilege was wholly bad on the face of it, with the result that the whole of the documents to which that claim related should be disclosed, but was argued on the lines that here was a dubious claim to privilege which might, or might not, be justified, and that the proper course in the circumstances was for the court itself to inspect the documents and decide how far, if at all, they were privileged documents. It is not open to doubt that under R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 19A (2), the court has power in a proper case to inspect documents where a claim of privilege is set up against a claim for inspection of documents by the opposite party. Birmingham and Midland Omnibus Co., Ltd. v. London and North Western Ry. Co. (5), to which my Lord has already referred, affords an illustration of a case in which the court

G did take that course, and, as it happened, having done so, held that the claim to privilege was well founded, but there is nothing in the rule or in the authorities to constrain the court to hold that in every case where a claim to privilege is made and disputed the party seeking production is entitled to come to the court and (as it were) demand as of right that the court should go behind the oath of the opposite party and itself inspect the documents. The question whether the court should inspect the documents is one which is a matter for the discretion of the court, and primarily for the judge of first instance. Each case must depend on its own circumstances, but if, looking at the affidavit, the court finds that the claim to privilege is formally correct, and that the documents in respect of which it is made are sufficiently identified and are such that, prima facie, the claim to privilege would appear to be properly made in respect of them, then, in my judgment, the court should, generally speaking, accept the affidavit as sufficiently justifying the claim without going further and inspecting the documents.

Considering this matter from that point of view, I find that the documents in respect of which privilege is claimed are communications passing between the defendants and their insurance brokers and insurers with respect to the accident which gave rise to the claim in the action, and that the claim to privilege in respect of those communications is made in the usual and regular form. In my judgment, prima facie, those documents are of a character in respect of which the claim to privilege is justified. The insurers, after all, are concerned in the matter only because they have agreed by the contract of insurance to indemnify their assured against claims of the character in question. That is how they come into it. That being so, the very fact that the insurance company is communicated with at all indicates that a claim is anticipated. Moreover, in the present case, the circumstances were such that there could be no doubt, even before a formal claim was lodged, that a claim would ensue. Prima facie, in such circumstances a communication between the assured and the insurance company, whether direct or through the assured's brokers, would be directed to the question whether the claim should be disputed or admitted, and if it was to be disputed, how best to conduct the defence. If the communications were of that character, then, in my judgment, they would be well within the privileged area, and the deponent to the affidavit claims that they were in fact within the privileged area by making in respect of them the claim to privilege in the usual general form. In those circumstances, it seems to me that on the face of the affidavit here a prima facie case of privilege is made out.

Counsel for the plaintiffs said that the court ought to go behind that claim, because the insurance company is not concerned, or not primarily concerned, with the defence of the expected action, or with the collecting of information and advice to that end, unless and until it has admitted liability. He, therefore, in effect, invites the court to read through the correspondence and find out when it was that the insurance company, having admitted liability, identified itself, so to speak, with the defendants' side of the matter. He was, as I understood him, prepared to agree that after that point was reached, what ensued would be privileged from discovery. In my judgment, this suggestion of a possibility of a dispute as to liability on the part of the insurance company is not enough to make it proper for the court to go behind the affidavit in the present case. There is, in fact, no reason to suppose that the insurance company ever did dispute liability, and, on the other hand, it is on the whole unlikely that they would ever categorically, and in so many words, have said to the defendants: "We acknowledge that we are liable to indemnify you." In the circumstances of this case, therefore, there seems no reason to suppose that the search we are invited to embark on by counsel for the plaintiffs would result in arriving at the dividing line which he suggests. The whole of this correspondence took place after it had become obvious from the accident itself that a claim was likely to ensue, and for the reasons I have endeavoured to state, I think that in the circumstances of this case, PARKER, J., having exercised his discretion in the matter, the order he has made should stand.

I should, perhaps, mention an unreported case from Southern Ireland to which we were referred, the case of Coss v. National Maternity Hospital (10), a decision of NIXON, J. The case is of interest because the learned judge had to deal with the question of privilege in regard to correspondence between an insurance company and the defendants and their solicitors and so had before him the very matter with which we are concerned. In that case the judge held, with regard to the correspondence, that the proper course for him to take was to look at the documents under the general power given by the corresponding rule in Southern Ireland, and he said this:

A “So far as a line of demarcation may apply, I conceive it should not have reference to the date of the making of a claim by the plaintiffs, but to the point of time, if ascertainable, at which the insurance company ceased to be interested or concerned in the matter from the point of view of their own liability to their insured, and acquired instead the character of agents, even prospectively, for the legal advisers of the defendants. Having inspected the documents, I think the line of demarcation should be drawn at the letter of Aug. 23, 1946, from the insurance company to the assistant secretary of the defendants. The plaintiffs are entitled, in my view, to inspection of documents within the description in item 21 up to and including that date.”

B The judge in that case thus took the view which we were invited by counsel for the plaintiffs to adopt. With respect to the judge, I think that is too narrow a view to form the foundation of any general rule. After all, it must be remembered that the documents are documents with respect to which privilege has been claimed on oath, and, for the reasons I have endeavoured to state, they are documents in respect of which, prima facie, the claim to privilege would appear to be proper. I, therefore, cannot see that it would be right to lay down any general rule to the effect that in all such cases it is necessary to peruse the document for the purpose of arriving at a line of demarcation such as the judge in Southern Ireland described. Of the authorities cited to us, it seems to me that D the one nearest in point is the Adam S.S. Co., Ltd. v. London Assurance Corpn. (9), in which the Court of Appeal, looking at the affidavit and the nature of the documents, held—so far as appears from the report, without inspecting them—that the claim to privilege made in the affidavit was properly made, and disposed of the matter on that footing. For these reasons I agree that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

DOLLFUS MIEG ET COMPAGNIE S.A. v. BANK OF ENGLAND.

G [CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), July 19, 20, 1950.]

H Practice—Parties—Adding defendants—Applicants not asserting title to property, but claiming possession or control through bank as bailee—Invocation of doctrine of immunity of foreign sovereign States—Applicants not necessary parties at commencement of action—Action against Bank of England for delivery up of gold bars deposited with bank by governments of United Kingdom, United States of America, and France—Application by governments of United States and France to be added as defendants—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11.

A French company was the owner of sixty-four identifiable gold bars which were looted by the Germans during their occupation of France and were later found and seized by the Allied armies. Custody of the bars was acquired by a Tripartite Commission, consisting of representatives of the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, and France, which was set up under treaty arrangements between the United Nations for the purpose of acquiring and eventually distributing, in accordance with the provisions of the treaty, the gold and treasure looted by the Germans. The sixty-four gold bars were conveyed to England and deposited by the commission with the Bank of England, and, on learning this, the French company asserted its claim to them. On Oct. 18, 1948, the company issued the writ in an action against the bank claiming delivery up of the bars or damages for their detention. The bank applied for an order to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings on the ground that the bars were in the possession or under the control of the governments of the United States of America, France, and the United Kingdom and the action impleaded two foreign sovereign States, viz., the governments of the United States and France, who declined to submit to the jurisdiction. The case proceeded on the basis that the bars were returnable in specie to the three governments on demand and the judge made the order which was asked for. The company appealed and, at the conclusion of the argument before the Court of Appeal, the bank put fresh evidence before the court, viz., that, although it had segregated all the sixty-four bars at the request of the Tripartite Commission, it had inadvertently sold thirteen of them while the action was pending. As a result of this fresh evidence, the Court of Appeal allowed the company's appeal, but gave leave to the bank to appeal to the House of Lords. The governments of the United States of America and France now applied under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, to be added as defendants to the action. For the purpose of the application they did not assert a title to the bars, but they contended that, if they could establish that they had possession or control of them through the bank, the company would fail to obtain from the court an order in its favour by reason of the doctrine of immunity which applied to foreign sovereign States, and, therefore, the applicants would retain possession and control over the bars and be able to dispose of them.

HELD : (i) in determining whether or not the applicants had a proprietary right in the subject-matter of the action sufficient to entitle them to be joined as defendants, the true test lay, not so much in an analysis of what were the constituents of their rights, but rather in what would be the result on the subject-matter of the action if their rights could be established. Although the applicants did not assert title to the gold bars, the result of a successful intervention by them would be that, as between the company and themselves, they would, for all practical purposes, be the true owners, and, therefore, although their right arose indirectly, viz., by the invocation of the doctrine of immunity and through the bank as bailee, they had a direct interest in the subject-matter of the action which was similar to a proprietary right and was of such a nature as would entitle them to an order that they be joined as defendants, if it could be shown that in their absence their claim would not effectually be put forward.

(ii) to invoke the jurisdiction of the court under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, it was not necessary to show that the intervener ought to have been joined in the action, for the rule conferred a wide jurisdiction on the court to entertain an application at any stage of the proceedings and gave to the court a general discretion to bring in an intervener so that the questions involved in the action might be completely adjudicated on and settled, and, therefore, although the applicants were not necessary parties at the commencement of the action, they could now be added as defendants if the result of the disclosure in the fresh evidence before the Court of Appeal made their presence necessary to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate on the matter.

(iii) in view of the applicants' submission that the bank might, on one view of the matter, find itself liable to the applicants for the value (approximately £300,000) of the gold bars, the court had grounds for being satisfied that the bank would now find itself seriously embarrassed in prosecuting the case on behalf of the applicants, and, therefore, the court was entitled to exercise its jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, by adding the applicants as defendants to the action.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS by which the governments of the United States of

E America and the Republic of France applied under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, to be added as defendants in an action by a French company, Dollfus Mieg et Compagnie S.A., against the Bank of England, claiming the delivery up of sixty-four gold bars which had been looted from the plaintiffs by the Germans during their occupation of France, recovered from Germany by the Allied armies, and deposited with the Bank of England by the governments of the United States

F of America, the United Kingdom, and France, as members of the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold. The bank applied for an order to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action as the bars were in the possession and under the control of the three governments concerned and the action impleaded two foreign sovereign States, viz., the United States of

G America and France, who declined to submit to the jurisdiction of the court. The case proceeded on the basis that the bars were returnable in specie to the three governments on demand, and on Apr. 6, 1949, JENKINS, J., made the order asked for : see [1949] 1 All E.R. 946. The company appealed, and, at the end of the argument before the Court of Appeal, fresh evidence was submitted by the bank that, while the action was pending, one of its subordinate officers

H had inadvertently disposed of some of the bars in the course of the bank's business. After considering this evidence, the Court of Appeal allowed the company's appeal: see [1950] 1 All E.R. 747, but gave the bank leave to appeal to the House of Lords. The applicants, the governments of the United States of America and the Republic of France, now moved the court for an order that they be joined as defendants, on the ground that, in view of the fresh evidence, their presence as defendants was necessary to enable the court to adjudicate effectually and completely in the matter.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and Denys B. Buckley for the applicants.

Cross, K.C., and J. R. C. Lee for the defendants, the Bank of England.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and R. O. Wilberforce for the plaintiffs.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This is a summons by the governments of the United States of America and the Republic of France for an order that they may be added as defendants to an action brought by a French company, Dollfus Mieg et Compagnie, S.A., against the Bank of England, and for certain consequential relief. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The application is made under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, which reads:

"No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or non-joinder of parties, and the court may in every cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the court or a judge to be just, order that the names of any parties improperly joined, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants, be struck out, and that the names of any parties, whether plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter, be added."

The general rule is, I think, accurately stated in THE ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1949, p. 253, in these words:

"Generally in common law and chancery matters a plaintiff who conceives that he has a cause of action against a defendant is entitled to pursue his remedy against that defendant alone. He cannot be compelled to proceed against other persons whom he has no desire to sue."

In Norris v. Beazley (1), the defendant, in an action on a bill of exchange against the acceptor, sought to add the name of a company as defendants under R.S.C., 1875, Ord. 16, r. 13 (the rule to which the present r. 11 corresponds), on the grounds that:

"It was alleged by the defendant that the acceptance was given for the purchase-money of a ship which he had agreed to purchase of the plaintiffs; that in entering into the agreement for such purchase he had acted as a trustee for the company, to whom the ship was afterwards conveyed in pursuance of the agreement, and that the plaintiffs made fraudulent representations with regard to the ship, by reason of which the company had been put to useless expense, which they claimed to recover from the plaintiffs."

The court, consisting of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., DENMAN and GROVE, JJ., refused the application. LORD COLERIDGE, having considered the wording of the rule, and, in particular, the last words of it, said (2 C.P.D. 83):

"It seems to me to be correctly argued that those words plainly imply that the defendant to be added must be a defendant against whom the plaintiff has some cause of complaint, which ought to be determined in the action, and that it was never intended to apply where the person to be added as defendant is a person against whom the plaintiff has no claim, and does not desire to prosecute any. It seems to me that this application is answered, and that it was not intended that persons in the position of this company should be added as defendants, merely for the convenience of another defendant between whom and the company there may be questions which will afterwards have to be settled. It seems to me that it is the more important to construe this rule strictly, because it is obvious that, in many cases, if the defendant's contention is right, its provisions might be made use of in a manner exceedingly harassing to plaintiffs, by forcing them to include in their actions persons against whom they do not seek to proceed, and to mix up their rights, as against one person, with questions of a highly complicated nature arising between themselves and others."

In the middle of his judgment, DENMAN, J., said (ibid., 85):

A "I am quite clear, however, that the court ought not to bring in any person as defendant against whom the plaintiff does not desire to proceed, unless a very strong case is made out, showing that in the particular case justice cannot be done without his being brought in."

B In McCheane v. Gyles (No. 2) (2), a single defendant, who was a trustee being sued for breach of trust, desired to bring in a person, resident in Ireland, who was the legal personal representative of his co-trustee. A third-party notice, by which the defendant claimed a contribution from the co-trustee's estate, and an order giving leave to serve it on the legal personal representative in Ireland, were set aside by the Court of Appeal, but without prejudice to an application by the defendant under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, to add the legal personal representative as a defendant to the action. BUCKLEY, J., held that the legal personal representative ought not to be added as a defendant against the plaintiff's wish. C In his judgment the learned judge said ([1902] 1 Ch. 914):

"The cestui que trust, who is the plaintiff in these proceedings, says, 'There were two trustees, John Cronyn and the defendant Gyles. They committed a breach of trust, and were under a joint and several liability in respect of it. Gyles is liable; I elect to sue him alone.' The plaintiff is not bound to sue both the trustees." D

HIS LORDSHIP then considered the wording of the rule, and a number of authorities, and said (ibid., 917):

E "Looking at the rule you must, in order to say that a person who is not a party ought to be added, find either that he 'ought to have been joined,' or that his 'presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter.' I cannot hold that the plaintiff ought to have joined Mrs. Cronyn as a defendant, and her presence is not necessary to enable the court to decide whether Gyles is liable for a breach of trust. Moreover, if Mrs. Cronyn were joined as a defendant and the plaintiff F did not make any allegation against her, she might ask to be dismissed from the action."

Those two cases are examples of the general rule, and it will be observed that both cases rested on the ground that, in the circumstances of each of them, the court had no jurisdiction to make the order asked for. There are, however, certain exceptions to the general rule, conveniently divided in THE ANNUAL G PRACTICE, 1949, p. 254, into three classes, and prefaced—in my view, accurately—with the words: "Generally speaking, intervention can only be insisted upon in three classes of case." The first of these three classes is a representative action where the person seeking to intervene is one of a class whom the plaintiff H claims to represent and the intervener is unwilling that the plaintiff should represent him. In such a case the intervener can insist on being added as a defendant. The second class of case is where the proprietary rights of the intervener are directly affected by the proceedings. The third class of case concerns actions for specific performance of contracts where third parties have an interest in the question of the manner in which the contract should be performed. The applicants, strictly speaking, do not come within any of the three classes. The first and third classes, clearly, are not applicable. As regards the second class of case, the applicants—at any rate, so far as regards the purposes for which they desire to be joined as defendants—do not seek to set up any proprietary rights in the sense in which that phrase was used in Vavasasseur v. Krupp (3). In that case, a foreign sovereign, the Mikado of Japan, bought in Germany shells made there, but said to be infringements of an English patent. The shells were brought to this country to be put on board a ship of war, which had been built for the Mikado in this country, with a view to being used as ammunition for the guns of that ship. The patentee obtained an injunction against the agents of the foreign sovereign, as the persons in whose custody the shells were, restraining him from removing the shells. The Mikado then applied to be made a defendant in the suit. Both JESSEL, M.R., and the Court of Appeal held that, notwithstanding the injunction, he ought to be free to remove the shells. In his judgment, JAMES, L.J., said (9 C.D. 354):

"It is an undoubted and admitted fact that the Mikado of Japan, who is a sovereign prince, bought in Germany a certain quantity of shells, which shells were lawfully made in Germany, although they were, as alleged, made upon the same principle as something which is the subject of a patent in this country. Those shells were bought by the Mikado for the purpose of his government. He brought them into this country on the way to Japan, and he asks to be allowed to remove them from this country, that is to say, he asks that he shall not, by reason of something which was done between the plaintiff and some other persons, be interfered with in his removal of them to his own country. It seems to me that to refuse him that leave would be a very dangerous proceeding."

JAMES, L.J., then dealt with the plaintiff's objections (ibid., 355):

"The plaintiff says, 'True it is that these shells were your property; you had brought them to this country in transitu to Japan, and you had no doubt a right so to bring them. But some persons in this country, either with or without your authority—with your authority it may be, but at all events having possession of these things as your agents—were minded to make, and did make, a use of these shells which was inconsistent with our patent, that is to say they were making a profitable use of them.' If they were doing so, then they are liable in an action for damages, and the plaintiff may recover any damages that he may be entitled to. But that does not interfere with the rights of the sovereign of Japan, who now asks to be allowed to take his property. It was his property. It is now in the shape in which it was when he lawfully bought it in Germany, where it was lawfully made, and he asks to be allowed to take it out of this country in that shape."

Indeed, through the rest of his judgment, JAMES, L.J., emphasised the point, and again, at the end of his judgment, he made it quite clear that he was resting his decision on what he described as the undoubted and admitted fact that the property in question was the property of the Mikado, the intervener.

On the other hand, it is to be observed, as I have already mentioned, that in THE ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1949, p. 254, the description of the classes of case in which intervention can be insisted on is prefaced by the words "Generally speaking." The authorities furnish instances of when intervention will be allowed and when it will not, and from those authorities the general rule embracing the three classes in question has been evolved, but in no case has the court attempted to lay down in an exhaustive statement all the cases in which the court will allow or refuse applications for the joinder of new defendants. On one side of the line is Moser v. Marsden (4), which establishes that an indirect interest on the part of an intervener is not sufficient. In that case the plaintiff, the patentee of a machine, brought an action against the defendant for using a machine which he alleged was an infringement of his patent. The maker and patentee of the defendant's machine applied to be added as a defendant, alleging that a judgment in the action would injure him, and that the existing defendant would not efficiently defend the action. The application was refused by the Court of Appeal, reversing the decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster. In his judgment, LINDLEY, L.J., having referred to R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, said ([1892] 1 Ch. 490):

“ In order to properly understand the rule we must look at the whole of it.

A It begins by saying, ‘ No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties ’—that is the key to the whole section: if the court cannot decide the question without the presence of other parties, the cause is not to be defeated, but the parties are to be added so as to put the proper parties before the court . . . Can it be said that the rule prevents the plaintiff from proceeding against a defendant without having to litigate with everybody who may be in any way affected, however indirectly, by the action? It appears to me that it does not. The counsel for the applicant B grounded his argument on the allegation that Montfort’s interest would be affected by the decision in this action. It is true that his interest may be affected commercially by a judgment against the defendant, but can it be said that it would be legally affected? Can we stretch the rule so far as to say that whenever a person would be incidentally affected by a judgment he may be added as a defendant? No case has been cited that goes so far as that: C Vavas seur v. Krupp (3), and Apollinaris Co. v. Wilson (5), are the nearest to the present case. But in both those cases the proceedings affected the property of persons not before the court. I can understand the application of the rule where the property of a third party is affected. He may well say, ‘ I am not to be deprived of my property in my absence.’ But this case does not come up to that.”

D On the other side of the line is Vavas seur v. Krupp (3), to which I have already referred, which established that a proprietary right of the proposed defendant in the subject-matter of the action is sufficient. The question here is: On which side of the line does this case fall? For the purposes of this application, the applicants do not assert a title to the property in question, and, therefore, it cannot be asserted E that they have a proprietary right, as that phrase is used in Vavas seur v. Krupp (3). What they assert is that, if they can establish that they have possession or control of the property in question through the defendant bank, then, by virtue of the doctrine of immunity which applies to foreign sovereign States, two results might well follow: (i) the plaintiffs must fail to obtain any order from this court in their favour, and (ii) the applicants will retain the possession and F control over the remaining bars of gold, and will be able to dispose of them. In other words, although the applicants do not assert title to the bars of gold, the result of a successful intervention by them would be that, as between the plaintiffs and themselves, they would, for all practical purposes, be the owners. It seems to me that the true test lies not so much in an analysis of what are the constituents of the applicants’ rights, but rather in what would be the result on G the subject-matter of the action if those rights could be established. That is the approach which I have made. Viewing the matter in this way, it is impossible, in my judgment, to say that the applicants have only an indirect interest of the nature which fell to be considered in Moser v. Marsden (4). They appear to me to have something more, namely, a right, which, although it may arise indirectly, viz., by the invocation of the doctrine of immunity and through H the defendant bank as bailee, nevertheless results in a direct interest in the subject-matter of this action, and is a right nearly akin to the proprietary right which was under consideration in Vavas seur v. Krupp (3). There is no authority directly bearing on the point, but, on the analysis which I have made of the nature of the applicants’ interest in the matter, I have come to the conclusion that I ought not to say that I have no jurisdiction to entertain the application on the short ground which counsel for the plaintiffs put forward, viz., that the applicants could not show a proprietary right, and, therefore, did not come within the second of the three classes of case to which I have referred, but that I am dealing with a right of such a nature as, on an application by applicants in the position of the present applicants, should result in an order that they be joined as defendants, provided it can be shown that in their absence the claim to the right will not effectually be put forward.

To accede to the application I have to be satisfied either that the applicants are persons who ought to have been joined as defendants or that they are persons

“... whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter...”

As regards the first limb, it cannot be said that at the commencement of the action they were necessary parties. The action, as it stands, was properly constituted by suing the Bank of England as bailee, and, if any authority be wanted for that proposition, it is provided by Wilson v. Anderton (6). Does the case then fall within the language of the alternative provision which I have read? I do not consider it necessary in the circumstances to pause with a view to inquiring whether, if this application had been made at an early stage in the action, it would have been successful. As has emerged from what I have said, no difficulty was experienced in the early stages of the action in dealing, in the absence of the applicants with the point which they desire to argue, and, had it not been for the matters disclosed in the fresh evidence which was brought before the Court of Appeal, it is quite clear that this application would never have been considered necessary to be made. The rule is wide enough to allow the court to entertain an application at any stage of the proceedings, and I can see no reason, on the facts before me, for saying that there can be any objection to the application from the point of view of the stage of the proceedings at which it is made.

D

The crux of the matter appears to me to be this. Is the result of the disclosure in the further evidence such that I can now justifiably say that the presence of the applicants before the court is necessary to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate on this question, which up to now has been argued on behalf of the applicants by the defendant bank? Counsel for the plaintiffs has urged on me that the absence of the applicants will not prejudice them, and that there is little substance in the submission, both by the bank and the applicants, that the bank will be so embarrassed in the further conduct of this part of the case as to make it necessary that the applicants should be joined. He has stressed, quite legitimately, his submission that to allow the applicants to be joined at this stage will only cause the plaintiffs further delay, and may increase the costs which they themselves may have to bear. On the other hand, counsel for the applicants, in his reply, has pointed out that on one view of the matter, into the details of which I do not propose to go, the bank might find itself liable to the applicants for the value, approximately £300,000, of the sixty-four bars of gold. I need merely say upon that point that I am not prepared to disregard that submission as having no foundation. I think it is a risk which, without inquiring further into the matter, I ought to take into consideration in deciding whether or not to exercise my discretion in the applicants' favour. If I take that submission into account, the result is that I have grounds for being satisfied that the bank now finds itself, so far as prosecuting the appeal from the order of the Court of Appeal in the House of Lords on behalf of the applicants is concerned, very seriously embarrassed. Is that enough to entitle me to exercise my jurisdiction under the rule?

H

It is to be observed that the passage in R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, on which I am asked to rely:

“... or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter...”

are alternative to the earlier words, "the names of any parties, whether plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined," and that, therefore, they must be intended to extend the jurisdiction of the court, and it is not necessary, to invoke the jurisdiction of the court under the latter words, to show that the intervener ought to have been joined. I think those words confer on the court a wide jurisdiction, and, having regard to the review of the cases which I have made, it is a jurisdiction which I ought not to treat as cut down more than I must do by the guidance which I find from those cases. I find nothing in those authorities which would prevent me from taking the view that there is a general discretion in the court, if it thinks right, having regard to all the circumstances, to bring in an intervener so that the questions involved in the action may be completely adjudicated on and settled.

On terms which I shall mention, I propose to allow this application, finding nothing in the authorities which would prevent me doing so, and taking the view, with all the circumstances in mind, that it is the proper, and, indeed, the only satisfactory, course to take in the circumstances. I shall order the applicants to pay the plaintiffs' costs of this application in any event. If the plaintiffs desire to appeal, I shall give leave. If they do appeal, I shall say nothing more as to costs or other terms. If, however, the plaintiffs decide not to appeal, then I shall put the applicants on the further terms that they shall take and join with the plaintiffs in taking all steps which they can to assure that a motion is brought before this court by the applicants asking for the same relief as was asked for before JENKINS, J., and that, this court having pronounced on that matter, it shall be taken to the Court of Appeal with a view to the matter being disposed of by this court and the Court of Appeal before the end of this sittings. As regards the costs before the Court of Appeal, I do not quite see how I can deal with those. I think it would be better that I should say nothing about those. It may be that the Court of Appeal, when dealing with this matter, may be disposed to take into account the order which I have made as to costs here, and may themselves put the applicants on terms as regards the costs in the House of Lords, particularly having regard to the admission made by the Attorney-General yesterday that he could not see how he could oppose an order on the applicants to the same effect as the order on the defendant bank made by the Court of Appeal as a condition of granting leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

Wilberforce : The next point I want to mention to your Lordship is the question of security for costs. YOUR LORDSHIP remembers that in Vavasour v. Krupp (3) it was made one of the terms of joining the Mikado as a defendant that he should provide security for costs. I do not know whether your Lordship would think fit to add that as one of the terms, or to leave it to us to make another application. In my submission, there clearly would have to be security provided before the appeal could be prosecuted before the House of Lords. It might save time and expense to the parties if your Lordship were to think fit to include that as one of the terms of this order, as was done in Vavasour v. Krupp (3).

WYNN-PARRY, J. : Are you really asking for security for costs against the United States of America and the Republic of France ?

Wilberforce : I must, because they are only submitting to the jurisdiction for the purpose of arguing this point. You remember what happened in Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government (7), in which the company prevailed, but could not get its costs because the Kelantan Government could still rely on its immunity if it was a question of enforcing costs. It is always a condition, when sovereign governments are given leave to come in, that they give security.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : What are you asking for ?

Wilberforce : We were ordered to give security before the Court of Appeal in the sum of £300, when we appealed from the order of JENKINS, J. This would be in the House of Lords, and the costs would be higher. I ask for £500.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : Do you think that is unreasonable, Mr. Buckley ?

Buckley : I leave it in your Lordship's hands.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : I do not think it high. Very well, I will make that order for security for costs.

Wilberforce : That will be part of the terms on which your Lordship gives leave ?

WYNN-PARRY, J. : Yes.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors : The Treasury Solicitor (for the applicants); Freshfields (for the bank); Slaughter & May (for the plaintiffs).

YATES (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. STARKEY.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 17, 18, 1950.]

Income Tax—Reliefs—Children's allowance—Secured maintenance order—Order providing for payment of annual sum to be held in trust for children—Treatment as husband's income of sums paid—“Settlement”—“Settlor”—Finance Act, 1936 (c. 34), s. 21 (1), (9).

Divorce—Maintenance—Children—Order for payment of annual sum to be held in trust for children—Power of court to create trust in favour of children—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 193 (3) (added by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 10 (4)).

The taxpayer had been divorced by his wife who was given the custody of the infant children of the marriage, and by an order of the Divorce Court he was ordered to pay to the wife an annual sum of £100 less tax in trust for each of the children of the marriage, the taxpayer to claim the income tax allowances obtainable in respect of children. The taxpayer made the payments ordered, and the wife, as guardian of the children, claimed relief from tax on their behalf, on the basis that the sums were income of the children. These claims were allowed by the Revenue. The taxpayer claimed to be entitled to allowances in respect of the children on the ground that the court had no power under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 193 (3) (as added by s. 10 (4) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937), to create a trust in favour of the children, and, consequently, the children had no income in their own right. Alternatively, the taxpayer claimed that, if the order of the Divorce Court created a trust in favour of the children, the annual payments made under the order must be treated as his income under s. 21 (1) of the Finance Act, 1936.

Held: (i) the court had power, under s. 193 (3) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, to create a trust in favour of the children.

Stevens v. Tirard ([1939] 4 All E.R. 186), distinguished.

(ii) the annual sums payable in trust for each of the children were paid to or for the benefit of the children by virtue of or in consequence of a settlement within the Finance Act, 1936, s. 21 (1) and (9) in relation to which the taxpayer was the settlor within the meaning of the sub-sections as being a person who had provided or undertaken to provide funds directly or indirectly for the purpose of the settlement, and, therefore, these sums were to be treated, under s. 21 (1) as the income of the taxpayer, and he was entitled to the allowances made in respect of the children.

CASE STATED by general commissioners of income tax.

In 1945 the taxpayer was divorced by his wife who was given the custody of the three children of the marriage. By an order of the Divorce Court, dated July 16, 1946, the taxpayer was ordered, inter alia, to pay to his wife as an interim provision until further order the annual sum of £100 less tax in trust for each of the three children of the marriage, the taxpayer to claim the relief allowed in respect of children. The taxpayer paid to his wife the sums ordered, less tax, and she, as guardian of the children, then claimed, on their behalf, repayment of tax on the basis that the said annual sums were income of the children. These claims were allowed by the Revenue. The general commissioners found that the order of the court dated July 16, 1946, created a trust in favour of the three children, but that, under the Finance Act, 1936, s. 21, the income of each child under the trust must for income tax purposes be treated as the taxpayer's income who was in consequence entitled to the allowances. The Crown appealed.

Upjohn, K.C., and R. P. Hills for the Crown.
J. W. P. Clements for the taxpayer.

VAISEY, J.: This is a short point, but, in my judgment, it is one of considerable difficulty. The Case, which has been stated by the income tax commissioners for the Dartford division of Kent, refers to the appeal which was before them as being an appeal against the taxpayer's coding for income tax purposes, but, in point of fact, as is made clear at the end of the first paragraph of the Case, the ground of the appeal was that the taxpayer was not allowed the relief which he claimed under s. 27 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The first matter which has to be decided arises under s. 193 (3) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, that sub-section being added by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 10 (4), and the second point lies within the ambit of the Finance Act, 1936, s. 21. The taxpayer, Mr. Starkey, was the respondent in divorce proceedings brought against him by his wife, and an order of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division was made on July 16, 1946, by which he was ordered to pay, or cause to be paid, to his former wife as an interim provision until further order, as from the date of the decree absolute, an annual sum of £100 less tax, in trust for each of the three children, the issue of the marriage. Their names are given, and then the order provides:

"All the said sums to be payable monthly; credit to be given for any sums paid since the [date of the decree]."

The first question which was raised before the commissioners was whether it was within the powers of the court to make the provision for the children in the form of a trust, but when I look at s. 193 (3) of the Act of 1925, I feel no doubt that such an order was within the competence of the court, and that no exception can be taken to it either in point of substance or in form. The sub-section provides:

"The court may, if it thinks fit, on any decree of divorce . . . order the husband . . . to secure for the benefit of the children such gross sum of money or annual sum of money as the court may deem reasonable, and the court may for that purpose order that it shall be referred to one of the conveyancing counsel of the court to settle . . . a proper deed . . ."

I was referred to a decision of the Court of Appeal in Stevens v. Tirard (1). That case, however, in my judgment, was very different, and affords very little assistance to me on this occasion. There the order was not that the sums should be held in trust for the children, but that they should be paid to the mother of the children for their maintenance and education, and, although there are some expressions of opinion in the case which might seem to throw doubt on the competence of the court to declare a trust, I am of opinion that those observations in no way preclude me from reaching the conclusion at which I have arrived, viz., that the order did create, and operated as having created, a trust in favour of each of the three children.

The next question arises under s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1936, the marginal note of which is: "Provisions as to income settled on children." Sub-section (1) of that section provides:

"Where, by virtue or in consequence of any settlement to which this section applies and during the life of the settlor, any income is paid to or for the benefit of a child of the settlor in any year of assessment, the income shall . . . be treated for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the settlor for that year and not as the income of any other person."

Sub-section (9) of the section provides:

"(a) the expression 'child' includes a stepchild, an adopted child and an illegitimate child; (b) the expression 'settlement' includes any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement . . . or transfer of assets; (c) the expression 'settlor,' in relation to a settlement, includes any person by whom the settlement was made or entered into directly or indirectly, and in particular (but without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing words of this definition) includes any person who has provided or undertaken to provide funds directly or indirectly for the purpose of the settlement, or has made with any other person a reciprocal arrangement for that other person to make or enter into the settlement . . ."

In the first place, I think that the £100 per annum payable under this order is income which is paid to or for the benefit of a child of the taxpayer and that, apart from the provisions of the section, that it be income of that child. The question, however, arises: Does it become that child's income by virtue or in consequence of a settlement?, bearing in mind (and regard being had to the definition clause) that the expression "settlement" includes "any trust." This order, as I have already held, creates a trust, and it seems to me that it creates a trust by virtue or in consequence of which the income is paid to or for the benefit of the child. I think there can be no doubt that the trust is a "settlement" within the meaning of the section.

The next question which has to be decided is one as to which I feel a good deal of hesitation, namely, whether the taxpayer is a "settlor." It is suggested, first of all, that the expression "settlement" limits and controls, and throws light on, the word "trust," so that the definition of "settlement" must be read as though the word "trust" which appears in it is to be regarded as something of the character of a trust in the nature of a settlement. Against that method of construing the definition I have the authority of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Hood-

Barrs v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). The matter in issue in that case was whether there was a "transfer of assets," and LORD GREENE, commenting on the argument that that expression must in some way be limited because it had to be brought within the general idea of a settlement, said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 773):

A "I can find no justification for suggesting that such a covenant [i.e., a covenant for the transfer of assets] is excluded from the operation of the section [s. 21 (1) of the Act of 1936] although it bears no resemblance to anything which, in the ordinary sense of the word, could be described as a settlement."

B He held that the expression could not be limited on any such principle. In what sense was the taxpayer, who was a party to the order in question, a settlor, and, in particular, was he a settlor within the meaning of the definition? I was much impressed by the argument that the settlement was the creation of a trust, and that the settlor, or the originator of the trust, must necessarily be a person who acts voluntarily and of his own volition. Certain possible consequences of the contrary view were pointed out to me with great force by counsel for the Crown, but, in my judgment, in this case the settlor was the person by whom the settlement (or trust) was made (or created) directly or indirectly, and not the less so because he was doing it under the compulsion of an order of the court. There may be many cases in which a man may be said to act voluntarily in one sense, and involuntarily in another. The taxpayer submitted to this order. It was not a consent order, but one which was made on him and which he was obliged to carry out, but, it seems to me, on the whole, he was a person by whom a settlement was indirectly made, or by whom a trust was indirectly created, and that he clearly comes within the subsequent words which define a "settlor" as a person who has provided or undertaken to provide funds directly or indirectly for the purposes of the settlement.

D I think the point is doubtful, but on the whole it seems to me that the conclusion at which the commissioners arrived was right. They said:

E "We have come to the conclusion that the order of the court dated July 16, 1946, created a trust in favour of the three children, but under s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1936, the income of each child under the trust must for income tax purposes be treated as the income of the [taxpayer] who is in consequence entitled to the child allowances."

F This last point was merely a sequel to the conclusion which the commissioners reached, and I cannot see my way to depart from that conclusion. An arrangement has been made about the costs of this appeal, and, therefore, I need say nothing about those, and I will merely, by my present order, dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

CHANDRIS v. ISBRANDTSEN MOLLER CO. INC.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Asquith, L.J.J.), July 19, 20, 1950.]

Arbitration—Award—Damages—Power of arbitrator to award interest—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934 (c. 41), s. 3 (1).

An arbitrator awarded to a shipowner against the charterers of a vessel £2,137 10s. under the demurrage clause in the charterparty. On the question of his jurisdiction to award interest on that sum, A

HELD: it was an implied term of the submission that the arbitrator should decide the dispute according to the existing law of contract; that law included the provisions of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3 (1), giving a court power to award interest on debt or damages; and, therefore, the arbitrator had power to award interest.

APPEAL by the claimant from an order of DEVLIN, J., dated Mar. 6, 1950, on a Special Case stated by an arbitrator.

The claimant, the administratrix of the owner of a ship, claimed from the respondents, the charterers of the vessel under a voyage charter, damages and interest under the provisions of the charterparty in respect of extra expenses incurred and the detention of the ship for sixteen additional days by reason of the cargo being unloaded into river craft instead of at the dockside. The arbitrator found against the charterers on all points and awarded the claimant £7,529 15s. In the alternative, on the assumption that demurrage only was recoverable, he assessed the figure at £2,216 15s. DEVLIN, J., held that the amount of damages recoverable by the claimant was limited by the demurrage clause, and that the question whether the arbitrator could award interest had been concluded in the negative by the decision of the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division in Podar Trading Co., Ltd., Bombay v. Francois Tagher, Barcelona ([1949] 2 All E.R. 62). The claimant appealed only on the question of interest. G

Mocatta and Michael Holman for the claimant.

A. W. Roskill, K.C., and Boyes for the respondents. H

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of DEVLIN, J., on a Special Case stated in arbitration proceedings between the claimant, Evgenia John Chandris, and the respondent corporation. The Case Stated dealt with a number of issues arising out of a charterparty which the deceased man, of whose estate the claimant was administratrix, had entered into with the respondents for the charter of a steamship called the Evgenia Chandris. DEVLIN, J., held that the claimant was entitled to £2,137 10s. by way of demurrage, and to one other small sum in respect of certain other items. We are only concerned with one aspect of the case—the question whether or not interest can be awarded by the arbitrator on the amount awarded for demurrage. In the Case the arbitrator dealt with this matter as follows:

“The claimant also claimed interest. A further question for the decision of the court is whether I have jurisdiction to award interest. If the court answers the stated question in the affirmative, then I award that the charterers do pay to the claimant the sum of £170 as interest on £2,137 10s.”

The matter does not appear to have been fully argued before the arbitrator as to what his powers were, nor was the matter argued before DEVLIN, J., because of a decision which had been given by the Divisional Court in Podar Trading Co., Ltd., Bombay v. Francois Tagher, Barcelona (1), the judgment in which was delivered on May 12, 1949, a few months before this Case was signed on Aug. 13, 1949. On this aspect of the matter DEVLIN, J., said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 770):

“I can get rid of this last question [of interest] at once. In Podar Trading Co., Ltd. v. Tagher (1) the Divisional Court answered the same question in the negative. Whether or not I am technically bound by a decision of the Divisional Court, I propose to follow this one as a recent and authoritative pronouncement on the law, and I have not, therefore, invited argument on it.”

He, accordingly, answered one of the questions submitted by the arbitrator to the effect that interest could not be awarded. Therefore, in effect, this is really an appeal against the judgment of the Divisional Court in Podar Trading Co., Ltd. v. Francois Tagher, Barcelona (1).

It is common ground that in the circumstances of this case interest would not have been recoverable at common law, but, it is said by counsel for the claimant, interest would have been recoverable in these proceedings by reason of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, or rather, interest would have been recoverable by reason of the submission to arbitration of a matter with regard to which interest would have been recoverable if it had been dealt with in a court of law. The Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 28, provides:

“Upon all debts or sums certain, payable at a certain time or otherwise, the jury on the trial of any issue, or on any inquisition of damages, may, if they shall think fit, allow interest to the creditor at a rate not exceeding the current rate of interest from the time when such debts or sums certain were payable, if such debts or sums be payable by virtue of some written instrument at a certain time, or if payable otherwise, then from the time when demand of payment shall have been made in writing, so as such demand shall give notice to the debtor that interest will be claimed from the date of such demand until the term of payment; provided that interest shall be payable in all cases in which it is now payable by law.”

It is to be observed in that section that the right is given only to a jury, and the provision is that the jury may “if they shall think fit,” i.e., it is a discretionary remedy given to a jury. It must, however, be remembered that at that date all issues of fact had of necessity to be dealt with by juries in a court of law, and, therefore, in effect, the introduction of the jury means very little more than that interest could be awarded by any court which had jurisdiction to deal with questions of fact.

In 1851 Edwards v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2) was decided, and the question whether an arbitrator could or could not award interest in a case which was within s. 28 was therein considered. That matter is dealt with in the headnote as follows (11 C.B. 588):

"The plaintiff having, after notice of action, served the company with a written demand of interest under the [Civil Procedure Act, 1833] s. 28:—Held, that the arbitrator, under a submission of 'all matters in difference,' might award the plaintiff interest, notwithstanding the notice of action did not contain a demand of interest; and, further, that, assuming a notice of action to have been necessary, the want or insufficiency of such notice could not be taken advantage of, since the [Limitations of Actions and Costs Act, 1842] s. 3, unless pleaded specially."

That aspect of the case is set out in more detail later in the report (11 C.B. 638):

"On Feb. 10, 1848, and before the commencement of the action, but after the notice thereof, the plaintiffs served on the company a demand in writing, bearing date Feb. 8, 1848, whereby they demanded payment of the money alleged in the notice of action to be due to them, and claimed interest thereon from the date of that demand until payment. The plaintiffs now contend that they are entitled to recover such interest, not exceeding five per cent. per annum, from Feb. 10, 1848, as the arbitrator may think proper to allow, on all such sums as are recoverable by them under the foregoing heads of claim, or any of them. The company contend that the plaintiffs' claims under the foregoing heads, if recoverable at all, are not such debts or sums certain as to warrant a jury, or the arbitrator, in giving interest on them; and also that interest is not recoverable, because not included in the notice of action. The last question for the opinion of the court is,—whether, in addition to any other sum or sums recoverable in this action, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover interest thereon, if the arbitrator shall think the case a proper one for giving interest."

SIR JOHN JERVIS, C.J., in giving judgment, said (ibid., 649):

"The only remaining question is this,—whether the arbitrator is at liberty, if he shall think fit, to allow interest on the sums recoverable in this action. The plaintiffs contend that Parker has from the commencement been paying a sum certain to the company in excess of the lawful charge upon every transaction. There is a demand in writing of the debt, and a demand of interest under the [Civil Procedure Act, 1833], s. 28. This, therefore, is a sum certain with respect to which a demand has been made for principal and interest; and the arbitrator may, if he thinks fit, give interest. But it is said, on the other hand, that the arbitrator cannot do this, because the company's Act of Parliament entitles the company to a notice of action, and the notice of action here does not demand interest."

SIR JOHN JERVIS, C.J., then proceeds to say there are two answers to that point (with which we are not concerned) and he then continues (ibid., 650):

"A further answer would be, that this is a submission, not only of the action, but of all matters in difference; and the interest would be a matter in difference, whether demanded by the notice of action or not. If the arbitrator could give it, he might give it in that way, notwithstanding the want of claim of interest in the notice."

That case clearly decides that, although the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 28, speaks in terms of a jury, and only confers on a jury a discretionary right to give interest, none the less, if a matter with regard to which a jury could have given interest is referred to an arbitrator, the arbitrator may equally give interest, and that despite the language used in that Act.

That decision stood from 1851 until 1934, when the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act of that year was passed, and it has been referred to in repeated editions of RUSSELL ON ARBITRATION as authority for the proposition that, in such cases, an arbitrator can award interest. The Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3, provides:

“(1) In any proceedings tried in any court of record for the recovery of any debt or damages, the court may, if it thinks fit, order that there shall be included in the sum for which judgment is given interest at such rate as it thinks fit on the whole or any part of the debt or damages for the whole or any part of the period between the date when the cause of action arose and the date of the judgment . . . (2) Sections 28 and 29 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, shall cease to have effect.”

The result is that, if and in so far as the arbitrator derived his power to give costs directly from the Act of 1833, that power terminated with the repeal of those sections, for which there is substituted s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1934.

The argument for the claimant is that just as in 1851 the arbitrator derived his power to give interest directly, not from the Act of 1833, but from a submission to him of all matters in dispute, so, now, in 1950, the arbitrator does not derive his jurisdiction to give interest from the Act of 1934, but from the submission to him of the disputes, which involves that he has to deal with those disputes according to the law of the land and that he is clothed with authority to give to the claimant such rights and remedies as would have been available to him in a court of law having jurisdiction to deal with the same subject-matter. Counsel submits that, applying the reasoning of SIR JOHN JERVIS, C.J., in Edwards v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2) to the statute of 1934, in which we find a court of record substituted for a jury, the same result should follow, viz., that, by reason of the submission, the arbitrator has been clothed with authority to deal with this matter in the same way as that in which it could have been dealt with by a court of record. The argument for the charterers is that one must now look only at s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1934 to determine what the powers of the arbitrator are, and that that sub-section in terms merely gives a discretionary power to courts of record with regard to any proceedings tried in such a court. The Act of 1934, it is urged, is silent regarding arbitrations, and, therefore, it must be taken to have been intended that its provisions should not apply to arbitrations. Counsel drew our attention to the fact that in the Arbitration Act, 1934, which had been passed two months earlier, there was a special provision under s. 11 providing for interest to be allowed on awards. That section provides:

“A sum directed to be paid by an award shall, unless the award otherwise directs, carry interest as from the date of the award and at the same rate as a judgment debt.”

Counsel further points out that the Arbitration Act, 1934, makes no provision for the awarding of interest by the arbitrator as distinct from the interest given under s. 11, which only runs from the date of the award. Furthermore, says counsel, the policy of the legislature in this matter can be ascertained by seeing what has been done in subsequent Acts, and he quotes the Evidence Act, 1938, the Limitation Act, 1939, the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act, 1943, and the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, in all of which special provision has been made in terms, including the case of arbitrations, and, says counsel, that shows that the legislature, when it intends to give powers to an arbitrator, does so in terms.

With regard to that argument, I do not think it is strictly permissible to interpret a statute by reference to what has been done in subsequent statutes, but, however that may be, I think the history of this matter shows that up till 1938, or thereabouts, there had been a considerable difference of judicial opinion as to the power of an arbitrator in the absence of express provision to deal with certain defences which are expressly available as answers to actions, and the position with regard to those matters was dealt with by the House of

"The matter does not rest there, because we have to consider how far the suggested elimination of defences available at law or in equity must logically be held to extend in other arbitrations. If the party defending may not rely on the Statute of Limitations, can he rely on the Statute of Frauds, or the Act partially replacing it? Could he rely in a commercial arbitration on the Gaming Act? A number of like questions might be asked. It is true, and this is the main point on which the appellants rely, that the Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3, was in terms limited to actions. It may be noted that no such statute passed before the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, expressly bound courts of equity. There is, however, no doubt that long before the Judicature Act, 1873, where a court of equity had to adjudicate on the validity of a debt in a suit to administer an estate, or in any like suit, it held itself bound to apply the statutes of limitations in precisely the same way as if there were an action at law to recover the debt . . . It is indisputable that, in modern arbitration, the principles of equity must be applied just as they would now be applied in a court of law, since upon a Special Case for the opinion of the court under s. 7 of the Arbitration Act or the Judicature Act, 1925, s. 94 (replacing s. 19 of the Arbitration Act), the court is, and has long been, bound to apply equitable rules and relief. It is difficult to see how the equitable view of the applicability of the Limitation Act, 1623, to a case of debt can be excluded in a legal arbitration . . . The authorities on the question as to whether the statutes of limitation are available in an arbitration have been carefully considered by my noble and learned friend LORD WRIGHT, presiding in the Court of Appeal, and it is not necessary to repeat them. The hesitation or the doubts expressed by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Board of Trade v. Cayzer, Irvine & Co. (4) appear to be mainly directed against the laying down of an absolute and general rule applicable in all kinds of arbitration. At least, that is how I understand them, and, if I may say so with all respect, to that extent I agree with them. The remarks of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in the same case, when the matter came before this House, certainly tend to show that, in his view, in commercial arbitrations an arbitrator is bound to give effect to all legal defences, including a defence under any statute of limitation. On a careful consideration of all the cases, I am content to say that I agree with what was said by LORD SALVESEN, delivering the judgment of the Board in Ramdutt Ramkissendass v. E. D. Sassoon & Co. (5). In that case the Indian Limitation Act, 1908 (the relevant period being three years), was taken for practical purposes to be the same as the Limitation Act, 1623, and LORD SALVESEN observed: 'Although the Limitation Act does not in terms apply to arbitrations, they [their Lordships of the Judicial Committee] think that in mercantile references of the kind in question it is an implied term of the contract that the arbitrator must decide the dispute according to the existing law of contract, and that every defence which would have been open in a court of law can be equally proposed for the arbitrator's decision unless the parties have agreed—which is not suggested here—to exclude that defence. Were it otherwise, a claim for breach of a contract containing a reference clause could be brought at any time, it might be twenty or thirty years after the cause of action had arisen . . .'"

Counsel for the charterers says that a distinction is to be drawn between statutes which bar a remedy, such as the statutes of limitation, the Statute of Frauds, 1677, the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and so forth, to all of which statutes an arbitrator is bound to give effect notwithstanding they afford defences to actions, and statutes which confer rights, and that in the latter cases the right so conferred is not to be extended beyond the plain words of the enacting statute.

I cannot see why any distinction should be drawn between the duty of an arbitrator to give effect to such statutes as the Statute of Limitations and his jurisdiction in his discretion to award interest. An award of interest is only a part of the damages recoverable, and, adapting to the facts of this case the language of LORD SALVESEN in the case to which I have just referred—language which was approved by LORD MAUGHAM—it would read as follows: “Although the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, does not in terms apply to arbitrations, I think that in mercantile references of the kind in question it is an implied term of the contract that the arbitrator must decide the dispute according to the existing law of contract, and that every right and discretionary remedy given to a court of law can be exercised by him.” To that there are certain well-known exceptions, such as the right to grant an injunction, which stand on a different footing. One of the reasons why an arbitrator cannot give an injunction is that he has no power to enforce it, but such an objection does not apply to an award of interest.

This matter was dealt with fully by LORD GODDARD, C.J., in delivering judgment of the court in the Podar case (1). He dealt with the power to give interest at common law and under the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, and he then proceeded to say ([1949] 2 All E.R. 67):

“The case which would seem to be directly in point is Edwards v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2). In that case the court approved of the allowance of interest by an arbitrator because it was allowable in the circumstances of that case by the provisions of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833. Accordingly, we think we must take it to be the law that before the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, an arbitrator had the same powers as the court with regard to the award of interest, but no greater power.”

The Lord Chief Justice then goes on to deal with the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and he says (ibid.):

“Moreover, as s. 28 and s. 29 of the Civil Procedure Act are repealed, we feel driven to hold that not only have arbitrators no power to give interest on damages, but they have been deprived of the powers which they had so long as the sections of the Civil Procedure Act were in force and can now only give it in circumstances in which it was recoverable at common law.”

Counsel for the charterers argued that that judgment was based on the assumption that it was the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, which gave the arbitrator his power to award interest, and that, once that Act was repealed, all such powers had gone, and, unless the arbitrator had been given fresh powers, he had none. I think, however, that the real basis of Edwards v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2) was that the arbitrator derived his powers, not from the Act of 1833, but from the submission to him which necessarily gave him the “implied powers” referred to in the language of LORD SALVESEN which I have just quoted, and I see no reason why, since the Act of 1934, an arbitrator should not be deemed impliedly to have the same powers. Therefore, with diffidence, having regard to the view expressed by the Divisional Court on this matter, I have come to the conclusion that in such a case as the present the arbitrator has power to award interest, and, accordingly, to that extent, I think this appeal should succeed and the Podar case (1) be overruled.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I agree with counsel for the claimant that this case is really decided for us by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in 1851 in Edwards v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2). That case is not binding on us, but it had stood unchallenged for over eighty years when the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, was passed, and I agree with the words of LORD GODDARD, C.J., when he stated in the Podar case (1) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 67) that before the Act of 1934 an arbitrator had the same powers as a jury to give interest. I think the Court of Common Bench reached its conclusion not because it thought that as a matter of construction of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 28 and s. 29, the arbitrator fell within the description of a "jury on the trial of any issue, or on any inquisition of damages," but because it considered that an arbitrator had all the powers in regard to awarding damages which a jury had. In this connection it is to be remembered that in 1833 all relevant cases would have been heard by a judge with a jury. In my view, the decision of the court was not based on any statute, but the court considered that, apart from any statute, an arbitrator had all the powers of the appropriate court including the power to award interest in the cases indicated.

By the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 28 and s. 29 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, were repealed, and, in lieu, there has been substituted s. 3 of the Act of 1934 which provides:

"(1) In any proceedings tried in any court of record for the recovery of any debt or damages, the court may, if it thinks fit, order that there shall be included in the sum for which judgment is given interest at such rate as it thinks fit on the whole or any part of the debt or damages for the whole or any part of the period between the date when the cause of action arose and the date of the judgment."

The Divisional Court had decided in the passage which my Lord has read that the effect of that sub-section is to deprive the arbitrator of the power to award damages in accordance with the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 28 and s. 29, without conferring on him the increased powers conferred by the sections on a court of record. The Divisional Court arrived at that conclusion with reluctance, and I am glad not to feel myself compelled to agree with it. The section does not purport to deal in any way with the powers of arbitrators. It may, of course, have curtailed their powers, but I do not think that in the present case it has done so.

In my opinion, the right of arbitrators to award interest was not derived from the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 28 and s. 29, but from the rule that arbitrators had the powers of the appropriate court in the matter of awarding interest. In my opinion, therefore, the effect of the Act of 1934 is that, after it came into force, an arbitrator had no longer the powers of awarding interest damages conferred on juries by the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 28 and s. 29, but he had the power conferred on the appropriate court, in the Act of 1934 described as a court of record. The change of description may be due to the fact that damages are now usually awarded by a judge sitting alone. I agree with my Lord that, for the reasons he has given, the conclusion we have reached is supported by the decision in the Naamlooze case (3), and I cannot help thinking that if the attention of the Divisional Court had been directed to that case, they might have reached a different conclusion. For those reasons, and for the reasons given by my Lord, I think this appeal should succeed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree. I should have found it very difficult to resist the argument presented by counsel for the respondents if Edwards v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2) had not been decided as it was and had not stood unchallenged for over three-quarters of a century before the Act of 1934. But for those circumstances, it would have been difficult, it seems to me, to resist a construction of s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1934 which would limit the discretion conferred by that section. But, by parity of reason, the right given by the Act of 1833 should have been limited to proceedings before a jury, yet, in the Edwards case (2), that contention was impliedly or expressly rejected, and it was held that an arbitrator could award interest in cases in which, by statute, a jury was given power to do so.

For those reasons, and for the reasons given by my Lords, I think this appeal should succeed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

NEATH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. WILLIAMS AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Byrne, JJ.), July 19, 20, 1950.]

Nuisance—Statutory nuisance—Watercourse—Natural watercourse—Obstruction impeding flow of water and causing flooding—Liability of owner for failing to abate—Nuisance not due to owner's act or default—Land Drainage Act, 1930 (c. 44), s. 35 (1), s. 57 (1), (2)—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 93, s. 259 (1) (b), proviso.

Under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 93, a local authority is empowered to serve a notice requiring the abatement of a statutory nuisance "... on the person by whose act, default or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or, if that person cannot be found, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises ...". By the proviso to s. 259, "... nothing in this sub-section shall be deemed to impose any liability on any person other than the person by whose act or default the nuisance arises or continues" in the case of "any part of a watercourse ... which is so choked or silted up as to obstruct or impede the proper flow of water and thereby to cause a nuisance ..." which sub-s. (1) (b) declares to be a statutory nuisance. Under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 35, a duty is imposed on any person having control of part of a watercourse in which an impediment occurs, or if he is unknown, on the occupier of the land through which it passes, to put the watercourse in proper condition if agricultural land of another person is injured or in danger of being injured by water. Under s. 57 of the same Act the owner or occupier of land, injured by the failure of an occupier of other land to cleanse and scour a watercourse passing through it, may serve notice requiring him to cleanse or scour the watercourse and in the event of default may do the works himself and recover the expense.

Owing to an obstruction in a natural watercourse caused by debris washed down by the stream, flooding occurred which constituted a nuisance. The local authority served a notice on the respondents, owners of the land where the obstruction existed, requiring them to remove debris, silt and boulders causing the obstruction as a statutory nuisance under s. 93 and s. 259 of the Public Health Act, 1936. The justices being of opinion that the respondents had not done anything or neglected to do anything to cause the flooding dismissed the informations.

HELD: (i) as owners of land the respondents were under no duty at common law to remove obstructions arising by natural causes in a natural watercourse.

Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan ([1940] 3 All E.R. 349), distinguished.

(ii) to constitute a statutory nuisance under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 93, it was necessary to show that the statutory nuisance alleged occurred through the act or default of the respondents, and there was nothing in the evidence to show that they had done any act which could properly be called a "default" in the sense of failing to do something imposed by the Act. There might have been a "sufferance" of the obstruction, but that word did not appear in the proviso to s. 259 (1).

(iii) the respondents were not under any duty under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), because the notice served upon them to abate the statutory nuisance was not concerned with agricultural land or with default under that Act and s. 35 (1) would seem to apply only where the watercourse was within the area of a drainage board, of which there was here no evidence; nor under s. 57 (1), which imposed a duty, not at large, but only on service of a notice on the owner or occupier under that section.

(iv) accordingly, the justices were right in dismissing the summonses.

CASE STATED by Glamorgan justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Neath a complaint was preferred by the clerk of the appellants, Neath Rural District Council, alleging that a nuisance arising in part of a watercourse in the council's district existed and that notices to abate it under s. 93 and s. 259 of the Public Health Act, 1936, had been served on the respondents, by whose act or neglect the nuisance arose or continued, and that the respondents had made default in complying with the requirements of the notices. For the appellants it was contended that, though the respondents, through whose land the watercourse flowed, had not been guilty of any common law breach of duty, s. 259 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act, 1936, created a statutory nuisance and imposed a duty on the owner and occupier of the bed of a watercourse which was choked or silted up to scour and cleanse it, and that failure to do so constituted a default within the meaning of the sub-section. The appellants also contended that by failing to cleanse and scour the watercourse the respondents had committed a breach of the statutory duty imposed upon them by the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 57 (1) and (2), and that the Public Health Act, 1936, provided a summary remedy in the hands of the appellants as local authority by enacting that such a breach of obligation should be a statutory nuisance. For the respondents it was contended that the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 259 (1) (b), merely provided a summary remedy for what was in law a nuisance, that at common law no damage caused by the natural user of land was actionable, and that such natural user was not a nuisance and could not be the subject of the proceedings under the Act of 1936. The complaint was heard on Dec. 30, 1949, and Mar. 3, 1950, when the justices dismissed the complaint. E

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by Glamorgan justices sitting at Neath. It arises out of certain nuisance notices served under s. 93 and s. 259 of the Public Health Act, 1936, requiring the respondents to scour out and remove certain debris, silt, boulders, and so forth which were obstructing a watercourse running through their land.

I have come to the conclusion that the justices were right in dismissing these complaints. The respondents are the owners of land near Neath. On that land there is a mountain stream which comes from the hills and has a very steep fall until it gets on the respondents' land, somewhere in the vale of Neath.

- A When it gets lower, the stream passes through a culvert. The culvert was constructed by a canal company, and it may, therefore, be assumed that it was erected under statutory powers. The water passes through that culvert and then flows on to other land of the respondents, making two sharp turns in its course. At one of these turns obstruction has arisen which holds back the water so that it does not flow freely through the culvert. The consequence is
- B that in time of heavy rain there is flooding from the upper side of the culvert which causes discomfort to persons living nearby in a row of cottages. I have no doubt that that flooding does amount to a nuisance in the sense that where water is allowed to flow from a stream on to people's land a nuisance arises because it is detrimental to the health and comfort of residents.

- The question is: Are the respondents liable for that state of affairs? The
- C Case Stated finds that the obstruction existing in this watercourse—which is a natural watercourse and remains a natural watercourse throughout except in so far as it passes through a culvert with which the respondents have nothing to do—has caused it to become silted up and blocked up by debris washed down by the stream in the course of its fall. The sections of the Public Health Act, 1936, which we have to consider, replace sections of the Public Health Act, 1875,
- D and earlier Acts, and the considerations which apply to the earlier cases apply, no doubt, to the present sections. The first sections to which I think it is necessary to call attention are those which begin with s. 92 and form part of Part III of the Act of 1936. Part III deals with nuisances and offensive trades, and creates what are called in the Act "statutory nuisances," that is to say:

- E ". . . (a) any premises in such a state as to be prejudicial to health or a nuisance; (b) any animal kept in such a place or manner as to be prejudicial to health or a nuisance; (c) any accumulation or deposit which is prejudicial to health or a nuisance . . ."

These are all matters which are capable of being ordinary common law nuisances, and the object of this Part of the Act is to give a quick and summary remedy

F to secure the stopping and discontinuance of the nuisances. The scheme of the Act is that the local authority should serve notices requiring the abatement of the nuisances, the discontinuance of the nuisances and the prevention of their recurrence, and, if the notices are disobeyed, the justices can make an order requiring the person to abate the nuisance and to take steps against its recurrence. The justices may, not must, in a proper case impose a fine of £5, and there is

G also a provision that not only may there be a fine of £5 but a daily fine, if the order of the justices is not obeyed.

We then turn to another section which is in another Part of the Act, Part XI, said to be the Miscellaneous Part. Section 259 provides:

- "(1) The following matters shall be statutory nuisances for the purposes of Part III of this Act, that is to say—(a) any pond, pool, ditch, gutter
- H or watercourse which is so foul or in such a state as to be prejudicial to health or a nuisance; (b) any part of a watercourse, not being a part ordinarily navigated by vessels employed in the carriage of goods by water, which is so choked or silted up as to obstruct or impede the proper flow of water and thereby to cause a nuisance, or give rise to conditions prejudicial to health . . ."

Stopping there for a moment, the effect of that is that if a watercourse gets into that state—and be it observed that it applies both, in my opinion, to a natural watercourse as well as to an artificial watercourse—it becomes a statutory nuisance, and the provisions of Part III of the Act apply to its abatement, to the notice that can be given, to the proceedings taken, and so forth.

It is not without importance to observe that, whereas s. 93 in Part III, provides:

“Where a local authority are satisfied of the existence of a statutory nuisance, they shall serve a notice (hereafter in this Act referred to as ‘an abatement notice’) on the person by whose act, default or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or, if that person cannot be found, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the nuisance . . .”

in s. 259, the section which brings the watercourse within Part III, there is this proviso:

“Provided that in the case of an alleged nuisance under paragraph (b) nothing in this sub-section shall be deemed to impose any liability on any person other than the person by whose act or default the nuisance arises or continues.”

The absence of the word “sufferance” may be very important, because it is quite clear, taking those two sections together, that whereas in the case of the statutory nuisances referred to in s. 92 the local authority can proceed against a person who has suffered a nuisance to continue, if the nuisance is a choked watercourse there is no liability on the person unless the nuisance arises or continues from his act or default. In my opinion, the decision in this case depends on the answer to the question whether a landowner on whose land there is a watercourse which becomes choked by natural causes—action of the water on land or on rocks or whatever it may be, or by weeds or by any other cause—can be said to be a person by whose act or default the nuisance arises or continues. Does that of itself impose a liability on the landowner to clear the watercourse?

Apart from authority, I think the position is that a landowner is not at common law under any liability to do anything with regard to a watercourse if it is a natural watercourse flowing through his land. If he creates a watercourse or does anything to make artificial that which was previously natural, very different considerations arise, and that is why, when I first saw this case, I thought that Sedleigh-Denfield v. O’Callaghan (1) in the House of Lords might have a great bearing on our decision. In my opinion, that case does not apply because it seems to me implicit in the speech of VISCOUNT MAUGHAM that he is dealing with a case where there was a ditch into which had been placed a pipe for the purpose of carrying off water, and the people on whose land it was had allowed that pipe to get choked. I think it is clear that VISCOUNT MAUGHAM was referring throughout and intended to refer throughout to an artificial watercourse or to something where works had been done to the watercourse, and not to the ordinary bed of a natural stream. Therefore, I do not think it necessary to discuss the principles which were laid down in that case, the decision in which was that, if a person allows a nuisance to continue on his land, even though it had been originated by a trespasser, he nevertheless becomes liable.

It seems to me clear that the proviso to s. 259 is designed to prevent an additional duty being cast upon a landowner, and, as I have already said, it seems clear at common law that a landowner is under no duty so far as a natural stream is concerned to do any works for keeping the bed clear or removing obstructions arising in the natural course of events. Authority on the point is to be found first, I think, and quite clearly, in Hodgson v. York Corpn. (2). It is unnecessary to go through the somewhat complicated facts of the case, but it was alleged there that flooding had been caused through allowing a stream to get choked by weeds. BLACKBURN, J., who delivered the leading judgment, said, referring to the judgment of the county court judge (28 L.T. 839):

"But he goes on to say that the liabilities of the corporation, after due provision for the escape of the water, were such only as attach at common law to the owners of the natural bed of a river; and that the respondents were not, under the said Act or at common law, under any obligation to remedy any natural and gradual silting up and growing up of weeds in the said bed for the benefit of adjacent landowners. In this I am of opinion he was right . . ."

A There is a clear expression of opinion by a judge of the highest eminence that the owner of the bed of a stream is not under any obligation at common law to remedy the natural and gradual silting up of the stream, and there is no difference, in my opinion, whether the silting up is caused in one way or in another. The obstruction may be caused by a heavy growth of weeds in the bed of the stream, or by sand and earth being washed down, or by boulders or rocks being washed down a mountain stream, but the common law of England has never imposed liabilities on landowners for anything which happens to their land in the natural course of affairs if the land is used naturally.

I might just refer to a passage to which we were referred in the speech of LORD CAIRNS, L.C., in Rylands v. Fletcher (3), in which he said (L.R. 3 H.L. 338):

C ". . . and if, in what I may term the natural user of that land, there had been any accumulation of water, either on the surface or underground, and if, by the operation of the laws of nature, that accumulation of water had passed off into the close occupied by the plaintiff, the plaintiff could not have complained that that result had taken place."

D That clearly shows that if, for instance, the course of the stream had been diverted—and there are many instances to be found in this country where the course of a river has been diverted owing to a storm—nobody is liable, because it happens in the course of nature. There is the very striking instance of the river Ouse which now goes out to sea at Newhaven and used to go out to sea at Seaford Head, where the old bed of the river can be seen, and history relates that the course of the river was diverted sometime in the sixteenth century as the result of a severe storm. In that connection it is by no means, I think, foreign to this case to refer to the judgment of EVE, J., in Pontardawe Rural Council v. Moore-Gwyn (4), because it seems to me the principle which applies to that case applies to this case. The headnote is ([1929] 1 Ch. 656):

F "The owner of land on which there is an outcrop of rock overhanging a steep slope is not liable for damage caused by reason of portions of that rock breaking away and falling down the slope if the break is due to natural causes, such as weathering, and the owner has used his land in an ordinary way, without any mining or quarrying operations."

G In that case a man had on his land rocks parts of which broke off and rolled down on to other people's land and did damage. If that happens in the ordinary course of events, he is under no liability. So, too, in Giles v. Walker (5), where LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., delivered a well-known judgment. That was an action in which a man sought to obtain damages by reason of his neighbour allowing thistledown to blow from his field on to the plaintiff's land and damage it. This court very summarily dismissed that contention, saying that such a thing was unheard of and that a man could not be liable for that which happened in the ordinary course of nature. It is because of that sort of case that various statutes or regulations of the Ministry of Agriculture are made to compel people to clean their land of weeds. Enough has been said, therefore, to show that it is well established that there is no common law duty on the owner or occupier of this land to do anything to the stream or to the bed of the stream, provided that the obstruction is caused by natural and not artificial causes, and provided that the stream is a natural and not an artificial stream.

Before I go to the authorities under the section, I should deal with an argument advanced by counsel for the appellants, which must be considered, although this is the first case, apparently, in which the point has ever been raised as regards statutory nuisances due to watercourses. He submits that a duty has now been put upon landowners upon whose property watercourses exist by reason of the Land Drainage Acts. The Land Drainage Act which is now in operation, and which we must consider because it was in operation at the time of the Public Health Act, 1936, is the Land Drainage Act, 1930, which consolidated, re-enacted, and to some extent amended the previous Acts, including an Act of 1847. Two sections are material. The first is s. 35, contained in Part V of the Act which is headed: "Members and proceedings and powers of drainage boards." Without giving a concluded opinion on the matter, it seems to me it is probably only applicable if the watercourse in question is within the district of a drainage board because of the fasciculus of sections which constitute Part V. Section 35 provides:

"(1) Where any watercourse is in such a condition that the proper flow of water is impeded, it shall, except where the condition of the watercourse is attributable to subsidence of surface due to mining operations (including brine pumping), be the duty of the person having control of the watercourse or of the part thereof where the impediment occurs, or, if that person is not known, the person occupying the land through which the watercourse or that part of the watercourse passes, to put the watercourse or that part of the watercourse in proper order if by reason of such impediment agricultural land belonging to or in the occupation of some other person is injured by water or in danger of being so injured."

That section obviously does impose a statutory duty on a person on whose land the watercourse is situate, and, that being so, it adds to the common law duties or it imposes a duty other than the common law duty on the landowner, but we are not here in any way concerned with agricultural land nor in any proceedings taken in respect of any default under that Act. As I have said, in my opinion, it probably only applies to a watercourse which is within the area of a drainage board, and there is no evidence or suggestion that this one was. Further reliance was placed on s. 57 of the Act of 1930, which provides:

"(1) Where by reason of the neglect of the occupier of any land to maintain or join in maintaining the banks, or to cleanse and scour or join in cleansing and scouring the channels, of watercourses passing through over or adjoining his land, injury is caused to any other land, the owner or occupier of that land may serve notice on the said occupier requiring him, as the case may be, to maintain the banks or cleanse or scour the channels, or to join in maintaining the banks or in cleansing or scouring the channels of the watercourses."

It is provided by sub-s. (2) of that section that if any person is in default after notice has been duly served upon him and fails within two months from the date of the service to comply with the requirements,

"... the person by whom the notice is served may, if he thinks fit, execute all such works as are reasonably necessary ..."

and recover the expense of so doing. Again, I do not think we are concerned with that in this proceeding because it seems to me only to impose a duty on the owner or occupier of the land if he has been served with a notice. It is in effect giving a new remedy, a statutory remedy, and a statutory cause of action, to an adjoining landowner, first enabling him to serve a notice calling on a person to do something which he otherwise was not under a liability at common law to do, and, if he neglects to do it, the person serving the notice can do it himself and recover the expense. I cannot read that section as imposing a duty at large. The obligation seems to me to arise only where the notice has been served, and there has been a failure to comply with it. So I do not further consider the Land Drainage cases, and I do not think Finch v. Bannister (6) gives any real help on this matter, because the ratio decidendi of that case, both in the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal, was that a mill—the owner of the mill being the person complaining—was not land within a particular section.

A I now have to consider certain authorities to which our attention has been directed. The first is Margate Pier and Harbour (Co. of Proprietors) v. Margate Town Council (7), on which counsel for the appellants strongly relied because it was a case in which an accumulation of seaweed had taken place. The facts were that the harbour of Margate was vested in the Margate Pier and Harbour Company, and by the action of the sea a quantity of seaweed had drifted into the harbour, and, being left there, became a nuisance. It was held that the company were bound to remove it, and that, they not having effectually done so, an order was rightly made upon them under a section of the Nuisances Removal Act, 1855. In the course of the argument, LUSH, J., said (20 L.T. 568):

B “It is not so stated in the Case, and I cannot assume that there would not be the same accumulation if the piers were not there.”

C Piers had been built which, apparently, caused the accumulation of the seaweed. In giving judgment, LUSH, J., said (ibid.):

“I have no doubt, whatever, that it is the duty of the appellants to prevent the accumulation of seaweed so that it shall not become a nuisance, and that, whether produced by natural or artificial causes, they are bound to remove all matter in the harbour which is a nuisance, or injurious to health.”

D We need not consider that case at great length, because obviously one thing shown to have happened was that the accumulation had occurred owing to the building of the piers which were vested in the appellants, and, therefore, there had been something done by them which caused an accumulation to take place. There is an obvious difference between allowing seaweed or any other form of what may become filth to accumulate on your land and not remove it when it becomes a nuisance and what is alleged to be a nuisance which has arisen through the ordinary natural circumstances which occur in the bed of a stream. I do not think that case is really helpful in considering the present case.

E A.-G. v. Tod Heatley (8) was a very different case. A landowner in London allowed a piece of his land to get into a filthy condition. The court there approved of Margate Pier and Harbour (Co. of Proprietors) v. Margate Town Council (7), and I will read the headnote ([1897] 1 Ch. 560):

F “The defendant was the owner and occupier of a vacant piece of land in the metropolis. He had surrounded it by a hoarding, but people threw filth and refuse over, and broke up the hoarding, so that the condition of the land and the use to which it was put constituted a continuing public nuisance. In an action by the Attorney-General at the relation of the vestry of the parish :—Held, that it was a common law duty of the owner of the piece of land to prevent it from being so used as to be a public nuisance; and that the Attorney-General was entitled to an injunction to enforce the performance of that duty.”

G There the nuisance arose not from natural causes but because the owner of the land did not prevent people from throwing filth on the land, and therefore permitted the accumulation of filth on the land. That, again, I do not think helps us in this case.

H The case which, perhaps, needs more careful consideration is Clayton v. Sale Urban District Council (9), the headnote of which is as follows ([1926] 1 K.B. 415):

“Where a nuisance has arisen on land adjoining a river by flooding through a breach in the flood bank thereon, the owner of the land may, under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 94, be required to abate the nuisance, if it be found that the nuisance arose or continues by his 'act, default, or sufferance,' notwithstanding that, apart from that section, he is under no obligation by contract or otherwise to maintain or repair the flood bank."

We have had an interesting argument from counsel for the respondents on this case, because the court distinguished it from Thames Conservators v. Port of London Sanitary Authority (10). Counsel for the respondents contended that in Clayton v. Sale Urban District Council (9) the court had misunderstood or taken a wrong view of what was held in the Thames Conservators v. Port of London Sanitary Authority (10), and he said he derived assistance from that case. Whether it would be open to this court to say that the court was wrong in the view they took in the Thames Conservators v. Port of London Sanitary Authority (10) would raise a nice question. Where there are two conflicting authorities, it is always open to the court to follow the authority which it prefers; but this was a case in which the court did, rightly or wrongly—and we must assume rightly—distinguish the Thames Conservators v. Port of London Sanitary Authority (10), saying that part of the judgment of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., on which I think counsel for the respondents wished to rely was obiter. I do not find it necessary to decide that question, or say whether I prefer Clayton v. Sale Urban District Council (9) to the Thames Conservators v. Port of London Sanitary Authority (10), because, in my opinion, it does not affect the present case. At first sight I dare say it does, but when one comes to examine the case one finds that it did not come under s. 259 of the Public Health Act, 1936, at all, and that makes a very considerable difference because, if under s. 259 an obligation was imposed on a landowner who by his act, default, or sufferance allowed this state of affairs to continue, it might be we should have to come to a different decision from that which we are giving to-day. It is observable that there is a great distinction between s. 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, with which section alone the court was concerned in Clayton v. Sale Urban District Council (9), and s. 259, that is to say, that in the section with which we are dealing, the word "sufferance" does not occur. Therefore, we have to consider whether or not this obstruction was caused and was continued by the act or default, but not whether it was caused and continued through the act, default, or sufferance, of the respondents. I cannot construe the word "default" here in the way in which we have been asked to do so by the appellants. I do not think "default" means in this case merely doing nothing, unless the obligation to do something is imposed by the Act. There was no act here which caused the obstruction either to arise or to continue. I can well understand that there may be circumstances whereby a person failing to do something which he ought to do, as, for instance, preventing material going into a river from his own premises may be said to cause the obstruction by his default. In this case, on the facts found by the justices, there is nothing to show that the respondents did anything which caused this obstruction to arise or to continue, nor do I think that there is anything which can properly be called a default. There might have been facts which amounted to a sufferance, but sufferance is not mentioned in this section. For these reasons, in my opinion, the justices were fully justified in coming to the conclusion they did, and this appeal fails.

Income Tax—Deductions against profits of trade—Publication of journals for charity—Profits paid to charity—Liability of publishers in respect of profits.

A Income Tax—Deductions against profits—Subscriptions to charity on behalf of employees—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a).

The taxpayers published certain journals for the benefit of a charity and earned substantial profits, which, together with other moneys, they paid over to the charity. There had been no written agreement between the taxpayers and the charity, but publication was undertaken on the "distinct understanding" that the profits were to be paid to the charity. On a claim by the Crown for income tax in respect of the profits,

B HELD: (i) as there was no enforceable agreement between the taxpayers and the charity and no trust had been created, the profits formed part of the trading profits of the taxpayers and were assessable as such.

C (ii) although it might well be that the taxpayers would have suffered in reputation so as to affect their financial position had they not honoured their promise to pay the profits (or a sum equal thereto) to the charity, the moneys paid over could not on that ground be regarded as constituting a proper deduction in computing the taxpayers' profits for the purposes of income tax.

D The taxpayers paid subscriptions to the pension fund of the charity for such of their employees as accepted their offer to do so. An employee for whom such payment was made obtained a right to vote at the annual elections of pensioners or beneficiaries, and himself became eligible for a pension or other benefit. The taxpayers claimed to deduct the amount of the subscriptions in computing its profits for tax purposes.

E HELD: the payments were not moneys expended wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the company's trade, and, therefore, deduction thereof was prohibited by the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a).

CASE STATED by general commissioners for the city of London pursuant to the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149.

H The taxpayers, Hutchinson & Co. (Publishers), Ltd., appealed against an assessment to income tax of their trading profits for 1944-45, claiming that £31,469, which represented the profits from the publication of certain journals and which, pursuant to a prior understanding, were paid to a printing trade charitable organisation, did not fall to be included in the company's profits, or, alternatively, that an equivalent sum was deductible as a revenue expense of their trade. The company also claimed that a sum of £6,972 paid by them as employees' subscriptions to the pension fund of the charitable organisation was deductible in computing their profits. The general commissioners found against the company on all points.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and Graham-Dixon for the company.
Pennycuik, K.C., and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This is a Case stated by the income tax commissioners for the city of London. The taxpayers are Hutchinson & Company (Publishers), Ltd. The case raises two entirely separate points. The first concerns a sum of £31,469 which the Crown has claimed, and the commissioners have held, to be part of the taxpayers' profits based on the accounts for the trading year ending Dec. 31, 1943, and assessable to tax for the year 1944-45.

The taxpayers carry on a well-known publishing business, and the sum which I have mentioned represents the profits which were admittedly made by them in the printing, producing, and selling of certain publications entitled "Printers' Pie," "Christmas Pie," "Junior Pie," and "Printers' Devil," but what the taxpayers say is, in brief, that the sum was no part of the profits of their own trading but belonged in truth and in fact to a charity known as the Printers' Pension Almshouse and Orphan Asylum Corporation, which I will call "the corporation." Alternatively, they say that if (contrary to their first contention) the said sum did form part of their own trading profits, they are, nevertheless, entitled to set against it an equivalent sum as a permissible deduction from those profits. There is no doubt that they have paid that sum, with other moneys (as, indeed, is admitted), to the corporation. This alternative submission was by implication, though not expressly, rejected by the commissioners. I can refer to the various publications collectively as "Printers' Pie."

The facts are not really in dispute. At all material times the late Mr. Walter Hutchinson owned all the ordinary shares in Hutchinsons. He was its chairman and managing director and very largely controlled its operations and directed its policy. "Printers' Pie" had originated in 1902 and was, I think, then something of a novelty in charitable appeals. For a number of years thereafter it was brought out annually by various printing and publishing firms for the benefit of the corporation, which may be described as their special trade charity. Whether in those former years the proceeds were for tax purposes treated as belonging to the corporation ab initio, or as belonging to the firms and handed over by them ex gratia to the corporation, I do not know, but, on any view of the matter, it was common knowledge that a purchaser of "Printers' Pie" was, by his purchase, contributing to the support of the corporation which, as I have stated and as its name indicates, is a charity established for the benefit of persons and the dependants of persons engaged or employed in the trades or businesses of publishers and printers. "Printers' Pie" had not appeared since 1933 and when, in 1943, Mr. Hutchinson became chairman of the corporation he determined to revive it in order to augment the corporation's funds, and he, or, rather, the taxpayers, did so. The venture was very successful. The gross receipts from the sale of the issue of the resuscitated "Printers' Pie" amounted to no less than £42,677. The cost of the paper and printing came to £11,208. The balance is the sum of £31,469 which is now in dispute. I have already said that considerably more than that sum was paid over by the taxpayers to the corporation. The circumstances in which that was done are really not material, but there can be no question but that the corporation has, in fact, received from the taxpayers that sum, and more also, in augmentation of its charitable funds.

Now, in the admitted absence of any written agreement between the taxpayers and the corporation, but in view of the "distinct understanding" (whatever that may mean) to which they had come that the profits should go to the corporation, it seems to me that there are two possible views which may be taken in this case about what the essence of the matter really is. First, it may be said that the venture of bringing out "Printers' Pie" was undertaken by the taxpayers on the terms that they were acting as agents for the corporation under a special bargain that, if the venture resulted in a profit, the corporation should receive it, while, if there was a loss, the taxpayers would bear it. On that view, the profit belonged, as soon as realised, to the corporation and nothing belonged to the taxpayers, with the result, as they claim, that they ought not to be assessed to tax in respect of it. Or, secondly, it may be said that the taxpayers produced "Printers' Pie" with the object and intention of handing over to the corporation the profit, or an amount equal to the profit, resulting from the venture, or (to put the matter in another way) the amount by which the trading profits of the taxpayers were increased or augmented thereby. That means, I think, that the taxpayers were to hand over to the corporation some of the moneys which they themselves had earned and on which they were, accordingly, liable to be taxed. I incline to think that the taxpayers would have been justified in the forum of their own conscience if they had paid over to the corporation £31,469 less the amount of the tax, that is to say, 11/20ths of that sum, assuming that it had been subjected to tax in their hands, but it may well be that such a payment would have appeared to be lacking in generosity or might have been represented as an evasion of the taxpayers' obligations (were they legal or moral) to the corporation.

I am wholly unable to find any agreement here, whether of agency or otherwise, and I am equally unable to spell out of what was done or said any trust. At no time, so far as I can see, could the corporation have taken any proceedings either against the taxpayers or against Mr. Hutchinson to enforce any claim to the money. They were, of course, morally quite certain of getting it. The benevolent intentions of the taxpayers, and of Mr. Hutchinson in particular, and the wide publicity which had been given to those intentions served to create the very maximum of confidence and to afford ample security to the corporation that effect would be given to them, but a promise, however solemnly given and however certain it may be that it will not (because it cannot in decency) be broken, remains a promise and nothing else. That is the view which the commissioners have taken, and I can see no reason to differ from it.

The alternative claim on this part of the case may be thus stated. The payment of the £31,469 to the corporation is alleged to have been a necessary outgoing of the taxpayers' business because, had it not been made, the taxpayers would, or at least might, have been so ruined in reputation as to affect to a serious degree their financial position and standing. This is, to my mind, a plausible plea, but I have come to the conclusion that it is open to the same kind of objection as the other. Take the case of a successful tradesman in a country town who has a relative living in poverty near him whom, as his customers and neighbours all know, he has promised to maintain with an annual payment. If such a man were to withhold that payment, it is all too likely that he would lose his custom as well as his reputation, but could the payment for that reason be held to be a proper outgoing of and deduction from the profits of his business? I think not. The analogy of that imaginary case to the present case seems to me to be close. On this ground also, the appeal as to the £31,469 must fail.

Much stress was laid by the taxpayers' counsel on that passage in the Case which states that Mr. Hutchinson had invited advertisers who were willing to help the corporation to subscribe £100 for the corporation in return for a page advertisement in the publication, and that he secured the help of contributors and others free of charge, such persons being, of course, well aware that the publications were being brought out for the corporation's benefit. Indeed, that knowledge was widespread and there is no doubt that any attempt by the taxpayers to retain the profits for their own use (including the advertisers' payments) would have been damaging in the extreme to the taxpayers' reputation and goodwill. There is, however, nothing in those facts which, in my judgment, prevented the commissioners from reaching the conclusion at which they arrived, or is inconsistent with the view which I myself have expressed. On any view of the matter, the appeal as regards the £31,469 must, in my judgment, fail.

The other point raises entirely different considerations and presents, in my judgment, rather more difficulty. It concerns a sum of £6,972 which represents life subscriptions to the corporation paid by the taxpayers on behalf of certain of their employees—that is to say, 1,468 employees were made life members of the corporation's pension fund at a single-payment subscription of four guineas each and 384 employees were made life members of the orphan fund at a like subscription of two guineas each. Of all the employees to whom the offer was made, two only refused to accept it, and no equivalent cash payment was made to them. It appears that an employee for whom the payment, whether of four guineas or two guineas, was made obtained thereby two separate advantages—first, a right to vote at the annual elections of pensioners or beneficiaries, and, secondly, the right for himself or herself to be eligible for a pension or other benefit. With regard to the former of these privileges, it may be suggested that the conferring of voting rights on its employees would be remotely to the advantage of the taxpayers because the probability of the election of their employees rather than those of any rival publishing firm would be increased. It may also be said, with truth, that this payment was, in the case of each employee, something in the nature of a bonus, not of a large amount, giving to him or her an immediate advantage in consideration of past services and calculated to encourage efficiency and good feeling in the future, but can it be said that these were moneys wholly and exclusively expended for the purposes of the trade, properly referable to income and not to capital? So far as the taxpayers themselves were concerned, no benefit, and certainly no “enduring benefit,” except as previously mentioned, was conferred on them by these payments, and the fact that the benefits conferred on the employees were “enduring” seems to me to be immaterial, but because no employee seems to have had the option of taking his or her four guineas or two guineas in cash, I cannot for myself see how the sum was really a gratuity, or how it differed in substance from a free pass to a theatre or a free railway ticket to the seaside presented as a reward for good service. The sums of four guineas or two guineas were never cash in the hands of the employees, and cannot, I think, be treated as part of their wages or taxable income: see Tennant v. Smith (1). To allow them as deductions from the taxpayers' profits is, in my judgment, prohibited by r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and possibly also by r. 3 (f). British Insulated and Helsby Cables, Ltd. v. Atherton (2), and particularly the classic speech of LORD CAVE, L.C., seems to me to support the view which I have stated, though the formation of a pension fund with which that case deals seems to me to be rather a different matter from anything with which I am concerned here.

I feel bound to hold that there was ample evidence on which the commissioners could have reached their conclusions on this second point, and, although the matter is, to my mind, not free from difficulty, I think that the commissioners came to a right decision and drew a proper inference from the admitted facts. I hold, therefore, that the appeal fails as to the said sum of £6,972 also. The appeal must accordingly be dismissed, with costs.

Order accordingly.

RAILWAY EXECUTIVE v. CULKIN.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord MacDermott and Lord Reid), May 17, 18, 22, July 21, 1950.]

Workmen's Compensation—Compensation—Calculation of weekly payments—Change in rates of remuneration—Alteration in working hours—Same wage paid for forty-four hour week as previously paid for forty-eight hour week—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1943 (c. 6), s. 6 (1).

By the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1943, s. 6 (1): "For the purpose of calculating—(a) any weekly payment payable under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943 . . . the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident shall, if and whenever a change occurs after the date of the accident in the rates of remuneration obtaining in the class of employment in which the workman was employed during the relevant period before the accident, be deemed, so long as the changed rates obtain without further change, to be the average weekly earnings which he would have earned during that period if the changed rates had obtained throughout that period."

On Mar. 7, 1944, a workman employed in railway work as a loader was injured in an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. His pre-accident basic wage was 76s. a week for a standard week of forty-eight hours, but with overtime and tonnage bonus his average weekly wages amounted to 95s. 6d. From Apr. 17, 1944, the basic rate of 76s. a week was increased to 81s. a week, and from July 30, 1945, to 89s. a week, and as from the latter date the rate of overtime pay was also increased. On June 30, 1947, the forty-four hour week without loss of pay was introduced throughout the railway service, and the basic rate of loaders was increased from 89s. to 96s. 6d. a week. The workman claimed that in addition to the admitted change in his remuneration due to the increases in the basic and overtime rates a change in the rate of his remuneration within the meaning of s. 6 (1) of the Act of 1943 had also occurred in consequence of the reduction of the hours of the standard week, for, whereas the rate per hour before the accident was 76s. divided by forty-eight, it now was 96s. 6d. divided by forty-four, and, whereas before the accident forty-eight hours of actual work a week was remunerated at the basic weekly wage, now no more than forty-four hours of work was so remunerated, and, consequently, the workman must be regarded as having worked overtime, in the relevant pre-accident period, from the forty-fifth hour to the end of the forty-eighth hour.

HELD (LORD MACDERMOTT dissenting): there was a clear distinction between rates of remuneration and conditions of work; the appellant's basic rate of remuneration was, not an hourly, but a weekly, one, and it did not change merely because his conditions of service were altered by a variation in his working hours; and, therefore, the reduction in the hours of the working week did not result in a change occurring in the rates of remuneration obtaining in his class of employment within s. 6 (1).

APPEAL by the employers, the Railway Executive, from a decision of the Court of Appeal (BUCKNILL, COHEN and DENNING, L.J.J.), dated Mar. 3, 1949, allowing the appeal of the workman from an award of His Honour JUDGE STEWART, acting as an arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, made at York County Court on May 11, 1948.

The workman was employed as a loader in a railway goods warehouse. On Mar. 7, 1944, he met with an accident in his employment in consequence of which he was unable to perform the work of a loader, and subsequently he was employed as a messroom attendant. The workman was paid compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943, at the rate of 30s. per week plus supplementary allowances from the date of his accident to May 1, 1944, and thereafter weekly compensation at appropriate rates for partial incapacity. In consequence of increases in the basic rate of pay and the rate for Sunday duty, new calculations were made under s. 6 (1) of the Act of 1943 with the result that as from July 30, 1945, the workman's pre-accident average weekly earnings were calculated at 110s. 4d. On June 24, 1947, a court of inquiry appointed under the Industrial Courts Act, 1919, recommended further increases in the basic rates of wages of all grades of employees and the introduction, in place of the forty-eight hour week, of a forty-four hour week, without loss of pay. In acceptance of these recommendations, the employers introduced, as from June 30, 1947, the forty-four hour week throughout the railway service and increased by 7s. 6d. the basic weekly rate of remuneration of the "conciliation" staff which included both the pre-accident and post-accident grades of the workman. The workman claimed that, by reason of a reduction of the hours of the standard week, there had been a change of remuneration within the meaning of s. 6 (1) (a) of the Act of 1943 necessitating a further calculation of his pre-accident average weekly wages by dividing those wages by the number of hours comprising the new standard week. The employers contended that the change in the standard week was merely an alteration in the conditions of work, leaving the basic weekly rate unaffected. The learned county court judge upheld the employers' contentions, but the Court of Appeal, following its previous decision in Shaw v. Rootes Securities, Ltd. (1) allowed the workman's appeal and remitted the case for a new trial. The facts are fully set out in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

Beney, K.C., and R. W. Payne for the appellants.

Paull, K.C., and R. M. Everett for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

July 21. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, in this case it was conceded by the appellants in the Court of Appeal that they could not succeed in that court if the earlier case of Shaw v. Rootes Securities, Ltd. (1) was rightly decided, and, in effect, their appeal to this House is brought to test the correctness of that decision, in which the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, L.J., and ROMER, J., SOMERVELL, L.J., dissenting) dismissed the employers' appeal from an award of a learned county court judge and gave to s. 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1943, a meaning and effect which the present appellants ask your Lordships to reject. That section, which is headed "Calculation of weekly payments in case of changes in rates of remuneration," provides by sub-s. (1) as follows:

"For the purpose of calculating—(a) any weekly payment payable under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943, or under any scheme made under those Acts, for total or partial incapacity, or (b) any

A supplementary allowances payable in respect of any such weekly payment or the total amount of the supplementary allowances payable in respect of any such weekly payment, the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident shall, if and whenever a change occurs after the date of the accident in the rates of remuneration obtaining in the class of employment in which the workman was employed during the relevant period before the accident, be deemed, so long as the changed rates obtain without further change, to be the average weekly earnings which he would have earned during that period if the changed rates had obtained throughout that period."

B In the present case these are the material facts. Culkin, the respondent, was before his accident employed by the predecessors of the appellants, who undertook their liabilities, as a loader at the York goods warehouse. On Mar. 7, 1944, he met with an accident in his employment in consequence of which he was unable to perform the work of a loader. He has for some time past been employed by the appellants at York as a messroom attendant. For the fifty-two weeks preceding the accident he worked as a loader on a guaranteed or standard week of forty-eight hours at a basic rate of 76s. per week. During C the same period he was entitled to be paid special rates as follows: Day overtime at the rate of time and a quarter, night duty at the rate of time and a quarter, night overtime at the rate of time and a half, and Sunday duty at the rate of time and a half. His weekly earnings during the period in question averaged at these rates 95s. 6d. which included a tonnage bonus of 8s. 7d. The respondent was paid compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts at the rate D of 30s. per week plus supplementary allowances from the date of his accident to May 1, 1944, and thereafter weekly compensation at appropriate rates for partial incapacity. By virtue of agreements between the appellants or their predecessors and the railway trade unions the basic rate of 76s. per week was from Apr. 17, 1944, increased to 81s. per week and from July 30, 1945, to 89s. per week. From July 30, 1945, the rate of Sunday duty was also increased E from time and a half to time and three quarters. In consequence of these increases new calculations were made under s. 6 of the Act of 1943 with the result that as from July 30, 1945, the respondent's pre-accident average weekly earnings were calculated at 110s. 4d.

Then came the event which gave rise to the present dispute. On June 24, 1947, a court of inquiry appointed under the Industrial Courts Act, 1919, to F inquire into applications by trade unions representing the employees of the railway companies for improvements in wages and reductions in weekly hours of work made a report containing certain recommendations, which, since they were adopted by the parties and must be regarded as defining their contractual rights and obligations, I will state, so far as they are relevant, verbatim. By para. 111, they recommended as follows:

G "Having regard to all the considerations outlined above and as an interim measure we recommend that the basic rates or salaries of all adult workers covered by the various claims before us be advanced by the sum of 7s. 6d. per week (or £19 10s. per annum in the case of salaried employees), with appropriate adjustments for juveniles in accordance with the practice of the industry, as from the beginning of the first full pay period following H June 30, 1947."

By para. 115 they recommended as follows:

"We recommend that a forty-four hour week be introduced . . . without loss of pay. To this general recommendation we make one exception. We think that the hours of clerical staffs should be standardised at forty-two per week without loss of pay and without prejudice to more favourable arrangements at present operating. The new arrangements with regard to hours should come into force simultaneously with the increase in wages."

In pursuance of this report and its acceptance, the appellants, as from June 30, 1947, introduced the forty-four hour week throughout the railway service and increased by 7s. 6d. the basic weekly rate of remuneration of the "conciliation" staff which included both the pre-accident and post-accident grades of the respondent. Thus the rate of his pre-accident grade of loader was increased from 89s. to 96s. 6d. per week and the rate of his present grade from 85s. to 92s. 6d. per week. A

The question, however, arose what effect, if any, on the re-calculation, which in any case had to be made, should be given to the reduction of the standard week from forty-eight hours to forty-four hours. On this the parties could not agree and on Feb. 3, 1948, the respondent filed in the York county court a request for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Acts claiming as follows: B

"(A) That in the relevant pre-accident period the respondent worked on a guaranteed week of forty-eight hours plus overtime rates calculated on a daily basis and tonnage bonus, and his average weekly earnings were 95s. 6d. As from June 30, 1947, men in the respondent's pre-accident grade had worked on a guaranteed week of forty-four hours plus overtime rates calculated on a daily basis as aforesaid; Sunday work had been paid at the rate of time and three quarters as compared with time and a half at the date of the accident and payment for the forty-fifth to the forty-eighth hours both inclusive had been at overtime rates. C

"(B) That as from June 30, 1947, the rate per hour on which remuneration for ordinary time, overtime and Sunday work had been calculated had been 2s. 2½d. (i.e., 96s. 6d. divided by forty-four) as compared with a rate per hour before the accident of 1s. 7d. (i.e., 76s. 0d. divided by forty-eight). D

"(c) That the result of substituting the current rate of 2s. 2½d. per hour for the pre-accident rate of 1s. 7d. per hour and taking into account the above-mentioned adjustments as to payment for Sunday work and for the forty-fifth to forty-eighth hours inclusive was to increase the respondent's average weekly earnings from 95s. 6d. a week to a notional figure of 133s." E

To this claim the appellants made an answer which (as amended at the hearing), while admitting that the respondent was by reason of the increase in the relevant basic rate from 89s. to 96s. 6d. and the increase in Sunday rate entitled to have his notional pre-accident average weekly earnings increased to the sum of 121s., otherwise denied the validity of the claim. The learned county court judge (who made his award before the decision of the Court of Appeal in Shaw's case (1) to which I have referred) held that the application was not well founded and made an award in favour of the appellants. From his decision the respondent appealed to the Court of Appeal, who, as I have said, then had the authority of Shaw's case (1) before them, and, as was conceded by the present appellants, were bound by it. I must now refer in more detail to that case. F

In Shaw's case (1) the material fact was that by an industrial arbitration award the basic pay for women workers in the engineering industry was, after the workman's accident, fixed at 62s. 6d. for a forty-four hour week instead of 62s. 6d. for a forty-seven hour week. The question was whether there had been a change in the "rate of remuneration" of a workman, who had in the pre-accident period worked an average of fifty-seven hours per week (including overtime), so as to entitle her to a re-calculation of her notional pre-accident earnings and an adjustment of her compensation. This question, as I have already indicated, was answered in the affirmative by TUCKER, L.J., and ROMER, J., in the negative by SOMERVELL, L.J. I do not very easily follow G H the reasoning of TUCKER, L.J. The crucial passage in his judgment appears to be that in which he says ([1948] 2 All E.R. 170):

"I would agree that a mere change in the hours of a working week where no question of overtime is involved would not constitute a change in the rate of remuneration. It is, however, essential in the present case to remember that we are bound to apply the change to the average fifty-seven hours per week in fact worked by the workman before her accident, and this necessarily involves applying overtime rates to hours which did not previously carry overtime rates."

If I understand this passage, it appears to involve that, whereas there was no change in the rate of remuneration for the forty-fifth, forty-sixth and forty-seventh hours, yet by reason of the reduction of hours from forty-seven to forty-four there was ipso facto a change in the rate of remuneration for each hour above forty-seven. With great respect to the learned lord justice I do not think that this can possibly be right. ROMER, J., took, I think, a somewhat different view. He asks the question (ibid., 171):

"Is, then, 62s. 6d. for forty-seven hours' work a week, and overtime for subsequent hours, the same 'rate of remuneration' as 62s. 6d. for forty-four hours' work, and overtime for subsequent hours?"

To this he gives the answer No, and accordingly would regard a change in the rate of remuneration as having occurred in respect not only of the hours in excess of forty-seven but also of the forty-fifth, forty-sixth and forty-seventh hours. SOMERVELL, L.J., on the other hand, after stating the change of hours in the normal working week, poses the question thus (ibid., 170):

"Is this a change in the rates of remuneration? The answer seems to me to depend on whether the rate of remuneration is properly expressed as a rate for a week or for so many hours in a week. If the former, then I think a reduction of working hours, though it gives the workman more spare time, leaves unaffected his rate of remuneration which is a weekly rate. In a case such as this, where the wage was clearly a weekly wage, this seems to me to be the natural and ordinary meaning of the words."

The learned lord justice, after enforcing his view by examples from every-day usage, concluded that there had been no change in the rates of remuneration within the meaning of the section.

My Lords, I think that SOMERVELL, L.J., was right and that his reasoning is clearly applicable to the present case. In the first place, I cannot doubt that the basic rate of remuneration is a weekly rate. In every relevant contractual document it is referred to either expressly as a weekly rate or in terms which make it clear that it is a weekly rate. It may be called a standard week's rate and the week may be a varying number of hours' work, but it remains a weekly rate. No doubt, it was necessary for many purposes in order to calculate the amount of wages due to a workman at the end of the week to break down the weekly rate to an hourly sum, whether because the workman had not worked (in which I include availability for work) the requisite number of hours or because he had worked overtime or night duty or Sunday duty and the quantum due to him at the appropriate rate of time and a quarter or time and a half had to be ascertained. The wages department of the appellants and of their predecessors made their calculations accordingly and specimens of such calculations were put in evidence, but this proper, and, indeed, necessary, method of calculation does not appear to me to affect the elementary fact that the basic rate was a weekly not an hourly rate and that the sums due for what I will call special duty, i.e., overtime, night duty and Sunday duty, were ascertainable by reference to that weekly rate.

What, then, must the arbitrator do when it falls to him to determine whether there has been, since the accident, a change in the rates of remuneration obtaining in the class of employment in which the workman was during the relevant period employed? This determination is the necessary prelude to the application of the changed rates to his actual average pre-accident weekly earnings. It appears to me that this question is not difficult to answer. In the case now under appeal the respondent's wages were made up of his basic weekly wage and payments for overtime, night duty, and Sunday duty, each of these constituents of his total weekly earnings being paid for at the appropriate rate. The arbitrator will ask whether any and which of these rates have been changed since the accident or (for the purposes of this case) since the last re-calculation. He will be told that the basic rate has been increased by 7s. 6d. a week, but that no other rates have been increased. He must base his calculation on this increase. He turns then to the pre-accident weekly earnings. They are made up of wages for ordinary duty and wages for special duty. As I have already indicated, it is necessary to do a simple mathematical sum in order to ascertain the amount due for special duty. This is simply and conveniently done by aggregating all the hours worked in a week. To the hours of ordinary duty are added the hours of special duty equated at the appropriate rate (four hours' overtime equal five hours' ordinary time and so on) and the sum which is ascertained by dividing the weekly rate by the number of hours in the standard week is multiplied by this aggregate number of hours. If the only increase has been an increase in the weekly rate the arbitrator has nothing else to do than to apply the new increased rate instead of the old rate to the same number of hours. The method of calculation ensures that the new increased rate is reflected in an increased payment for the special duty hours as for the ordinary duty hours. If, on the other hand, there has been an increase in some other rate also, as, for instance in the rate for Sunday duty, then the arbitrator must make a further adjustment, counting the hours of Sunday duty included in the aggregate of hours at time and three quarters instead of time and a half. Nothing, as it seems to me, could be simpler than this and it is what the appellants say should be done and what the arbitrator in fact did.

The respondent, however, seeks to introduce an entirely different method of computation. His starting point is that the basic rate is really an hourly rate, this contention, if I understand it, being based on the fact that the working week is a week of so many hours and that for numerous purposes, as I have already pointed out, the weekly rate must be broken down to an hourly rate. He then says that, if the workman is paid at an hourly rate and if he works less hours for the same sum, then his rate of remuneration is changed. This is, I think, the view taken by ROMER, J., in Shaw's case (1). The short answer is that the argument proceeds on a false premise. The basic rate of remuneration is, not an hourly, but a weekly, one, and that rate does not change merely because the conditions of service are altered whether by an alteration of the working hours or otherwise. To put it slightly differently, an alteration of working hours will, no doubt, result in hours, which before the accident were ordinary hours, becoming after it overtime hours, but that is no justification for treating the hours which were actually worked before the accident as being other than what they, in fact, were. This appears to have been the view of TUCKER, L.J., when he said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 170):

This seems to me a very clear point and not susceptible of elaboration. Then, however, it is said—and this seems to have been the view of TUCKER, L.J.—that it makes a difference if overtime has been worked. I see no reason for this. Let me assume a very simple case. Let a workman's pre-accident weekly rate be 96s. for a week of forty-eight hours and let the overtime rate be time and a quarter. Assume that his weekly earnings are 126s. made up of forty-eight hours ordinary time ($48 \times 2s. = 96s.$) and twelve overtime hours ($5/4 \times 12 \times 2s. = 30s.$). This can be and habitually is stated simply by saying that his earnings are calculated at sixty-three hours at 2s. an hour. Now let the basic rate be increased to 120s. This figure must now be applied to the same hours. The same process is gone through. A weekly rate of 120s. equals 2s. 6d. per hour for a week of forty-eight hours, but the workman has ex hypothesi worked also twelve overtime hours which are counted as fifteen ordinary hours: he is therefore entitled to sixty-three hours at 2s. 6d. per hour or to 157s. 6d. in all. To me, my Lords, this seems simply and inevitably to flow from acceptance of the view that you must not for the purpose of making your new calculation change the character of the pre-accident hours from ordinary to overtime. If indeed you do that, I do not know to what confusion it may lead. Let me, however, pursue the example I have given a little further. Let me suppose that not only is the basic rate increased but the overtime rate also is increased from time and a quarter to time and a half. Then, taking the same figures, the twelve overtime hours become eighteen ordinary hours and there is an aggregate of sixty-six hours to be paid for at the new rate of 2s. 6d.

I have taken a simple example but hardly, I think, so simple as the case now under appeal. Here the basic rate is increased. This increase takes effect in the way that I have described. That is, in fact, the way in which the appellants have, with the approval of the arbitrator, calculated the sum due to the respondent. In my opinion, this appeal should be allowed with costs here and below and the decision and award of the arbitrator restored.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, the respondent is an employee in the railway service in "the conciliation grade," and for the fifty-two weeks preceding Mar. 7, 1944, the date of the accident, he worked as a loader on a guaranteed or standard week of forty-eight hours at a basic rate of 76s. per week. In the same period he was entitled to be paid for day overtime at the rate of time and a quarter, for night duty at the rate of time and a quarter, for night overtime at the rate of time and a half and for Sunday duty at the rate of time and a half. The wages payable each week to a workman were calculated by converting the number of hours actually worked into the number of hours for which payment had to be made—for example, by treating four hours actually worked overtime as five hours ordinary time, and applying to the total the weekly base rate. The average of the weekly wages earned by the respondent in the year before the accident was 95s. 6d., but this included a tonnage bonus of 8s. 7d. per week. The figure of 95s. 6d. was re-calculated in consequence of increases in the base rate to 81s. per week from Apr. 17, 1944, and to 89s. per week from July 30, 1945, and of an increase of the Sunday duty rate to time and three quarters from July 30, 1945. On June 24, 1947, a court of inquiry appointed under the Industrial Courts Act, 1919, to inquire into applications by the trade unions representing the employees of the railway companies for improvements in wages and reductions in weekly hours of work submitted a report recommending that the base rate should be advanced by the sum of 7s. 6d. per week and that a forty-four hour week should replace the forty-eight hour week without loss of pay. In pursuance of this report the appellants as from June 30, 1947, introduced a forty-four hour week and increased the base weekly wage of the conciliation grade by 7s. 6d. a week. The base rate for the respondent's pre-accident grade of loader was thus increased to 96s. 6d. per week.

The appellants concede that the respondent's pre-accident average weekly wages should be re-calculated under s. 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1943, and they admit that since the accident the rates of remuneration obtaining in the class of employment in which the respondent was employed before the accident have been changed (a) by the increase of the base weekly wage from 76s. to 96s. 6d. which, of course, will affect the sums in respect of overtime or night or Sunday duty worked by the respondent, and (b) by the increase of the Sunday duty rate from time and a half to time and three quarters. The respondent says that, besides these changes, the remuneration of the class of employment in which he was employed before the accident has been increased in two respects in consequence of the reduction of the hours of the guaranteed week from forty-eight to forty-four. First, the rate per hour before the accident was 76s. divided by forty-eight or 1s. 7d., but now it is 96s. 6d. divided by forty-four or 2s. 2½d. Secondly, whereas before the accident forty-eight hours of actual work a week, unless it was in part overtime or night or Sunday duty, was remunerated at the base weekly wage, now no more than forty-four of these hours of work is so remunerated and the forty-fifth to forty-eighth hours inclusive must be remunerated at a rate not less than time and a quarter or 96s. 6d. divided by forty-four, or approximately 2s. 2½d. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Shaw v. Rootes Securities, Ltd. (1) supports the second of these contentions.

In my opinion, both contentions fail for reasons which can be briefly stated. There is a clear distinction between rates of remuneration and hours and conditions of work. It is a distinction well recognised in contracts of employment and it is familiar in industrial disputes. In the very report of the court of inquiry which brought about an increase in the base rates and the introduction of the forty-four hour week the distinction is carefully observed. Section 6 of the Act of 1943 deals only with changes in the rate of remuneration. It is not concerned with changes of the hours of work. Nor is it concerned with the remuneration which the injured workman would have been earning at the date of the application for review. The section assumes that the whole other conditions of work in the relevant pre-accident period have remained unaltered, and that the rates of remuneration alone have changed. There is no warrant in the section for a re-classification of the hours of work or for treating them as anything but what they were when they were actually worked, so many ordinary working hours and so many hours of special duty of one sort or another. Finally, the contract between the respondent and the employer was on a weekly basis, though for the purpose of reckoning the wages in any week a rate per hour calculated from the base rate for a standard week was used. That the contract was a weekly contract for a weekly wage is evident from the use in it of such terms as "the standard week's work," "the standard week's wages," and "weekly rate of wage" and of tables in which the rates of pay of various categories of employees of the conciliation grade are shown as weekly wages.

I respectfully think that Shaw v. Rootes Securities, Ltd. (1) was wrongly decided, but I do not in anything that I have said intend to prejudice a case in which the remuneration is not based on a weekly rate of wages. I would allow the appeal.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON (read by LORD REID): My Lords, it is common ground between the parties that the increase of 7s. 6d. in the basic weekly rate of remuneration, as from June 30, 1947, was "a change . . . in the rates of remuneration obtaining in the class of employment in which the workman was employed during the relevant period before the accident" within s. 6 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1943.

Counsel for the respondent workman put forward three arguments in this House. First, he submitted that the introduction of a forty-four hour "standard week," as from the same date, in place of a forty-eight hour standard week, was also "a change in the rates of remuneration etc.," within the same sub-section, both as regards the standard week and as regards work falling outside the standard week. Secondly, and alternatively, he submitted that, even if his first argument was too wide in its terms, there had at least been a change in the rate of remuneration for work falling outside the standard week. Lastly, counsel submitted, perhaps with less vigour, that by reason of the reduction of the "standard week's work" from forty-eight hours to forty-four hours, the respondent must now be regarded as having worked overtime, in the relevant period before the accident, from the beginning of the forty-fifth hour to the end of the forty-eighth hour.

A I can deal at once with this last argument. I cannot accept it because, as my noble and learned friend LORD NORMAND has said, there is no warrant in the section for a re-classification of the hours worked in the pre-accident period, or for treating these hours as anything but what they were when they were actually worked.

B Counsel's first argument, however, raises a question on which I have felt very great doubt. It is quite correct, as a matter of arithmetic, that every workman will receive more pay for every hour that he works, as a result of the reduction in the "standard week" from forty-eight to forty-four hours. I shall illustrate this by taking the case of a workman whose basic weekly wage has been raised, as from June 30, 1947, from 89s. to 96s. 6d. If the standard week had remained at forty-eight hours, that workman would have received C 96s. 6d. divided by forty-eight for each hour of work in the standard week, but as the standard week has been reduced to forty-four hours, he receives 96s. 6d. divided by forty-four for each hour of work in the standard week, and this is a higher rate of remuneration than 96s. 6d. divided by forty-eight per hour. Moreover, this higher rate of remuneration is carried into each hour of work which falls outside the standard week. I think that this change, D resulting from the reduction in hours, might well be described as a change in the workman's rate of remuneration, and I find it very difficult to determine whether it is a change in the rate of remuneration in the sense in which these words are used in s. 6 (1) of the Act of 1943. I have ultimately arrived at the conclusion that it is not, for two reasons. In the first place, the rate of remuneration "obtaining in the class of employment in which the workman was E employed during the relevant period before the accident" is a weekly rate, and the only change in that weekly rate has been the increase of 7s. 6d. already mentioned. The introduction of a forty-four hour week in place of a forty-eight hour week "without loss of pay" in no way affected the weekly rate. In the second place, I think that both employers and employed have throughout recognised a clear distinction between rates of remuneration on the one hand F and conditions of work, including the number of hours constituting the standard week, on the other. In these circumstances, although it is true that, as a matter of arithmetic, each workman will in fact receive more money for each hour of his standard week's work, I do not think that the introduction of a forty-four hour week is a "change in the rates of remuneration" within s. 6 (1) of the Act of 1943. It follows that, in my view, the case of Shaw v. Rootes Securities, Ltd. (1) was wrongly decided. G

Counsel's second and alternative argument also raises a difficult question. I think it is true to say that the workman is paid on an hourly basis in respect of time worked over and above the standard week, and, therefore, my first reason for rejecting counsel's first argument does not apply to his second argument. Nevertheless, I think that this argument must also be rejected, first H because, as I have already pointed out, a change in the conditions of work is not a "change in the rates of remuneration" within the section, and, secondly, because I think that according to the scheme of the Act of 1943 one and the same basis of calculation must be applied throughout. I cannot believe that if the rate of remuneration for an hour of ordinary duty is to be treated as x for the purposes of the necessary calculation under s. 6 (1), the rate of remuneration for overtime, at "time and a quarter," can be anything different from $1\frac{1}{4}$ times x . I would allow the appeal and restore the decision and award of the arbitrator.

LORD MACDERMOTT: My Lords, when the respondent was injured on Mar. 7, 1944, in the course of his employment as a loader, he was entitled under his contract of service to be paid each week the amount earned by him under each of the following heads:—1. A basic weekly wage of 76s., for a standard week of forty-eight hours, which was “guaranteed” or payable in full if the workman was available for duty throughout the standard week. 2. Day overtime at the rate of time and a quarter. 3. Night duty (ordinary time) at the rate of time and a quarter. 4. Night duty (overtime) at the rate of time and a half. 5. Sunday duty at the rate of time and a half. He was also entitled to receive, as part of his remuneration each week, a tonnage bonus. All overtime and Sunday duty (i.e., turns commencing on a Sunday) were to be excluded from and paid independently of the guaranteed week. The respondent's average weekly earnings during the twelve months before his accident, calculated under these heads and including a tonnage bonus of 8s. 7d., were 95s. 6d., and after the accident compensation at the appropriate rates under the Workmen's Compensation Acts was duly paid to him. By June 24, 1947, the terms of service for loaders had been altered in two respects. The basic weekly wage had become 89s. and the Sunday duty rate had changed from time and a half to time and three quarters. These alterations entitled the respondent to an increase in his weekly compensation under s. 6 (1) of the Act of 1943, and an increase was in fact granted. It would seem that this did not take the change respecting Sunday duty into consideration. The omission, however, is not now important, it being conceded by the appellants that this change must be regarded in applying the provisions of the section. On June 24, 1947, two further changes touching the remuneration of loaders were made in their contracts. These gave effect to certain recommendations of a court of inquiry appointed under the Industrial Courts Act, 1919, and were as follows:—First, the basic weekly wage was advanced by 7s. 6d. to become 96s. 6d.; and, secondly, —and this is what led to the present dispute—the standard week of forty-eight hours was reduced to one of forty-four hours without loss of pay. The respondent having filed a request to review and increase his compensation on account of these changes and the application of s. 6 (1) thereto, the learned county court judge accepted the contentions of the appellants and made an award in their favour. The Court of Appeal, following its previous decision in Shaw v. Rootes Securities, Ltd. (1), allowed the respondent's appeal and remitted the matter for a new trial. It is from this order that the appellants now appeal.

The submissions advanced before your Lordships may be stated without entering on the detail of the computations referred to in the evidence. What the appellants said was, in essence, this. Section 6 (1) only operates where there has been a change in rates of remuneration. The change from forty-eight to forty-four hours is not such a change. It is but an alteration in the conditions of work and it leaves the only relevant rate, that is, the basic weekly rate, and the other heads of remuneration which are derived from it on the basis of time and a fraction, quite untouched. We admit that the increase of 7s. 6d. and the alteration from time and a half to time and three quarters for Sunday duty must be reckoned under the section, but these changes and the re-calculation they necessitate have nothing to do with an hourly rate or the reduction of working hours, and on the facts the result they produce is more than offset by an increase in the wages which the respondent is now earning.

The gist of the respondent's case, on the other hand, was to this effect: What-ever it is called, the basic wage is tied to a week of so many hours and can as readily be expressed as an hourly rate; that is how ordinary time is reckoned if a workman loses pay by absence and that is how all overtime and special duty must be reckoned. The hourly rate is, accordingly, the relevant rate for the purpose of s. 6 (1) and the comparable basic pre-accident and present rates are, therefore, 76s. divided by forty-eight per hour and 96s. 6d. divided by forty-four per hour. The latter, must, in consequence, be substituted for the former in re-calculating my average earnings. In addition, I am entitled, in the course of that re-calculation, to be credited with overtime for the forty-fifth to forty-eighth hours (both inclusive) that I worked ordinary time in each week before the accident, for those are now overtime hours. The respondent also advanced an alternative argument which might be expressed thus: Even if I am wrong about the basic wage and it is to be regarded as a weekly rate and is not to be broken down into an hourly rate for the standard week for the purposes of s. 6 (1), nevertheless, for earnings in respect of time worked over and above the standard week an hourly rate must be the basis and that means that when the hours so worked have been equated to ordinary time the appropriate rate for them will be 96s. 6d. divided by forty-four.

My Lords, the respondent's contention regarding the forty-fifth to forty-eighth hours may conveniently be disposed of now. It turns on the provisions of s. 6 (1) which have already been read and which I need not repeat. As I understand this enactment it does not direct an inquiry as to what the workman would be earning after a change occurs in the rates of remuneration had he remained in the same employment. What it requires is an application of the new rates to the work he did during the pre-accident period. Normally, it merely involves (in the case of time rates) a re-costing of his time sheets by applying the new rates instead of those they replace. The categories of the pre-accident earnings and the time worked in each of them remain as they were. Thus, if in the twelve months before the accident the workman worked x ordinary hours and y overtime hours, the new ordinary and overtime rates must be applied to x and y respectively. There is no warrant in s. 6 for a process which makes these categories into $x-z$ and $y+z$ before applying the new rates. This was not the precise issue in Hill v. Wolverhampton Corrugated Iron Co., Ltd. (2), or Trawlers (Grimsby), Ltd. v. Crouchen (3), but I think the view just expressed follows from what was said by the Court of Appeal in those cases and approved by this House in Paterson v. Beardmore (William) & Co., Ltd. (4) ([1948] L.J.R. 1151). I am therefore of opinion that the respondent is wrong in claiming, as he does, that the forty-fifth, forty-sixth, forty-seventh and forty-eighth hours worked by him as part of each standard week before the accident should now be treated as overtime. Whatever the appropriate rate for re-costing may be, it must be applied to these hours as ordinary time.

This leaves for determination the question whether in a case like the present the "rates of remuneration" to be taken into account for the purposes of s. 6 (1) are weekly rates or hourly rates or both. I do not think this an easy problem having regard to the nature of the contract, and I doubt if there is any solution based, as it must be, on the true construction of the section which will produce an equally reasonable result in all the variations of circumstance that may come to be governed by the decision. From the provisions of the agreements fixing the terms and conditions of employment for the grade to which the respondent belonged I have no doubt that the guaranteed rate for ordinary duty is properly described as a weekly rate. That is how it appears in the relevant schedules, for the amounts therein are weekly amounts, and that, presumably, is why the increases in basic rates—the expression used in one of the adopted recommendations of the court of inquiry—have been made by an addition of so much per week. If, then, the contract of service for the grade in question had dealt only with ordinary duty and payment for overtime and special duty had not to be considered, the view that the rate proper to be regarded for the purposes of s. 6 (1) was the weekly rate and none other would march with the contract and have much to commend it on that account. This cannot, however, be taken as beyond debate. As I read Shaw's case (1), the Court of Appeal was not unanimous on the point. TUCKER, L.J., on the present hypothesis of nothing but ordinary duty, would have held, I think, in favour of a weekly rate, for he said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 170):

"I would agree that a mere change in the hours of a working week where no question of overtime is involved would not constitute a change in the rate of remuneration."

SOMERVELL, L.J., would have held likewise. ROMER, J., on the other hand, would have applied an hourly rate, though recognising that this was more doubtful for ordinary time than for overtime. In the course of his judgment he said (ibid., 172):

"... a reward of 62s. 6d. for forty-four hours' work is, in my view, a different 'rate of remuneration' from a reward of 62s. 6d. for forty-seven hours' work."

Later, in reference to the submission of the employers, he added (ibid.):

"The argument is founded on a view which is, I think, erroneous, namely, that, because there has been no change in the standard time rate per week, the change in the standard time itself must, therefore, be regarded as irrelevant. To my mind, the duration of the standard time per week is just as relevant to the solution of the present problem as the quantum of the remuneration which is paid in respect of it."

My Lords, the limited question now under discussion is not, of course, the complete issue in this appeal. I have referred to it as a convenient approach to that issue and because the divergence of judicial opinion just mentioned sounds a warning against any too ready acceptance of the view that the rate as described in the contract must necessarily be the rate for s. 6. When one is dealing with rates for precisely measured time a good deal can, I think, be said for the view that the expression "rate of remuneration" looks to what is being remunerated no less closely than it looks to what is being paid, and, for my part, I doubt if a change, one way or the other, in the length of the standard week, the weekly wage remaining as it was, can be accurately described as merely an alteration in the conditions of work. It is, however, unnecessary, on the opinion I have formed on the case as a whole, to express any final conclusion on this vexed question and I refrain from doing so, but as the view favoured by ROMER, J., would, if accepted, determine not only that question but this appeal adversely to the appellants, I shall, for present purposes, proceed on the assumption, in their favour, that the learned judge was wrong and that, when nothing but ordinary time is concerned, a mere reduction in the number of working hours per week without loss of pay will not in itself spell any change of rate within the meaning of the section. So assuming, the question then becomes this—and it is a question quite distinct from that already considered respecting the forty-fifth to forty-eighth hours: Does the fact that the contract embraces overtime and special duty as well as ordinary duty make a difference? I think it does, at any rate in cases such as this where the terms of the contract and the public character of the service for which it provides make it clear that Sunday duty, night duty and overtime are not to be treated as merely occasional or incidental categories. In such circumstances the reduction in hours without loss of pay is no longer capable of meaning only so much less work; it means more pay for every hour of overtime or special duty worked or deemed to be worked. I am unable to find any convincing reason for holding that this does not import a change of rate. I think it would be regarded as so doing by the ordinary workman and his employer. By their very nature overtime and special duty must be remunerated according to the "time worked"—that is the expression used in the contract in respect of each of the special categories—and by the application of a unit of time which necessarily is much less than a week and is normally taken as an hour. I do not think it is an answer to say "overtime was and still is time and a quarter and, therefore, the rate for overtime remains the same." To speak of time and a quarter, or whatever the fraction may be, is not really to state a rate of remuneration. It is a well understood way of saying how the rate is to be computed by reference to ordinary time rates. Let it be assumed, for the sake of simplicity, that in the present case the basic weekly rate of 76s. had not been increased and that Sunday duty had remained at time and a half throughout. The respondent before the accident got paid for each hour of Sunday duty 76s. multiplied by $1\frac{1}{2}$, divided by forty-eight, or 2s. $4\frac{1}{2}d$. At the date of his application for a review, however, a loader on Sunday duty in the same class of employment would have received for each hour of such duty (on the assumptions I have made) 76s. multiplied by $1\frac{1}{2}$, divided by forty-four, or 2s. 7d. That, I think, is a fair example and one which serves to show that, apart from any variation in the basic weekly rate, the reduction in the length of the standard week without loss of pay necessarily meant, as respects overtime and special duty, a change in what any workman would regard as his rate of remuneration.

My Lords, the considerations to which I have so far referred seemed at first to lend weight to the respondent's alternative argument and led me to examine the possibility of applying two rates of remuneration in the operation of s. 6 (1)—the first a weekly rate relating to ordinary time and being the current basic rate; and the second an hourly rate relating to the other time categories and based on the reward now actually paid in respect thereof. On reflection, however, I have come to the conclusion that the terms of the contract tie the ordinary, overtime and special duty rates together in a manner which makes this course impossible. The difficulty is best seen in regard to night duty. That duty may form part of the standard week and be ordinary time, or it may fall outside the standard week and be overtime. In the first case time and a quarter is paid, in the second time and a half. On the proper interpretation of the contract I do not think these computations can have other than a common basis. Ordinary night duty cannot well be at the rate of 96s. 6d. multiplied by $1\frac{1}{4}$ divided by forty-eight per hour while overtime night duty, possibly worked in the same turn, is at the rate of 96s. 6d. multiplied by $1\frac{1}{2}$ divided by forty-four per hour. I am, therefore, forced to conclude that only one rate can be used as the basis for computing night duty payments: and if this is the case I think it must follow that the basis for all categories of time remuneration must be the same. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the respondent's alternative contention cannot be accepted and that a choice must be made between a weekly rate and an hourly rate, the rate chosen being applied as the basis of computation throughout the categories.

My Lords, when, as here, a contract of service provides for a weekly wage rate it does not follow that nothing but a weekly rate can be used as a rate of remuneration for the purposes of s. 6 (1). In some cases, no doubt, nothing else will do. For example, the appropriate rate for a domestic servant who is simply employed at so much per week without any fixed hours of employment, cannot well be anything but a weekly rate. Section 6, however, covers a vast range of employment and in other cases it may not be so. Take, for instance, a workman employed at a guaranteed weekly wage, but with his actual earnings above the basic figure calculated according to the amount of work he does. There, a change in the piece rate may be no less relevant for the purposes of the section than the contractual weekly rate, and always, of course, it is necessary to bear in mind the provisions of s. 1 (3) of the Act of 1925 against contracting out. If agreement that the rate for the purposes of s. 6 will be a weekly rate cannot settle the matter, neither can agreement for the payment of remuneration at a weekly rate. I therefore approach the question for decision on the basis that the form of the contract and its stipulation for a weekly basic rate, though relevant and to be given due consideration, are not conclusive.

My Lords, I think the broad purpose of s. 6 (1) is reasonably clear. It aims at keeping the weekly compensation in step with post-accident changes in rates of pay occurring in the class of employment concerned; and it does this by providing for a notional adjustment of a matter of fact, namely, the average weekly earnings of the workman during the relevant pre-accident period, which forms the foundation from which the computation of compensation must start. The method of adjustment has already been referred to. It calls for an answer to the question—What would the workman “have earned during that period” if the changed rates of remuneration had obtained throughout it? I respectfully agree with TUCKER, L.J., when he says ([1948] 2 All E.R. 169), in Shaw's case (1) that the words “rates of remuneration” should be “given the meaning which they would naturally convey to a worker or employer in industry.” So construing them I think that the choice now to be made must be determined according to which of the two possible rates furthers better the purpose of the enactment. After viewing the matter from the various standpoints suggested in the able and careful arguments presented on either side, I have come to the conclusion that the respondent's main argument should prevail and that the proper rate to apply is the hourly rate and not the weekly rate. I think the use of the former reflects the policy of the section more adequately and works it more fairly. Unless it is employed, what I consider the true new rates for overtime and special duty are not taken into consideration and the workman is held, as regards these categories, to rates which are no longer in touch with reality. I do not think this view creates any counter-balancing disadvantages. The basic rate per week can readily be reckoned as a rate per hour, as indeed has to be done whichever rate is taken. It may be, as the appellants pointed out, that had the workman not been injured he might not, after June 24, 1947, have been called on to work as many hours in the week as he did prior to the accident. I do not think that has been established as the fact at any material time, but even if it had it does not seem a relevant consideration, for it makes the test what the workman would have earned at the new rates after the accident instead of what he would have earned before the accident had the new rates then obtained. For these reasons I am of opinion that the Court of Appeal was right in sending the matter back for a new trial. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

LORD REID: My Lords, s. 6 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1943, directs that:

“For the purpose of calculating—(a) any weekly payment under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1943 . . . the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident shall, if and whenever a change occurs after the date of the accident in the rates of remuneration obtaining in the class of employment in which the workman was employed during the relevant period before the accident, be deemed, so long as the changed rates obtain without further change, to be the average weekly earnings which he would have earned during that period if the changed rates had obtained throughout that period.”

The respondent's average weekly earnings before his accident were 95s. 6d. In 1945 there was a review under this section so that his average pre-accident weekly earnings were then deemed to be 110s. 4d. Thereafter, as a result of the acceptance of the recommendation of the court of inquiry, two changes occurred in the conditions of service of the conciliation grades in which the respondent had been employed: the basic rate was increased by 7s. 6d. and a forty-four hour week was introduced in place of the previous forty-eight hour week. There is no doubt that the increase of 7s. 6d. was a change in the rates of remuneration. The question in this case is whether the reduction of hours involved any such change. I do not think that this is a simple question. The facts of the case are complicated and before coming to them I think it helpful to consider how the section applies to simpler facts. The section does not come into operation at all until there has been a change in the rates of remuneration, and when there has been such a change it requires the calculation of what the injured man's average weekly earnings would have been before the accident

if the new rates had then been in operation. Earnings can only be calculated, however, if both the rate of remuneration and the amount of work to be remunerated are known. So in order to work out the statutory provision some assumption must be made about the amount of work which the man is to be deemed to have been paid for at the new rates of remuneration. The natural assumption is that it shall be the same amount of work as that for which he was actually paid at the old rates of remuneration, but "the same amount of work" is ambiguous. If a man were simply paid a weekly wage for a week's work then I think that, when the section comes into operation, the statutory calculation must be made on the assumption that he would have done the same number of weeks' work in the relevant period at the new rate as in fact he did at the old rate. If I suppose a case where, since the accident, two changes have occurred, a rise in the weekly wage and an alteration of the definition of what constitutes a week's work, the former clearly brings the section into operation and must enter into the statutory calculation, but I see no reason why the latter change should come in. I do not think that the statute requires that the man must be supposed to have undergone the same amount of exertion as in fact he did but rather that he must be supposed to have done the same number of units of work. In the case I am supposing the unit of work for which he was paid was a week's work and a re-definition of the week's work does not matter. To put it in another way, the section only applies when there has been a change in the rate of remuneration. If a man were paid x shillings per week for a week's work defined in one way and then he is paid the same x shillings per week for a week's work defined in another way his conditions of employment have altered, but not his rate of remuneration. In what is now the common case a week's work is defined as so many hours' work, and arithmetically it may be said that a wage of say 96s. per week of forty-eight hours is equivalent to a wage of 2s. per hour. That does not mean, however, that the wage must necessarily be regarded as an hourly and not a weekly wage. The parties may have good reason for preferring to treat it as a weekly wage and if the terms of the contract show that they so intend I see no reason why that intention should not prevail unless there is something else in the contract which is inconsistent with that intention.

The injured man may have worked overtime in addition to his ordinary week's work, and have been paid overtime at an hourly rate. That hourly rate may have been a definite rate of say 2s. 6d. per hour or it may have been expressed as say "time and a quarter." In the latter case, in order to calculate what the man is to be paid for overtime his weekly rate must be broken down to an hourly rate, but this does not, in my view, necessarily imply that he can no longer be regarded as being paid at a weekly rate for his ordinary week's work. I see no difficulty in a man being paid for his ordinary week's work at a weekly rate and for overtime at an hourly rate derived from that weekly rate, but I have difficulty in seeing how a man can be paid at a weekly rate for overtime which is measured by the hour. I can illustrate the difference in this way. Let me suppose that a man is paid 96s. per week for a week's work of forty-eight hours and that in addition he works some overtime, say six hours on the average, at time and a quarter, and that then, without any change of the 96s. rate, the working week is reduced after his accident to a forty-four hour week. That, in my opinion, is not a change in the rate of remuneration for the ordinary working week, and, if he is to be regarded as having been paid for overtime at a weekly rate, I suppose that there would be no change in the rate of remuneration for overtime either. If, however, the man was paid before his accident for overtime at an hourly rate, he was entitled to 2s. 6d. per hour for overtime: 96s. for a forty-eight hour week is equivalent to 2s. per hour and, therefore, time and a quarter meant at that time 2s. 6d. per hour. When the working week was reduced to forty-four hours, 96s. per week became equivalent to approximately 2s. 2½d. per hour and time and a quarter then came to mean approximately

2s. 8½d. per hour. So, if the man's rate for overtime was an hourly rate the reduction of hours in the ordinary working week has caused a change in the rate of remuneration for overtime from 2s. 6d. to 2s. 8½d. per hour and s. 6 requires that this shall be taken into account. To put the matter more generally if a man was paid before his accident a weekly wage for a forty-eight hour week and time and a quarter for overtime and then the ordinary working week is reduced from forty-eight to forty-four hours, I think that, in the absence of special circumstances, the statutory calculation should be based on the assumption that during the relevant period he would have worked under the new conditions for the same number of weeks of ordinary work and for the same number of hours of overtime. The reduction of hours in the ordinary week's work would be left out of account.

Coming to the facts of this case, I have no doubt that the parties intended that men in the conciliation grades (in which the respondent was employed) should be paid at weekly rates. In the long series of agreements from 1919 onwards there is constant reference to a standard rate which is clearly a weekly rate and careful avoidance of any reference to an hourly rate, but it would be useless to express an intention that the rates should be weekly rates if the operative provisions of the agreements were irreconcilable with that intention and only consistent with the rates being truly hourly rates. My main difficulty in the case arises because it appears to have been assumed that there are only two alternatives—either all are weekly rates or all are hourly rates. The elaborate inter-relationships of the various categories of work and the various ways in which the guaranteed week could be made up have not been developed. The main part of the respondent's remuneration was for work within the guaranteed week and as to this I have little difficulty in holding that he was paid at weekly rates. That is sufficient to negative the main part of his claim based on the contention that for the purpose of the statutory calculation under s. 6 he must be regarded as having worked the same number of hours as in fact he worked during the relevant period. I have already given my reasons for thinking that that is not the proper basis for the calculation where the man was earning a weekly wage, but I have much more difficulty with regard to work outside the guaranteed week. I do not see how, e.g., overtime, which is worked and remunerated on an hourly basis, can be paid for at a weekly rate.

I would put my opinion in this way. The parties intended that the respondent's whole remuneration should be at weekly and not hourly rates. If the agreements are construed in that way then the appellant's calculations are correct and the respondent's application must fail. It is for the respondent to show why that intention cannot receive effect. In the main he has failed, but on some matters which are of comparatively small importance in this case I am left in doubt. That being so I think that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs here and below.

BATTEN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), July 18, 19, 1950.]

Charity—Cy-près doctrine—General charitable intention—Unconditional gift for particular purpose—Purpose impracticable.

A By his will, dated Dec. 30, 1931, a testator, who died on Sept. 29, 1939, devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to his trustees on trust to sell the same and out of the remainder, after payment of expenses debts and legacies (inter alia) to set apart £2,500 in authorised trust investments and pay the income to his daughter during her life. The testator then purported to dispose of the capital of the fund so set apart by directing that (i) his
B trustees should, with the sanction of the court or a judge or of the Charity Commissioners, apply “£2,300 out of my residuary estate in purchasing a piece of land preferably in . . . Kingston-upon-Hull . . . and erecting thereon six or more rest homes each home consisting of a living room, sleep apart-
C ment (sic) and usual outside domestic conveniences all to be on the ground floor and all on one level. (ii) My trustees shall set apart and invest in authorised trust investments the sum of £200 and apply the income arising therefrom or if necessary the capital of such sum for the upkeep of such homes including the proper costs charges and expenses of and incidental to the administration and management of the trust.” On the death of the daughter, the fund being insufficient for the purpose specified, it was
D impracticable to give effect to the trusts, and the question arose whether the fund could be applied cy-près.

HELD: although the gift was not dependent on the fulfilment of a condition, the language was so particular as to exclude the possibility of finding that a general charitable intention was expressed so as to permit the application of the cy-près doctrine.

G ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether on the true construction of the will of Thomas William Good, deceased, the trusts thereof concerning “Good's Rest Homes Fund” failed, and, if so, whether the said fund ought to be applied cy-près or passed under the ultimate residuary gift or was undisposed of.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: The question of construction which I have to decide arises as a result of a provision in the will of the testator by which he directed that, after the death of his daughter, which has happened, the sum of £2,500 should be held on certain trusts which, in my view, are clearly charitable trusts.

The trusts are set out in cl. 13 of his will and are headed "Trusts for Good's Rest Homes." He provides, first, that his trustees, with the sanction of the court or the Charity Commissioners, should apply £2,300 out of his residuary estate in purchasing a piece of land preferably in the eastern part of Kingston-upon-Hull and erecting thereon six or more rest homes, each home consisting of a living room, sleeping apartment and usual outside domestic conveniences, all to be on the ground floor and all on one level. He then directs that his trustees shall set apart and invest in authorised trust investments £200 which, with the £2,300, makes up the total sum of £2,500, and

"apply the income arising therefrom or if necessary the capital of such sum for the upkeep of such homes including the proper costs charges and expenses of and incidental to the administration and management of the trust."

There is then a heading "Inmates of the Homes." In six further paragraphs the testator sets out with more particularity directions as to the qualifications of the proposed inmates, and the powers which the trustees are to have in regard to such inmates, such as removing any inmate, and prescribing reasonable regulations for the management and government of the inmates.

The evidence clearly shows, and this is not in dispute, that in the circumstances it is impracticable to give effect to those trusts on the short ground that the fund available for purchasing the necessary land and erecting the proposed rest homes is quite insufficient for the purpose, and the capital sum directed to be set aside would be quite insufficient by its income to achieve the objects of keeping up the homes and paying the costs, charges and expenses of administration and management.

In those circumstances the first question which arises is whether or not, as this trust cannot be carried out, the fund should be applied cy-près, or whether the gift fails completely as a charitable gift, in which event a further question arises as to its ultimate destination. Whether or not the fund is to be applied cy-près depends on the answer to the question: Can there be discovered from the language of the will a general charitable intent on the part of the testator, or was his charitable intent confined to the particular scheme which is set out in cl. 13 of his will?

Since the judgment of PARKER, J., in Re Wilson (1) that case has been treated as providing the guide of approach to such a case as this. In the course of his judgment, PARKER, J., said ([1913] 1 Ch. 320):

"For the purposes of this case I think the authorities must be divided into two classes. First of all, we have a class of cases where, in form, the gift is given for a particular charitable purpose, but it is possible, taking the will as a whole, to say that, notwithstanding the form of the gift, the paramount intention, according to the true construction of the will, is to give the property in the first instance for a general charitable purpose . . . and to graft on to the general gift a direction as to the desires or intentions of the testator as to the manner in which the general gift is to be carried into effect. In that case, though it is impossible to carry out the precise directions, on ordinary principles the gift for the general charitable purpose will remain and be perfectly good, and the court, by virtue of its administrative jurisdiction, can direct a scheme as to how it is to be carried out. In fact the will will be read as though the particular direction had not been in the will at all, but there had been simply a general direction as to the application of the fund for the general charitable purpose in question. Then there is the second class of cases, where, on the true construction of the will, no such paramount general intention can be inferred, and where the gift, being in form a particular gift—a gift for a particular purpose—and it being impossible to carry out that particular purpose, the whole gift is held to fail.

In my opinion, the question whether a particular case falls within one of those classes of cases or within the other is simply a question of the construction of a particular instrument."

I do not propose to refer in any detail to the facts of that case. It was one in which PARKER, J., came to the conclusion, on the true construction of the will, that the gift fell within the second of the two classes which he defined in the passage which I have quoted. At a later stage of his judgment, he noticed one by one the details of the gift and commented on their particularity; but it appears to me that the submission of counsel for the Attorney-General as to the ratio decidendi of this particular case is correct, and that it is truly to be regarded as a case in which there was a conditional gift to charity, and it failed because the condition could not be fulfilled. That, I think, emerges from the following passage in the judgment (ibid., 323):

"It appears to me that what the testator had in mind is, that he is dissatisfied with the provisions for the education in the district in certain respects, and that he desires that subscriptions shall be collected for the building of a school to teach certain other subjects which have not hitherto been taught, and if those subscriptions are made and a school house and a school are built, then he desires to endow or provide a salary for the schoolmaster subject to certain conditions as to certain scholars being admitted free and otherwise. I think that the whole gift is really in the testator's mind dependent upon it being feasible and possible to carry out these particular directions, and that I am not justified in reading into the will from this gift any such general intention of promoting higher education in the district or neighbourhood of the district as is suggested."

I think also that, as regards the earlier case of Re White's Trusts (2), which was relied on by counsel for the second defendant, that, on analysis, is really another example of a conditional gift. Of course, where one finds a conditional charitable gift, there is at once provided very strong reason for discounting the existence of a general charitable intent.

I must, however, advert to Re Packe (3). In that case a testatrix gave to the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation her freehold cottage known as The Retreat and £1,100, according to the headnote ([1918] 1 Ch. 437):

"... upon trust to use the said premises as a holiday home or house of rest for clergymen of the Church of England and their wives and to invest the sum of £1,100 and apply the income thereof in or towards the carrying on of the said premises as a holiday home or house of rest aforesaid provided that should the said corporation decline the devise and bequest of my cottage The Retreat I revoke the legacy of £1,100 to the said corporation and I give devise and bequeath the said premises known as The Retreat and the sum of £1,100 to my executors and trustees to convey and make over the same to any other society which my executors and trustees may in their discretion select upon trust to use the said premises as a holiday home or house of rest for ladies or gentlemen of limited means whom it may benefit.' The corporation renounced the devise and bequest of the cottage and sum of money, and the executors were unable to find any other society willing to undertake the trust, the reason being the distance of the cottage from a railway station and the insufficiency of the fund to carry on the premises as directed by the testatrix:—Held, that as the particular charitable purpose for which the bequest was made was impracticable, and no paramount general charitable intention was implied by the will, the charitable bequest failed."

In his judgment in that case, NEVILLE, J., quoted as his guide the passage from the opening of the judgment of PARKER, J., in Re Wilson (1), which I have cited, and he came to the conclusion that the case before him fell within the second class.

It is to be observed on the facts of that case that there was nothing in the provision in the will which could be regarded as in the nature of a condition such as one finds in the language of the will in Re Wilson (1), to which I have referred. NEVILLE, J., in coming to the conclusion at which he arrived, did not rely at all on the existence of any such condition. The basis of his decision, I think, is to be found in the following words in his judgment (ibid., 442):

"I can only say that, after studying this will with care, I cannot find on the part of the testatrix any hint of any general charitable intention. So far as anything is disclosed by the will, one cannot say whether she had any intention of any sort beyond the intention that the particular charitable purpose which she expressed should be carried into effect. It seems to me, therefore, to be playing with words in the case of a will of this kind to pretend to find a general charitable intention paramount to the particular directions given with regard to the house."

It, therefore, follows, in my view, that a case may fall within the second of the two classes, as stated by PARKER, J., in Re Wilson (1), notwithstanding that there is nothing in the nature of a condition such as was present in the will in that case, and that it may be sufficient to bring a case within that second class that the gift in question is so particular in its language as to exclude the possibility of saying that there is any intention of any sort beyond the intention that the particular charitable purpose should be carried into effect.

Turning back to the provisions in this will, it is first to be observed that no other part of the will provides any context for resolving the matter one way or another. The only previous reference to the fund in question is the provision in sub-cl. (2) of cl. 9 directing the trustees to set apart the £2,500 in question and to pay the income therefrom to his daughter during her life and afterwards, by cl. 10, to hold those investments on the trusts declared by cl. 13. Clause 13 is complete in itself and contains a scheme for the application of this sum of money for the charitable purposes there specified, headed, as I have already observed, "Trusts for Good's Rest Homes." I can find on the face of those provisions nothing which would justify me in coming to the conclusion that, according to the true construction of this will, the paramount intention of the testator was first to give the property for a general charitable purpose rather than a particular charitable purpose and then to graft on to that general gift a direction as to the desires or intentions of the testator as to the manner in which the general gift should be carried out, and, therefore, I am unable to see that the condition which must be satisfied before this gift can fall into the first of the two classes as stated by PARKER, J., is fulfilled. It appears to me that when one analyses the matter, the case before me is completely covered by the reasons and the decision of NEVILLE, J., in the later case of Re Packe (3).

I, therefore, come to the conclusion that there is no room in this case for the application of the cy-près doctrine. The question, therefore, remains as to the ultimate disposal of this fund. [HIS LORDSHIP heard further argument and held that on the construction of the will there was created a true residue, and that the fund passed as part thereof.]

Trade Mark—False trade description—Description false, but recognised by trade—“Non-brewed vinegar”—“Intent to defraud”—Offence against statute—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (c. 28), s. 2 (1) (d).

A An information was laid against the appellant alleging that he had contravened the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 2 (1) (d), by applying a false trade description, to wit, “non-brewed vinegar” to a synthetic product of acetic acid, caramel, and water. It was found that this product, though wholesome and frequently used for the same purposes as vinegar, was different from vinegar, which was manufactured by a process of double fermentation from malt, wine, cider, or spirits, and that the term vinegar, when used alone by those in the trade, meant malt vinegar. It was also found that the term “non-brewed vinegar” had long been recognised and accepted by the trade as a true description of the product sold by the appellant.

C HELD : (i) the fact that the description was known to and commonly used by the trade was immaterial, for, if a trade description was false it did not matter how generally it had been applied to the goods in question unless it was proved that such description had been lawfully and generally applied to those goods at the date of the passing of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, i.e., Aug. 23, 1887 ; there was evidence to support the finding that the product sold by the appellant was not vinegar but a solution of acetic acid; and, therefore, it was impossible to say that the magistrate was wrong in holding that a false trade description had been applied.

D (ii) by throwing the onus on a defendant of proving that he acted without intent to defraud s. 2 (1) of the Act assumed that the mere doing of the act alleged implied an intent to defraud; a defendant could escape if he showed that he did not do the act intentionally; but that the appellant had failed to prove, and, therefore, he was guilty of an offence under the sub-section.

CASE STATED by the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate.

The appellant, Joseph Kat, was charged on an information preferred by the respondent under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 2 (1) (d), with applying a false trade description, namely, non-brewed vinegar, to a synthetic liquid composed of water and four to six per cent. of acetic acid and caramel. It was found as a fact that the appellant, who carried on business as the Premier Pickle Co., had been selling the product since 1923 and had since 1938 described it as "non-brewed vinegar," a term well known and understood by the trade to mean a liquid other than malt vinegar which was a fermented liquor entirely different from the synthetic product. The term "non-brewed vinegar" had been used by the Ministry of Food as an official description of the synthetic product, which was wholesome and suitable for the same purposes as malt vinegar. The appellant contended that the term "non-brewed vinegar," being the ordinary description used in the trade to describe the synthetic product, could not, in the absence of any evidence that it bore a different meaning to the public, be a false trade description, and also that he had applied the term without intent to defraud. The respondent contended that the use of the word "vinegar" in describing liquor which was not the result of a double fermentation was false; that the appellant's product, not, therefore, being vinegar, could not be "non-brewed" vinegar; and that the appellant had applied the description with intent to defraud. The magistrate convicted the appellant, who appealed.

Drewe, K.C., and K. R. H. Johnston for the appellant.

Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, K.C., and Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 21. The following judgments were delivered.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Special Case stated by the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate before whom the appellant was charged with unlawfully applying a false trade description to goods, namely, the false description "non-brewed vinegar." The magistrate convicted him, holding that a false trade description was applied to the goods and rejecting the contention of the appellant that he acted without intent to defraud. It will be necessary to deal with the two points quite separately.

On the first point the facts are that the appellant manufactures and sells in bottles a liquid which he labels "non-brewed vinegar." The liquid consists of water to which acetic acid and caramel have been added, the amount of acetic acid being between four per cent. and six per cent. of pure acetic acid, which is the percentage that analysts generally agree genuine vinegar should contain. The caramel is merely colouring matter. The Case finds that liquor of this description has been on sale since about 1890. It was originally sold as wood vinegar and then as table vinegar, and since 1937 it has been sold as non-brewed vinegar. The quantity sold is very large, amounting to several million gallons a year, and amounts to some three-eighths of the quantity of malt vinegar which is sold. The liquid is wholesome and can be used for the same purposes as other vinegar.

The magistrate has found that vinegar is a fermented liquor made by a process of double fermentation, in consequence of which a solution of acetic acid is naturally formed in the liquid. The real difference between the two liquids is that what is sold as "non-brewed vinegar" is a synthetic product, while true vinegar is the result of natural fermentation. It should be stated that he finds that the term "non-brewed vinegar" is understood and accepted in the trade to mean a liquid such as is prepared and sold by the appellant. It has been recognised by the Ministry of Food, but the magistrate found that vinegar is the product of double fermentation and that the liquor sold as non-brewed vinegar is not vinegar at all, but merely a solution of acetic acid, and that, as it was not vinegar, to describe it as such, although with the addition of the words "non-brewed," was to apply a false trade description. There was clearly evidence on which the magistrate could come to that conclusion, and we cannot review his findings of fact, nor do I wish to throw any doubt on his finding. In view of that finding, which there was evidence to support, it is impossible to say that the magistrate was wrong in holding that a false trade description had been applied to the goods. The fact that this description may be known to the trade and be commonly used by them or may be known to the Ministry of Food is, in my opinion, quite immaterial. If the description is false, it matters not whether other people use it or how generally it may be used, unless it is proved that this description was lawfully and generally applied to the goods at the date of the passing of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, which was Aug. 23, 1887. Section 18 provides:

A "Where, at the passing of this Act, a trade description is lawfully and generally applied to goods of a particular class, or manufactured by a particular method, to indicate the particular class or method of manufacture of such goods, the provisions of this Act with respect to false trade descriptions shall not apply to such trade description when so applied . . ."

B The meaning of that section is perfectly clear and is that if at the time of the passing of the Act it was common in the trade to apply a particular description, although it was false, to certain goods, that description could still be used after the passing of the Act, but it also clearly shows that it will be no defence thereafter that a description is commonly used in the trade if in fact it is false. I am, therefore, of opinion that the magistrate was entitled to find here that a false trade description had been applied to the goods in question.

C The second point which is raised in the case is, perhaps, more difficult. Section 2 (1), which creates the offence in question, provides that:

"Every person who . . . (d) applies any false trade description to goods . . . shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, and unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be guilty of an offence against this Act."

D In view of the authorities which have been cited to us and the reasons which the magistrate gave for his decision, it is necessary also to refer to s. 2 (2). That subsection deals with a person who sells or has in his possession goods to which any false trade description has been applied, and obviously contemplates, among other people, a retailer who may have bought goods to which a false trade description has been applied. He is given the opportunity of proving by way of defence that he has taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act, that he had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade description, and that on demand made by the prosecutor he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained the goods, or that otherwise he has acted innocently. The magistrate rejected the contention that the appellant had acted without intent to defraud, on the authority of Allard v. Selfridge & Co. (1), which was a prosecution brought under s. 2 (2). He said that he thought there was no distinction to be drawn between the two sub-sections in respect of the onus laid on the defendant, and he relied particularly on the passage in the judgment of SHEARMAN, J., where he said ([1925] 1 K.B. 139):

F "I think the plain meaning of this statute is that guilt or innocence is determined by the answer to the question whether intentionally an act has been done which is contrary to the words of the statute."

G The only reported case in which the words "without intent to defraud" in sub-s. (1) were considered is Starey v. Chilworth Gunpowder Co. (2). There the defendants, who were under contract to the government to supply gunpowder of their manufacture, owing to an accident were unable to manufacture the powder themselves. They thereupon bought other powder which was in all respects similar to, and as good as, their own and put it into their barrels and delivered it bearing their marks, and it was argued on their behalf that in these circumstances they had no intent to defraud. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in his judgment, said (24 Q.B.D. 96):

H "The Act is directed against the abuse of trade marks, and the putting off on a purchaser of, not a bad article, but an article different from that which he intends to purchase and believes that he is purchasing. It would apply to cases where a particular article, manufactured by a particular person, had acquired a wide-spread reputation . . . and someone supplied another and a different article under that name, so as to make the purchaser take something which he did not know he was taking. That I think is the meaning of the word 'defraud' as used in this Act of Parliament, and in that sense only there was in the present case an intent to defraud."

MATHEW, J., said (ibid., 97):

"On the fair construction of the Act I am of opinion that the words 'intent to defraud' mean more than an intent to cheat a customer. . . . The words 'without intent to defraud' apply to cases where a person uses a particular mark without any intent in so doing to induce a buyer to accept goods which might otherwise be rejected."

Wood v. Burgess (3) was a case under s. 2 (2) where the respondent, a manufacturer of mineral waters, without authority filled with mineral water of his own manufacture certain bottles the property of and known by the name of another manufacturer with the intention of selling such mineral water to his (the first-named manufacturer's) customers. The magistrate found that the respondent had no intent to defraud the purchasers of the mineral water and that he must, therefore, be taken to have acted innocently, but that argument was rejected and the court remitted the case to the magistrate to convict.

Stone v. Burn (4) was a case in which the appellant, a bottler of beer, having come into the possession of certain bottles belonging to the Felinfoel Brewery Co. and embossed with their name, filled them with Bass's beer, placed Bass & Co.'s labels on them and sold the contents as being Bass & Co.'s beer. The court held that this was the application of a false trade description by reason of s. 5 (1) of the Act, and that the defendant was liable to be convicted although no one purchasing would believe that he was getting anything but Bass's beer. On the question whether he had acted innocently, LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., said ([1911] 1 K.B. 931):

"Mere ignorance of the provisions of the statute does not amount to innocence for this purpose. The words 'acted innocently' point to some misapprehension of fact. And here the appellant did not labour under any mistake of fact, for he did what he did with full knowledge, and claiming that he had a right to do it."

LORD COLERIDGE, J., said (ibid., 933):

"Such innocence can only exist where the infraction was committed by inadvertence or mistake of fact. And here the appellant knew all the facts—his only mistake was as to the effect of the statute."

Allard v. Selfridge & Co. (1), again, was a case under s. 2 (2). There it was found that on a sale of silk stockings the defendants had not taken all reasonable precautions against committing the offence, but that the shop assistant, in conducting the sale, had acted in good faith and had not been guilty of fraud. The court held that proof by the defendants of part of s. 2 (2) (a) could not be relied on by them as showing that "otherwise they had acted innocently" within para. (c). All the cases to which I have already referred were considered, and SHEARMAN, J., concluded his judgment by saying ([1925] 1 K.B. 139):

"I think the plain meaning of this statute is that guilt or innocence is determined by the answer to the question whether intentionally an act has been done which is contrary to the words of the statute."

That case was followed and applied by this court in Mercer v. Pyramid Sand and Gravel Co. (5), which was also a case under s. 2 (2). I cannot see that for the purposes of this Act there would be any real difference between saying that a person acted without intent to defraud and that he acted innocently. Considerations which apply to the latter expression must, I think, apply to the former. I would state the proposition in this way. Where a statute forbids the doing of a certain act, the doing of it in itself supplies mens rea. It is no defence to say : "I did not know of the prohibition," or, "I did not think that what I was doing amounted to the doing of something forbidden by the Act." That would be allowing ignorance of the law to be set up as a defence. By throwing an onus on the defendant of proving that he acted without intent to defraud, it seems to me that the statute assumes that the doing of the act alone implies an intent to defraud, but the person charged can escape if he shows that he did not do the act intentionally. His motive does not matter. His understanding of the statute does not matter. There may be an act done by mistake or by accident, such as the delivery of some goods bearing a particular mark to a person who has ordered goods which should have borne another mark by a confusion of the cases, so that there was merely a misdelivery.

It is not necessary to consider all the cases in which such a defence may be open to a person charged under either sub-section, but if a sale has been deliberately made of goods which it has been shown bear a false description so that the seller intended that those goods should be delivered to the purchaser, there is no room, in my opinion, to set up this defence. The line of authority is unbroken and I am not prepared to depart from it. It should be borne in mind that this Act is intended to protect not only the public or traders who may purchase the goods but also the proprietors of trade marks and those who manufacture and deal in the genuine article. Prosecutions are, in fact, often brought by other manufacturers or trade associations, and, in my opinion, those who make what alone may properly be called "vinegar" are quite entitled to have it established that a solution of this character is not truly described as "vinegar" at all. It was intentionally sold as a particular sort of vinegar, which it is not, and I agree that there was no evidence upon which the magistrate could find that the appellant had established a defence. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

HILBERY, J. : I agree.

BYRNE, J. : I desire to add only a few words to the judgment delivered by my Lord, with which I entirely agree. The effect of s. 2 (1) of the statute is that a person who applies a false trade description is presumed to have done so with intent to defraud, but he can escape conviction by proving that he had no intent to defraud. The presence or absence of an intent to defraud is a question of fact, but to determine that question it is necessary to define the words "intent to defraud" and then to ascertain whether the facts come within that definition. In Re London and Globe Finance Corpn., Ltd. (6), BUCKLEY, J., defined "intent to defraud" in the following way ([1903] 1 Ch. 732):

"To deceive is, I apprehend, to induce a man to believe that a thing is true which is false, and which the person practising the deceit knows or believes to be false. To defraud is to deprive by deceit: it is by deceit to induce a man to act to his injury. More tersely it may be put, that to deceive is by falsehood to induce a state of mind; to defraud is by deceit to induce a course of action."

That definition received the approval of the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Bennett, R. v. Newton (7). The magistrate in this case found as a fact that the liquid was not vinegar and that the appellant intentionally sold it as a particular type of vinegar. That finding of fact brought the matter within the definition. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Friendly Society—Action against trustees—Tort—Libel—Competence—Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (c. 25), s. 94 (1).

Libel—Privileged occasion—Four co-defendants—Malice found against one only —Effect on privilege of other defendants. A Libel—Damages—Special damages—Loss of employment following publication of libel—Determination of service not in breach of contract.

The four trustees of a friendly society, acting on behalf of the society, prepared a report on the activities of the society's general secretary, and caused it to be read by one of them at a meeting of the general committee of the society. The report was libellous, and after it had been read the meeting passed a resolution determining the secretary's appointment, in accordance with his contract of service, with a payment of three months' salary in lieu of notice. In an action for damages for libel brought by the secretary against the four trustees the statement of claim, after reciting the facts, stated: "By reason of the premises the plaintiff has been brought into hatred ridicule and contempt and his said service agreement was terminated on Nov. 6, 1947, and the plaintiff has suffered damage." The judge ruled that the occasion of publication of the libel was one of qualified privilege. The jury found that one of the four trustees was actuated by malice, but that the other three were not, and they awarded general and special damages. B C D

HELD: (i) the trustees could not be sued for the libel in their capacity as trustees under s. 94 (1) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, because the proceedings were not "any action or other legal proceeding . . . concerning any property, right or claim of the society" within the meaning of that subsection, but should be brought against the society in its registered name.

Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants ([1901] A.C. 426), applied. E

Linaker v. Pilcher (1901) (84 L.T. 421), not followed.

(ii) the protection afforded by the qualified privilege of the three trustees not actuated by malice was not destroyed by the malice of the fourth because each acted under an independent duty to make the communication to the general committee of the society and so had an independent privilege of his own and not one derived from that of the fourth trustee. Moreover, a person who published a defamatory statement on an occasion which the law clothed with the protection of qualified privilege was not a tortfeasor and could not, therefore, be a joint tortfeasor. F

Smith v. Streetfield ([1913] 3 K.B. 764), and Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., Ltd. ([1906] 2 K.B. 627), explained and distinguished. G

(iii) the plaintiff was entitled to special damages for the loss of his employment although the determination thereof was lawful and not in breach of contract.

ACTION for damages for libel.

The plaintiff was the general secretary of the National Deposit Friendly Society, a friendly society registered under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, of which the four defendants were at all material times the trustees and on behalf of which they acted in all the matters complained of in the statement of claim. The four defendants, both in their personal capacity and in their capacity as trustees of the society, prepared a report on the activities of the plaintiff. They caused it to be published by one of them, the president of the society, by reading it on behalf of the defendants and of the society to a meeting of the general committee of the society called to consider the general secretary's terms and conditions of service and tenure of office. After the report had been read a resolution was passed lawfully determining the employment of the plaintiff as general secretary of the society by a three months' payment of salary in lieu of notice. The report was admitted to contain a libel against the plaintiff, but SLADE, J., ruled that the publication took place on an occasion of qualified privilege. The jury, by their verdict, found that one of the defendants was malicious and that the others were not. They awarded the plaintiff £250 general damages and £625 special damages.

The plaintiff contended that he was entitled to judgment against the defendants in their capacity as trustees on the ground that they were sued under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 94 (1), and that the finding of malice against the one defendant deprived the other three defendants of the protection of the occasion of qualified privilege and made them jointly liable with the fourth defendant for the damages. The defendants pleaded that no action for libel lay against a friendly society in the name of the trustees, and that the society was not being sued in the action even though it was admitted that the defendants were acting for the society. They contended that the three defendants found not to have been actuated by malice were not deprived of the protection of their qualified privilege by the malice of the fourth defendant, and that no special damages were recoverable because it was not pleaded, because there was no evidence of special damage to go to the jury, and because it was too remote.

Salmon, K.C., and C. H. Duveen for the plaintiff.

Cairns, K.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the defendants.

SLADE, J.: This is an action for libel brought by Commander Clifford Henry Longdon-Griffiths, as plaintiff, against four defendants, Mr. Gerard H. Smith, Canon A. P. Pascoe, Mr. Val Gould and Mr. George F. Cooper. The statement of claim pleads, and the defence admits, that the four defendants were at all material times the trustees of the National Deposit Friendly Society, to whom I shall refer hereafter as "the society." The society is a friendly society registered under the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. The statement of claim also pleads, and the defence admits, that in all the matters complained of in the statement of claim the four defendants were acting on behalf of the society. The cause of action on which counsel for the plaintiff relied was the publication referred to in paras. 4 and 5 of the amended statement of claim. In substance, those paragraphs allege that all the four defendants, both in their personal capacity and as the trustees of the society, participated in the preparation of a report on the activities of the plaintiff, who was at all material times the general secretary of the society, with a view to that report being communicated to the general committee of the society at a specially convened meeting to consider the general secretary's terms and conditions of service and tenure of office. The report was published to the members of the general committee, some twenty-eight in number, who were present at the meeting, by the defendant Smith, the president of the society, who read the report aloud to the meeting on Nov. 6, 1947. It was conceded by counsel for the plaintiff that the occasion of publication of that report was one of qualified privilege.

Counsel for the plaintiff rightly emphasised that the occasion of publication complained of was an occasion on which the words were spoken by the defendant Smith not only on his own behalf, but also on behalf of his three co-defendants and co-trustees, so that, while he actually published the words complained of, each of the defendants caused them to be so published. No point is taken as to whether the reading aloud of a defamatory document to persons present at a meeting constitutes the publication of a libel or that of a slander, and the case proceeded on the footing that it should be regarded as the publication of a defamatory written document. It was also expressly admitted that the defendant Smith, in publishing that document, and the other three defendants, in concurring in the publication, were acting not only in their personal capacity but also in their capacity as trustees of the society. After the document had been read at the meeting a resolution was passed, the terms of which were subsequently communicated to the plaintiff, lawfully determining his employment as general secretary by a three months' payment of salary in lieu of notice.

In those circumstances counsel for the plaintiff pleaded para. 8 of the amended statement of claim in these words:

"By reason of the premises the plaintiff has been brought into hatred ridicule and contempt and his said service agreement was terminated on Nov. 6, 1947, and the plaintiff has suffered damage."

A The case was tried with a jury who, by their verdict, found that the defendants Smith, Pascoe and Gould were not malicious but that the defendant Cooper was. Counsel for the defendants objected that no case of special damage had been pleaded, and in deference to that submission and to other submissions in the legal argument for the defendants I left the issue of damages to the jury in two sub-headings. They answered: "General damages, £250; special damages, £625." Counsel for the defendants also contended that no action for libel would lie against a friendly society in the name of its trustees and that any action for libel brought against a friendly society, either with or without some of its officers, must be brought, so far as the society is concerned, against the society in its registered name. Therefore, he said that, although it was expressly admitted on the pleading that the defendants were acting throughout as the trustees of the society, nevertheless the society itself was not sued in this action. I have no power, it was submitted, to give judgment against the friendly society even if malice had been found against each of the individual defendants, because C the action merely sues four gentlemen in two different capacities, and although, if malice was found, they would then be liable in their personal capacity, no judgment can be given against the society in the action as now constituted.

D The jury having found that at the time when the defamatory document complained of was published one of the defendants was malicious, a legal argument has taken place on three separate topics, all of which it is necessary for me to decide before I can enter judgment. The first point can be expressed in this way: Is counsel for the plaintiff right in saying that his client is entitled to judgment against the defendants in their capacity as trustees of the society? Counsel for the plaintiff conceded that, if his client were so entitled, the judgment against the defendants in that capacity would have to be so worded as to make it clear that they were only liable to satisfy such a judgment quoad the assets E of the society in their hands or which ought to be in their hands. The second point involves a very important point in the law of libel and a consideration of the well-known decision of BANKES, J., in 1913 in Smith v. Streetfield (1). Counsel for the plaintiff contends that, malice having been found by the jury against the defendant Cooper, the effect of that finding is to deprive the three co-defendants whom the jury found not to have been malicious of the protection F of the occasion of qualified privilege, and, therefore, to make them jointly liable with Cooper for the damages awarded by the jury. The third point that has been argued is upon the special damage found by the jury to have been sustained by the plaintiff in addition to the general damage which the law presumes from the mere publication of a libel.

G I will deal with those three points in that order. On the first point—whether the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against all the defendants as trustees of the society—the general rule, as I understand it, is that an unincorporated society cannot be sued. In some cases leave may be given to bring a representative action, but that does not apply to an action in tort. Therefore, one must look to see if there is any statutory authority for an action brought against a society, such as a friendly society, which is not incorporated. Counsel for the plaintiff H relies on s. 94 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, and, particularly, on sub-ss. (1) and (2) of that section. Section 94 (1) provides:

"The trustees of a registered society or branch, or any other officers authorised by the rules thereof, may bring or defend, or cause to be brought or defended, any action or other legal proceeding in any court whatsoever, touching or concerning any property, right, or claim of the society or branch, and may sue and be sued in their proper names, without other description than the title of their office."

By sub-s. (2):

"In legal proceedings brought under this Act by a member, or person claiming through a member, a registered society or branch may also be sued in the name, as defendant, of any officer or person who receives contributions or issues policies on behalf of the society or branch within the jurisdiction of the court in which the legal proceeding is brought, with the addition of the words 'on behalf of the society or branch' (naming the same)."

Provisions with regard to trustees of a friendly society appear in the earlier sections of the Act. Section 25 provides for their appointment. Section 34 deals with the transfer of stock standing in their names. Section 47 provides that all land shall be held in the name of the trustees. Section 49 provides that all property belonging to a registered society, whether acquired before or after the society is registered, shall vest in the trustees for the time being of the society. Section 50 provides for the devolution of property held by trustees on the death of the trustees. Section 51 provides for the property of the society being stated to be the property of the trustees in all legal proceedings whatsoever concerning any property vested in the trustees of the registered society.

Until a late stage in the argument on this point, counsel for the plaintiff based his contentions on cases decided under s. 9 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, and suggested that the language of s. 9 of the Act of 1871 was substantially the same as the language of s. 94 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. It was not until after he had closed his argument on that point and after counsel for the defendants had also argued that, in reply, counsel for the plaintiff emphasised an important difference, to which I shall have hereafter to refer, between the language of the two sections. I do not propose to read s. 9 of the Act of 1871 in full. It is preceded by s. 8 which appears to me substantially to enact in the case of trade unions some of the provisions to which I have shortly referred in the case of friendly societies in s. 25, s. 34, s. 47, s. 49, s. 50, and s. 51 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. Repeating s. 94 (1) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, and omitting immaterial words, the language is as follows:

"The trustees . . . may bring or defend . . . any action or other legal proceeding . . . touching or concerning any property, right, or claim of the society or branch . . ."

The words of s. 9 of the Act of 1871, again taking only the words which are material for the point I have to consider, are these:

"The trustees of any trade union . . . are hereby empowered to bring or defend . . . any action . . . touching or concerning the property, right, or claim to property of the trade union . . ."

Apart from substituting the definite word "the" property for "any," the sections are substantially identical except for the addition in the Act of 1871 of "to property" after "right or claim."

I propose, therefore, to deal with the argument of counsel for the plaintiff on this point by considering the authorities to which I have been referred on the Trade Union Act and then by considering whether the omission from s. 94 of the Act of 1896 of those two words which appear in s. 9 of the Act of 1871 makes any difference to the conclusion which I should have reached had I been dealing with the precise phraseology of s. 9 of the Act of 1871. So far as the construction of the Act of 1871 is concerned, counsel for the plaintiff contended that it was concluded in favour of the interpretation he put forward by the judgment of MATHEW, J., in Linaker v. Pilcher (2). Counsel for the defendants contended that the interpretation was concluded precisely the opposite way by the decision of the House of Lords in Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (3), so it is clear that those two cases must be closely scrutinised.

A Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (3) decided that a trade union registered under the Trade Union Acts, 1871 and 1876, could be sued in its registered name. The cause of action was for procuring or inducing breaches of contract. It was, therefore, an action of tort not connected with property. It was alleged that the servants of the plaintiff company were beset, not by people who were trespassing on the plaintiff company's premises, but who were on approaches to those premises. The argument set up on behalf of the trade union when a summons to strike out came before FARWELL, J., appears from the first four lines in his judgment, where he says ([1901] A.C. 427):

B “The defendant society have taken out a summons to strike out their name as defendants, on the ground that they are neither a corporation nor an individual, and cannot be sued in a quasi-corporate or any other capacity.”

C In other words, they were claiming to be above the law. That argument was based on the contentions that they could not be sued in a quasi-corporate capacity and that the tort for which they were being sued was not an action which fell within the terms of s. 9 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, and, therefore, they could not be sued through the medium of the trustees. FARWELL, J., dealt with that argument when he said (ibid., 430):

D “Now, the legislature in giving a trade union the capacity to own property and the capacity to act by agents has, without incorporating it, given it two of the essential qualities of a corporation—essential, I mean, in respect of liability for tort, for a corporation can only act by its agents, and can only be made to pay by means of its property. The principle on which corporations have been held liable in respect of wrongs committed by its servants or agents in the course of their service and for the benefit of the employer—qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus—(see Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Trustees v. Gibbs, Same v. Penhallow (4)), is as applicable to the case of a trade union as to that of a corporation. If the contention of the defendant society were well founded, the legislature has authorized the creation of numerous bodies of men capable of owning great wealth and of acting by agents with absolutely no responsibility for the wrongs that they may do to other persons by the use of that wealth and the employment of those agents.”

G That meant that that would not be so unless the learned judge dealt with the liabilities of the trade union under s. 9 through their trustees, and he deals with the point a little later. After saying that he would require very clear and express words of enactment to induce him to hold that the legislature had legalised the existence of such irresponsible bodies—that is to say, bodies not responsible in their corporate capacity or quasi-corporate capacity and not responsible in any other way—FARWELL, J., said (ibid., 431):

H “Not only is there nothing in the Acts to lead me to such a conclusion, but s. 15 and s. 16 of the Act of 1871 imposing penalties on the trade union, and s. 8 and s. 15 of the Act of 1876 point to a contrary intention; nor do I see any reason for saying that the society cannot be sued in tort in their registered name. Sections 8 and 9 of the Act of 1871 expressly provide for actions in respect of property being brought by and against the trustees, and this express intention impliedly excludes such trustees from being sued in tort. If, therefore, I am right in concluding that the society are liable in tort, the action must be against them in their registered name.”

The learned judge was dealing with the tort of procuring a breach of contract and his mind was directed to that point. I have no doubt that, had his mind been directed to torts arising from the occupation of property, for example, such as nuisance, he would have qualified the passage I have just read by saying that this express intention impliedly excludes such trustees from being sued in tort other than torts touching or concerning property. It is perfectly clear that FARWELL, J., is there deciding that the trustees of a registered trade union could not be sued for the tort of inducing breaches of contract under s. 9 of the Act of 1871. If, therefore, the trade union could not be sued in its registered name, it would be above the law, and, accordingly, he held that the trustees could not be sued, but that the union could be sued in its registered name. A

That decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal and the Court of Appeal were reversed by the House of Lords, who restored the order of FARWELL, J. In the House of Lords the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., said (ibid., 436): B

"I am content to adopt the judgment of FARWELL, J., with which I entirely concur; and I cannot find any satisfactory answer to that judgment in the judgment of the Court of Appeal which overruled it."

LORD MACNAGHTEN began his opinion by saying that he was of the same opinion as the Lord Chancellor and that, although he would be well content to adopt the judgment of FARWELL, J., and the reasons he had given, he, LORD MACNAGHTEN, would add a few words of his own. He dealt with the possibility of a representative action being brought in cases of tort under the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9. That rule has no application to tort, and certainly no application to the tort of libel. Those observations of LORD MACNAGHTEN are referred to by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in the case I had in mind when I said that R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, was inapplicable to tort, namely, Mercantile Marine Service Asscn. v. Toms (5). LORD SHAND in Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (3) said ([1901] A.C. 440): C D

"The admirable judgment of FARWELL, J., in whose reasoning I entirely agree, makes it unnecessary again to go over the provisions of the statutes of 1871 and 1876 . . ." E

LORD BRAMPTON began his speech by saying that he entirely concurred in the judgment and words of the Lord Chancellor in adopting the judgment of FARWELL, J. The only member of the House who did not in so many words expressly adopt the judgment of FARWELL, J., was LORD LINDLEY, and counsel for the plaintiff relied on a passage from his opinion where he said that after a careful study of the Act he had come to the conclusion that the Court of Appeal had rightly held that trade unions were not corporations, but that they had held further that, not being corporations, power to sue and be sued in their registered name must be conferred on them, and that the language of the statutes was not sufficient for the purpose, and he differed from them on that last point. He continued (ibid., 445): F

"The Act appears to me to indicate with sufficient clearness that the registered name is one which may be used to denote the union as an unincorporated society in legal proceedings as well as for business and other purposes. The use of the name in legal proceedings imposes no duties and alters no rights: it is only a more convenient mode of proceeding than that which would have to be adopted if the name could not be used. I do not say that the use of the name is compulsory, but it is at least permissive." G H

Counsel for the plaintiff argued that all that LORD LINDLEY was deciding was that the union could be sued in its registered name and not that it could not be sued in the name of its trustees. I think, however, that that passage from the opinion of LORD LINDLEY has to be read in the light of the earlier passage (ibid., 443) where he is dealing, not, indeed, with actions against trustees, but with the possibility of a representative action being brought, such as had been canvassed by LORD MACNAGHTEN in his speech. It is significant that LORD LINDLEY in dealing with that point said (ibid., 443):

"I have myself no doubt whatsoever that if the trade union could not be sued in this case in its registered name, some of its members (namely, its executive committee) could be sued on behalf of themselves and the other members of the society, and an injunction and judgment for damages could be obtained in a proper case in an action so framed. Further, it is in my opinion equally plain that if the trustees in whom the property of the society is legally vested were added as parties, an order could be made in the same action for the payment by them out of the funds of the society of all damages and costs for which the plaintiff might obtain judgment against the trade union."

That is to say, the judgment was to be against the trade union, and to secure its enforcement, if the trustees were joined, an order could be made against them to enable the property of the trade union to be attached to satisfy the judgment against it. Be that as it may, I am satisfied that that part of the judgment of FARWELL, J., which held that the procedure outlined in s. 9 of the Act of 1871 was inapplicable to a tort, or, at any rate, to a tort unconnected with property, was part of the reasons for the decision of the House of Lords, and had I been dealing with s. 9 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, I should have held that it followed from that part of the ratio decidendi that I was bound by the decision. I am satisfied in any event that counsel for the defendants is right in saying that the Taff Vale case (3) impliedly overruled the decision of MATHEW, J., in Linaker v. Pilcher (2), to which I will now refer.

Linaker v. Pilcher (2), which was decided before the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Taff Vale case (3) had been reversed by the House of Lords, is exactly in point. It was a libel action against a trade union sued in the persons of their trustees. The same arguments took place with regard to the interpretation of s. 9 in that case as have been advanced in the present case. MATHEW, J., said (84 L.T. 425):

"In support of that argument attention was called to s. 9 of the Trade Union Act of 1871. That statute in s. 8 contained the provision which is the provision for vesting the property. That is followed by s. 9, and my attention was called to that section as containing this very important provision, as it was suggested, for the protection of trades unions. Certainly, if the contention was well founded, it was a very important point in the interest of trades unions, because it would follow that for any breach of contract, or for any tort committed by them, for which their trustees were liable, the society were free of any liability and enjoyed complete immunity. I was therefore not surprised that this contention was urged at considerable length by those who represented the trade union society in this case. The first part of s. 9 provides thus . . . [the judge read it]. It was said that it is noticeable from that provision that what the trustees are empowered to do is to bring or to defend an action in respect of any right or claim or liability to the property of the trade union, to recover goods or land the property of the trade union, or to defend any proceeding against property belonging to the trade union; but that specific property it was alone intended to protect, and as there is no means of suing in respect of any other property—and this was not a case of specific property—this action and all analogous actions should therefore be actions the liability for which would rest where it fell—namely, upon the trustees or the executive committee, and could not be transferred to their principals, the trade union, if the trade union may be so described. I am of opinion that that would be an extremely narrow construction of the section. There seems to me to be no reason why there should be this disability imposed upon the trustees in respect of anything but specific property, and it is difficult to conjecture why any such meaning should be attributed to the Legislature, and I am satisfied there was no such intention. In support of the argument reference was made to certain obiter dicta, as they appeared to be, in the course of the argument in the Court of Appeal in the case of Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (3). The suggestion appears to have been made there, in the course of the argument, by one of the learned lords justices that property might mean specific property, but attention was called to another passage in the argument where a totally different opinion was expressed by the same lord justice. I do hope that the process will not be adopted by the Bar of referring to what is said in the course of the argument by a judge as conveying his opinion. Such observations during the argument are only intended to convey to counsel as a general rule what is passing through the judge's mind, leaving counsel to argue against the view the judge is putting forward, with the result that the judge is frequently convinced that the view he had indicated is not the correct one. That appears to be what happened in the case of Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (3). In my opinion, 'property' in s. 9 of the Act of 1871 means property generally, and I think that an action to add to the assets of the society—for instance, an action brought for breach of contract entered into on behalf of the society—would be an action 'touching or concerning the property of the trade union.' So an action that threatened the assets of the society by a claim for damages, as in this case, would be an action that touched and concerned the property of the society. It follows, therefore, that, in my judgment, the construction sought to be put on that section is not the correct one, and that there is no objection to this action by reason of the language of that section."

The judge was impressed in that case by the position that then obtained having regard to the decision of the Court of Appeal that a trade union could not be sued in its registered name. If in those circumstances a libel was published on the plaintiff by or on behalf of the trade union, there was no redress to the plaintiff so long as the Court of Appeal decision remained unreversed except by his availing himself of the powers conferred by s. 9 of the Act of 1871. Counsel for the plaintiff relied on that decision very strongly. He also relied on the passage to which I have referred from the opinion of LORD LINDLEY in the Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (3), and he said that in substance that passage from the opinion of LORD LINDLEY was approved by LORD HALDANE, L.C., in Vacher and Sons, Ltd. v. London Society of Compositors (6) ([1913] A.C. 115). Counsel for the plaintiff also pointed to the speech of LORD ATKINSON in the same case where he said ([1913] A.C. 124):

"A proceeding against the trustees under s. 9 of the Act of 1871 is in fact, if not in form, a proceeding in rem against the property of the trade union. In that sense it is an action against the union itself. Judgments for damages against a trade union for torts committed by its agent, in whatever form the action might be brought, can only be satisfied out of the property vested in the trustees; and it was, I think, apprehended by the legislature that the wide and positive provisions of sub-s. (1) might be taken as practically repealing in part s. 9 of the Act of 1871, and thereby conferring on the trustees immunity as absolute as that conferred upon the union. This sub-section, while qualifying their liability to some extent by the introduction of the provisions common to s. 1, s. 2, and s. 3, was, I think, passed for greater caution to meet this possible danger, and, save as to that qualification, to preserve unimpaired the liability imposed on the trustees by s. 9 of the Act of 1871."

There LORD ATKINSON is dealing primarily with the difference in phraseology between s. 4 (1) and s. 4 (2) of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, and the omission from sub-s. (1) of the qualifying words which appear expressly in sub-s. (2).

A It so happened that FARWELL, J., whose decision had been restored by the House of Lords in Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (3) and who by the year 1909 had become a lord justice, had to consider the effect of Linaker v. Pilcher (2) in Osborne v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (7) when it came before the Court of Appeal. When that case went to the House of Lords it resulted in what was known as the famous "Osborne judgment." The decision of the Court of Appeal was affirmed in the House of Lords, and there is no reference in the House of Lords to Linaker v. Pilcher (2). In the Court of Appeal FARWELL, L.J., said this ([1909] 1 Ch. 193):

B "For example, if a trade union as such can run a newspaper, the proprietors of THE TIMES, for instance, can register themselves as a trade union and libel all and sundry with perfect impunity. It is said that MATHEW, J., decided that the union could do so in Linaker v. Pilcher (2). That case was decided under somewhat unfortunate circumstances and cannot be regarded as correct. It was heard while the judgment in the case C of Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (3) was reversed in the Court of Appeal and before it was affirmed in the House of Lords, and the proposition that the trustees of the union could be sued for such a tort as libel of which not they but the trade union were guilty cannot stand, whatever might be the case if the tort were the result of the use of the union's property vested in them, so as to cause, for example, D nuisance by obstructing ancient lights."

Counsel for the defendants contends that Linaker v. Pilcher (2) was impliedly overruled by the decision of the House of Lords in the Taff Vale Ry. Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (3), and I agree with that contention. I think that the passage that I have quoted from the judgment of FARWELL, J., was part of the reasons for the decision in that case, and as that passage is E inconsistent with the passage in the judgment of MATHEW, J., in Linaker v. Pilcher (2), I think the passage adopted by the House of Lords must overrule that of MATHEW, J.

Even if I were wrong in so holding, I should still feel justified in not following the decision of MATHEW, J., in Linaker v. Pilcher (2). I am not bound by it: see Green v. Berliner (8), and the case cited there by DU PARCQ, J. I should F feel justified, first, by the language of FARWELL, J., which, as I have said, is quite inconsistent with the decision of MATHEW, J.; secondly, by the agreement of LORDS HALSBURY, MACNAGHTEN, SHAND and BRAMPTON with the language of FARWELL, J.; and, thirdly, by the dictum of FARWELL, L.J., himself in Osborne v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (7), in preferring the judgment of FARWELL, L.J., in that case to the judgment of MATHEW, J., in Linaker G v. Pilcher (2). I do not, however, think that the question of my being bound can arise in this case at all. Had this been a case under s. 9 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, I should have held that the point was concluded in favour of the contentions put forward for the defendants, and, that was the footing on which this legal argument started and continued for some time.

H Later on, however, counsel for the plaintiff took the point which has, I confess, caused me the greatest difficulty of all the points of law which have arisen in this case. The words in s. 94 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, are "touching or concerning any property, right, or claim of" the society, not "touching or concerning the property, right, or claim to property of" the trade union, which are the corresponding words in the Act of 1871. It was argued that the omission of those two words from the Act of 1896 shows a different intention from that which is to be deduced from the language of s. 9 of the Act of 1871. Counsel for the plaintiff also referred to the words "legal proceedings" which are the rubric, or marginal note, of the section. I do not think I am entitled to have regard to the rubric in interpreting a statute, and I disregard it on that ground. He also pointed to s. 94 (2), which provides:

"In legal proceedings brought under this Act by a member, or person claiming through a member, a registered society or branch may also be sued in the name, as defendant, of any officer or person . . ."

Counsel said that means "in addition to the remedy under sub-s. (1) of suing the trustees", and legal proceedings brought by a member, or a person claiming through a member, against persons who receive contributions and issue policies are not proceedings "touching or concerning the property". That subsection, it was submitted, fortifies the omission of the two words "to property" which appear in the Act of 1871 from the words in the Act of 1896 "right or claim of the society." So, it is necessary to read the words, "The trustees . . . may bring or defend . . . any action or other legal proceeding," (i) if it touches or concerns the property of the society (which, it was argued, is the only reference to property); (ii) if it concerns any right of the society; and (iii) if it concerns any claim of the society.

It would be an astonishing form of language if s. 94 (1) really meant that in any action or legal proceeding a registered friendly society could sue or be sued in the name of the trustees. Counsel for the plaintiff argues that the legislature is not normally economical in the language it uses in statutes, and that is, undoubtedly, so in a good many cases, but if there is given to the meaning of the words in s. 94 (1) the construction that it is sought to ascribe to them, there come, first, the words, "touching or concerning any property," which are completely otiose if the trustees can be sued in any action or legal proceeding as trustees. Then, following the words "the trustees may bring or defend," come the words, "right or claim of the society," which, apparently, only refer to "right of the society" or "claim of the society," not "liability of the society" or "claim against the society." Taking the words "bring or defend," counsel for the plaintiff, recognising, I think, that difficulty of language, said: "The trustees may bring or defend any action touching a right of the society." How they could bring an action is quite obvious, but why should they defend an action concerning a right of the society? Counsel for the plaintiff said: "That is the right of the society to publish a defamatory document." Sub-section (2), on which counsel for the plaintiff relied, says: "In legal proceedings brought under this Act . . . a registered society or branch may also be sued . . ." What are "legal proceedings brought under" the Act of 1896? Reference to s. 68 shows a number of matters as between members and the society which may not become the subject of litigation at all. At first sight it would look as though s. 94 (2) were limited to "legal proceedings brought under this Act," which I should take to be "which could not have been brought because they would not have lain except for the provisions of this enactment."

I have to make up my mind on this difficult point, which, put in a nutshell, is this: Are the words of s. 94 of the Act of 1896 to receive a wholly different meaning because a much wider construction than that which I have held has been put on the words of s. 9 of the Act of 1871 which differ from the words of s. 94 of the Act of 1896 for all material purposes only by the omission of the words "to property" after the words "right or claim"? On the one hand, I fully appreciate the force underlying the argument which counsel for the plaintiff has advanced—that the words "to property" do not appear in the Act of 1896 in the context in which they appear in s. 9 of the Act of 1871. I am fully alive to the fact that the construction which has been put on one section of an Act is not necessarily a guide to the construction which ought to be put on a section of another Act couched even in identical terms, because a section falls to be construed, not only by what it itself says, but also, it may be, by the whole of the provisions of the Act of which it is part. On the other hand, I find it difficult on any construction of these words to accept them in their literal sense. Finally, I think of the obvious difficulties and inconveniences which might be caused if an action for libel such as the present one could be brought against the trustees in a dual capacity, that is to say, against them qua trustees of the society and against them qua individuals. I will give one or two illustrations. Where the trustees are different persons from those

A responsible for the actual publication of the libel, no difficulty arises, but in this case it is the very trustees of this society who were alleged to have been solely responsible for the publication of the document alleged to be a libel, albeit acting in their capacity as trustees. In the result, the jury have found a verdict against the defendant Cooper, whom they have found to be malicious, and they have awarded damages against him, both general and special. Some

B question may arise hereafter as to the right as between himself and the society to be indemnified from the consequences of having acted on behalf of the society, bearing in mind that the jury have found him to be malicious. I can very well imagine a case where conflicting defences would have to be put in, (i) by the defendants in their personal capacity, and (ii) by the defendants in their representative capacity. I am now being purely hypothetical. Supposing

C in publishing a defamatory document, either on an occasion when there was no privilege or on a privileged occasion where the jury found one or more of their number to be malicious, the society desire to contend that the defendants were not acting within the scope of their authority and the individual defendants were equally anxious to allege that they were so that if they were held liable to the plaintiff they might have a right to indemnity against the society, or,

D at any rate, a right to apply for some apportionment under s. 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. I appreciate that when persons are sued in a dual capacity they may apply to the court to be represented by separate solicitors in their respective capacities. What would happen if that right were carried to the extent of putting in separate defences? After all, the persons who give the evidence whether they were acting on behalf of

E the society in the circumstances in which the libel came to be published in this case are the individual defendants. Could they say, on the one hand, as individuals in the witness-box: "We were," and, on the other hand, as trustees: "We were not"? Might it not very well be that their interests as individuals would conflict with their duty as trustees? Suppose the society decided to apologise and make a payment into court, and the defendants as individuals

F wanted to plead justification, what is to happen then? Some of the difficulties of that kind in a case of an imposed representative action were pointed out by the Court of Appeal in Mercantile Marine Service Asscn. v. Toms (5).

Taking all those matters into consideration, bearing in mind the omission of the words from s. 94 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, which appear in s. 9 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, emphasising the words in s. 94 (1) "touching or concerning any property, right, or claim of the society," which I construe to mean "touching or concerning any property of the society, touching or concerning any right of the society, touching or concerning any claim of the society," giving full weight to the argument of counsel for the plaintiff in respect of s. 94 (2) in respect of "legal proceedings brought under this Act," whatever that may mean, and remembering the considerations of difficulty to which I

H have referred if such an action as this can be brought against defendants who are alleged to have published the libel complained of both as individuals and as trustees, I give the same construction to the words of s. 94 (1) of the Act of 1896 as FARWELL, J., and the House of Lords gave to the corresponding words of s. 9 of the Act of 1871 in the Taff Vale case (3). I arrive at that conclusion, furthermore, by noticing the position of the trustees under the Act of 1871 as set out in s. 8, immediately preceding s. 9, and almost exactly the same provisions in the Act of 1896, not, indeed, in the section immediately preceding s. 94, but in s. 25, s. 34, s. 47, s. 49, s. 50 and s. 51, the sum total of them being substantially identical with the provisions of s. 8 of the Trade Union Act, 1871. Those provisions seem to me to point to trustees suing and being sued in respect of matters touching or concerning the property of the society, for the simple reason that by the very statute itself the whole of the property of the society is vested in them. That disposes of the first point.

I now come to what I refer to compendiously as the Smith v. Streatfeild (1) point. The jury have found that the defendant Cooper, in publishing the report complained of, was actuated by malice, and, therefore, he lost the protection afforded to an occasion of qualified privilege. Counsel for the plaintiff says that he is entitled to judgment against the three co-trustees individually on the ground that they were joint tortfeasors and that BANKES, J., in Smith v. Streatfeild (1) decided that where one of two or more joint tortfeasors was found to be malicious, that finding of malice destroyed the privilege, not only of the tortfeasor who was found to be malicious, but also of the other joint tortfeasors in respect of the publication complained of. Counsel for the plaintiff at a very early stage of the proceedings conceded that the occasion of publication, viz., when the report was read out by the defendant Smith at the meeting of the general committee of the society held on Nov. 6, 1947, was one of qualified privilege. I intimated that not only should I rule that the occasion was one of qualified privilege, but I should also rule that it was one of qualified privilege as regards each of the four defendants. Smith v. Streatfeild (1) still remains the law although it has not come through unscathed. In Crozier v. Wishart & Co., Ltd. & Western Printing Services, Ltd. (9) the Court of Appeal said that it would require careful consideration when it came before them. It was followed in Smith v. National Meter Co., Ltd. (10), where UTHWATT, J., said that, whatever view he might entertain as to the correctness of the decision in Smith v. Streatfeild (1), which he described as "a tottering authority," he was bound as a judge of first instance to follow it. I do not think UTHWATT, J., was bound to follow it, for the reasons I have given in discussing the decision of MATHEW, J., in Linaker v. Pilcher (2), but he did follow it. Counsel for the defendants has invited me to give the last push to this tottering authority. Had it been necessary for me to do so, I should have had to consider whether it was not my duty to refuse to follow that decision because, with the utmost respect for a most distinguished judge and mindful of the length of time which the decision has lasted, I feel that the decision was based on a false premise, namely, that a person who publishes a defamatory statement on an occasion of qualified privilege is a tortfeasor. In my judgment, a person who publishes a defamatory statement on an occasion which the law has clothed with the protection of qualified privilege is not a tortfeasor, and a person cannot be a joint tortfeasor unless he is a tortfeasor. I have particularly in mind the passage in the considered judgment of BANKES, J., in Smith v. Streatfeild (1), which is in these words ((1913) 3 K.B. 769):

"... the publication here complained of was a joint publication—that is to say, a single publication to each rural dean for which both defendants were jointly responsible. This publication was admitted by the printers. The finding of the jury establishes the fact that the defendant Canon Streatfeild was a tortfeasor as regards this publication. It necessarily follows, in my opinion, that the printers are joint tortfeasors with him."

Later, after referring to a rule of law, BANKES, J., said (ibid., 769):

"In my opinion it follows from this rule of law that in the case of a joint publication of a libel each tortfeasor is liable for the malice of the other."

The question is whether he is a tortfeasor or not. If he is a tortfeasor, there is no need to worry about malice.

The first question that I have to consider is: What did Smith v. Streatfeild (1) decide? It is not uninteresting to inquire what the result would have been if, instead of Canon Streatfeild having been found guilty of malice and the printers not guilty of malice, the jury had found that the printers had been guilty of malice and not Canon Streatfeild. Would it have been then argued that Canon Streatfeild had been deprived of the protection of his qualified privilege because, unknown to him, he had selected the one of the hundred thousand odd (I have assumed the number) printers in this country who happened to have a grudge against the plaintiff? Consider the position of solicitors. In the course of litigation dozens of letters containing remarks which are defamatory are written every day by solicitors on the instructions of their clients to the solicitors on the other side or to the other party in the litigation or the impending litigation. In such cases there is a publication by the sending solicitor to his typist or to the solicitors on the other side. Does a solicitor who writes such a letter on the instructions of his client lose all protection of privilege on the occasion if his client turns out to be malicious? Indeed, in those cases where the instructions which are given to the solicitors are diametrically opposed, it is almost certain that one of the clients would inevitably be held to be malicious. I need hardly point out how many letters written by solicitors in the furtherance of their clients' interests are necessarily couched in terms which are defamatory of the other party to a dispute. It shows, at any rate, the importance of seeing what Smith v. Streatfeild (1) really decided.

In Smith v. Streatfeild (1) the plaintiff was one of the diocesan surveyors for the diocese of Oxford, and his re-election to that office rested with the rural deans. The defendant, Canon Streatfeild, was desirous of bringing to the notice of the rural deans matters affecting the plaintiff in relation to a survey which the plaintiff had made of a rectory house and glebe in which the defendant, Canon Streatfeild, was directly interested as rector. It was conceded that the document containing those matters which was distributed by Canon Streatfeild among the rural deans, was published to each of those rural deans on an occasion of qualified privilege. It was also conceded or was found that, having regard to the number of persons to whom the document had to be transmitted, it was reasonable in the circumstances to have it printed, and the other defendants, the Robert Spennell Press, were employed by Canon Streatfeild to print the pamphlet which he proposed to disseminate among the rural deans. The pamphlet contained statements which were defamatory of the plaintiff, and the jury found as a fact that, in making the publications complained of, Canon Streatfeild was actuated by malice, but that the defendant printers were not actuated by malice. It was argued that the malice of Canon Streatfeild deprived the printers, who were innocent of malice, of their protection under the plea of privilege. The first and most important point to notice about Smith v. Streatfeild (1) is that the privilege of the printers was what I will call a derivative one. They had no privilege other than that which they derived from the privilege of Canon Streatfeild. Privilege entails a reciprocity of interest and duty between the publisher of a defamatory document and every person to whom the defamatory document is published. A glance at the arguments of Sir Frederick Low and of Mr. McCardie, shows that the difference between a derivative privilege and an independent privilege was present to the minds of counsel on both sides. Indeed, Mr. McCardie went so far as to argue that the mere printing and publication of the pamphlet by the printers in the ordinary course of business was sufficient to constitute an independent privilege in them, an obviously untenable argument which the learned judge refused to accept.

In the present case I have ruled that each one of these four defendants not only had a duty to publish the report complained of to the members of the general committee of the society, who had a duty to receive it, but that the report contained matters involving a common or corresponding interest between each of the trustees and the members of the general committee to whom the report was published. In other words, if Cooper had been malicious—and, indeed, if the other three defendants had known that Cooper was malicious—it would still have been their duty to publish the document which they did publish. Malice has nothing to do with the creation of privilege. It has to do only with its destruction. Rightly or wrongly, I have ruled that each of these four had a separate duty independent of the others to make the publication which they made or caused to be made. Smith v. Streatfeild (1), as I understand it, decided only that where two persons are jointly responsible for the publication of a document defamatory of a plaintiff, but one of them is clothed by the law with the protection of qualified privilege because there is a reciprocity of interest or duty between him and the persons to whom he publishes it, and the other is afforded the protection which the law affords to the author of the document merely because the other defendant's publication is ancillary to and reasonably necessary for the discharge of the duty or the protection of the interest which creates the privilege, an ancillary privilege to enable the publication to be adequately made by the person whose interest or duty it is to make it is given to the person who assists him to that end—for example, by typing or printing the document, but the privilege is derived by that person only from the reciprocity of interest or duty which creates the privilege in the other. There is only that one privilege, a derivative one. I read Smith v. Streatfeild (1) as deciding that when that occasion of privilege is destroyed by the malice of the person for whose benefit it is created, there being only one privilege, the person who is responsible for the publication in the ancillary sense is necessarily deprived of his privilege because there is nothing left to protect him. He has no privilege of his own apart from that of his co-defendant, and, therefore, he, however innocent he is, loses the protection with which the law clothes the occasion of publication by his co-defendant. The present, I hold, is an entirely different case because each defendant had a right and a duty quite independently of the others to publish the document which he did publish on the occasion and to the persons to whom he published it. I ask myself what would be the position of such a person if, just as he was about to discharge his duty or to protect his interest, he was told by someone that someone else who had a like duty and interest to discharge or protect was likely to be held by some jury in the future to be malicious? Does his duty become any the less? Does his right to protect his own interest become any the less, because some other person who has a corresponding duty to discharge or a corresponding interest to protect may be prevented from discharging his duty or protecting his interest on the ground that he will be found to be malicious? I hold that the destruction as a result of the jury's finding of malice against him of the protection of the privilege with which the law clothed Cooper when he caused the publication by Smith in no way impairs the independent privilege which was enjoyed by Cooper's three co-defendants.

I should not do justice to the argument of counsel for the plaintiff if I failed to refer to Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., Ltd. (11). It was said that that case must be taken to have decided the precise point which seven years later was thought to be decided by Smith v. Streatfeild (1), and that whereas I might not be bound to Smith v. Streatfeild (1) I was certainly bound by this decision of the Court of Appeal. Further, counsel for the plaintiff fortified that submission by referring me to a passage from the judgment of McCARDIE, J., in Pratt v. British Medical Asscn. (12) where he said ([1919] 1 K.B. 279):

"I may incidentally add that, had it been necessary to decide the point, I should hold that where persons are acting in combination to achieve such a purpose as that which is shown in the present case, then the proved malice of one or more may be attributed to the other participants in the combination. See the rule established in cases of defamation by Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., Ltd. (11) and Smith v. Streatfeild (1)."

If the rule had already been established by the Court of Appeal in Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., Ltd. (11) in 1906, it is rather remarkable that no one pointed out to BANKES, J., seven years later that he need not trouble to decide the point because it had already been decided by the Court of Appeal. In Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., Ltd. (11) a review of a book written by the plaintiff, the review being written by Sir Henry Lucy, was published in PUNCH, the proprietors of which were the defendants, Bradbury, Agnew & Company Ltd. Among other defences to an action for libel brought by the plaintiff in respect of that publication, the defendants pleaded fair comment. A defence of fair comment is destroyed by express malice in the same way as is a defence of privilege. Nowhere was the point discussed in any shape or form in Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., Ltd. (11) which was subsequently decided by BANKES, J., in Smith v. Streatfeild (1) seven years later. I have not seen the pleadings in Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., Ltd. (11) and the issues do not appear too clearly from the report. It is stated that Sir Henry Lucy was a contributor to PUNCH, but it does not say whether he was employed by PUNCH or whether it was alleged that he was employed by PUNCH, and there was no admission in the defence. In other words, it does not appear whether it was a question of the vicarious responsibility of a master for a servant acting within the scope of his employment, or even, possibly, of principal and agent, or what the issues were so far as that point was concerned on the pleadings. One thing that seems to be fairly clear is that no one took the point, and the defendants themselves were the last persons to desire any point to be taken as between themselves and Sir Henry Lucy. They were arguing in the Court of Appeal that there was no case against Sir Henry Lucy, not that if Sir Henry Lucy was rightly held liable they ought not to be. Counsel would certainly have brought Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., Ltd. (11) to the notice of BANKES, J., in Smith v. Streatfeild (1) if he had thought that it was an authority binding on BANKES, J. I am satisfied that there is nothing contained in the decision in Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., Ltd. (11) which gives the support of the Court of Appeal to the decision of BANKES, J., in Smith v. Streatfeild (1). Even if I thought there had been, I find that the facts of the present case and the law of privilege which arises in it distinguish the present case entirely from the principle which I find underlay the decision in Smith v. Streatfeild (1).

So that I may not to be said to have overlooked any of the authorities to which I was referred, I should, perhaps, add that counsel for the defendants referred me to a recent Irish case of Eglantine Inn, Ltd. v. Smith and Smith (Trading as "The Cromac Printery") (13), and to the judgment of ANDREWS, C.J., ([1948] N.I. 29); to the Australian case of McKenna v. Frazer (14), which was a case of conspiracy to injure; and to the passage from the judgment of EVATT, J. ([1946] C.L.R. 405).

That covers the second point. I now come to the issue of special damage, on which the law has been argued. Counsel for the defendants takes three points on that. First, he says that special damage is not pleaded. Secondly, he says there was no evidence of special damage to go to the jury. Thirdly, he says that, if he is wrong on both those submissions, the damage was too remote for the damages to be recoverable in law. Dealing with the first point first, the claim for special damage, if it is made at all, appears in para. 8 of the amended statement of claim. Counsel for the defendants relied on a recent decision of DEVLIN, J., in Hayward v. Pullinger (15), in which, following a decision of the Court of Appeal in Monk v. Redwing Aircraft Co., Ltd. (16), DEVLIN, J., held that no special damage was pleaded in an action for wrongful dismissal where the body of the statement of claim contained no reference to damages whatsoever but one of the sub-paragraphs of the prayer to the statement of claim said: "The plaintiff claims damages." I entirely agree with the decision of DEVLIN, J., on that point, but I find the pleading in para. 8 of the statement of claim in the present case quite different from the pleading in Hayward v. Pullinger (15). The function of pleadings is to make it clear to your opponent what case he has to meet, and I cannot help feeling that anyone reading para. 8 and seeing the words: "By reason of the premises the plaintiff has been brought into hatred ridicule and contempt," which are common form in every defamation action to indicate general damage to reputation, followed by the words "and his said service agreement was terminated on Nov. 6, 1947" must have been aware that special damage was being claimed. Nov. 6, 1947, was the very day on which the alleged libel was published and the plaintiff's appointment was determined by the persons who alone had power to determine it at the very meeting at which the document was published to them. The words "and the plaintiff has suffered damage" must have conveyed to anyone that a claim for special damage was being made. I agree that where no special damages are claimed the defendant is well advised to let sleeping dogs lie, and he can hardly be expected to ask for particulars of the claim for special damages where none is alleged. Where the statement of claim suggests the probability that a claim for special damages is intended, I think it is a question of degree whether the statement of claim does not put forward a claim for special damages, albeit without the particulars which the rules of pleading strictly require, or whether it is so nebulous that the defendant can treat it as not being a claim for special damages at all. A statement of claim is supposed to be delivered with full particulars, but it is a rule which is more honoured in the breach than in the observance. Therefore, I find that there is here a claim for special damages, though I do not intend anything I have said to indicate that there can be laxity in pleading special damage, and still less that such laxity can justify insufficient discovery of documents. A defendant is not to be left to secure by means of discovery by interrogatories information which he ought already to have got by discovery of documents. This case has involved difficult questions and important questions of law, and I did not think it right that the plaintiff should run the risk of my having taken a wrong view on a point which I consider to be at all a technical one, and therefore, although I hold that special damage is pleaded in this statement of claim, and, therefore, it was not necessary to amend, I invited counsel for the plaintiff to apply for leave to amend para. 8 of the statement of claim, and he did so. Having heard counsel for the defendants, I gave leave for the amendment to be made, which only goes to the question of costs. I am satisfied that this is a case where an amendment can be made without a shadow of injustice to the defendants.

[HIS LORDSHIP examined the further submissions made by counsel for the defendants and held that there was overwhelming evidence of special damage to go to the jury, and continued:] Now I come to the third point, that the special damage was too remote to be recoverable in law. Counsel for the defendants said it was clear that loss of employment was said by all the text-books to be sufficient special damage, for example, to support an action for damages for a slander which was not actionable per se, or to enable a claim for special damages to be made in an action for libel in addition to the general damages which the law presumes. He said that, so far as his investigation of the cases had gone, there had been no case where special damage in the form of loss of employment had been proved except where a contract of employment had been unlawfully determined. I should have thought that there was a stronger case for claiming special damages in a libel action where the contract was lawfully determined by reason of the publication of the libel or slander complained of than where it was unlawfully determined. Indeed, if it were unlawfully determined it seems to me that the judge would be bound to direct the jury in the libel or slander action in which the special damages were claimed that they must give credit to the defendants, if they took the view that the defendants were liable to pay special damages at all, for the amount which the plaintiff could recover from them in an action for breach of contract. I hold that as a matter of law the damage which the jury found as a fact was sustained by the plaintiff in this case, additional to the damage to his reputation which the law presumes in an action for general damages, was not so remote that special damages were not recoverable in law.

Judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant Cooper for the sum of £875 with seven-eighths of his costs as against the defendant. Judgment for the defendants Smith, Pascoe and Gould against the plaintiff with three-quarters of the costs incurred on behalf of all the defendants.

R. v. SMITH AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Humphreys, Finemore and Slade, J.J.), July 6, 7, 18, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Indictment—Amendment—Indictment not bad on its face—Amendment of matter of description—Charge of obtaining money by false pretences—Evidence that cheques, not money, obtained—Amendment to meet evidence—Responsibility of counsel for accuracy of indictment—Time to apply for amendment—Indictments Act, 1915 (c. 90), s. 5 (1).

The appellants were convicted on the first count of an indictment charging them with conspiracy to cheat and defraud a building society by obtaining loans on house property by various false pretences and on other counts of obtaining valuable securities, to wit, cheques, by false pretences. As originally drawn the indictment alleged that the appellants had obtained money by false pretences, but after the case for the prosecution had been closed and counsel for the defence had submitted that there was no evidence to support the charges of obtaining money by false pretences, an application was made by counsel for the Crown to amend the indictment by substituting in each of the counts for a charge of obtaining money one of obtaining a valuable security for a like sum. PRITCHARD, J., allowed the amendments.

HELD: to be "defective" within s. 5 (1) of the Indictments Act, 1915, an indictment need not be bad on its face as not charging any offence, but any amendment of an indictment with regard to matters of description (and probably in many other respects) may be made to meet the evidence in the case so long as the amendment causes no injustice to the person accused; in the present case the indictment was defective in the description of the thing obtained; and, therefore, PRITCHARD, J., had power to allow the amendments.

Per curiam: responsibility for the correctness of an indictment lies on counsel for the prosecution and not on the court. If amendment is required, application to amend should be made before the arraignment of the accused, and not at the close of the case for the prosecution, for such late amendments may be oppressive and embarrassing to the accused.

APPEALS against convictions at Winchester Assizes on counts in an indictment charging the appellants with obtaining valuable securities by false pretences, and against convictions on the first count of the indictment charging them with conspiracy.

The counts alleging false pretences set out that the appellants had obtained various sums of money from a building society, but after the close of the case for the prosecution and after counsel for the defence had submitted that there was no evidence to support the charges of obtaining money by false pretences counsel for the Crown applied to amend the indictment by substituting in each count an averment that the appellants had obtained valuable securities, to wit, cheques for the respective sums of money. PRITCHARD, J., allowed the amendments.

The first ground of appeal was that the jury had been misdirected on the count of conspiracy. The other grounds, on which the appellants were granted leave to appeal by PRITCHARD, J., were that the judge had no power under s. 5 (1) of the Indictments Act, 1915, to make the amendments which were made, and that there was no evidence to go to the jury on the indictment as amended. The case is only reported on the point arising under the Indictments Act, 1915, s. 5 (1).

Cur. adv. vult.

July 18. HUMPHREYS, J., read the following judgment of the court. The five appellants appeal by virtue of a certificate granted by the trial judge against their convictions at Winchester Assizes on counts of an indictment charging them with obtaining valuable securities by false pretences with intent to defraud. They also appeal against their convictions on the first count of the indictment which charged them all with conspiracy to cheat and defraud the Dunfermline Building Society by obtaining from the society loans on the security of freehold premises situate in or near Portsmouth by various false representations.

[HIS LORDSHIP examined the evidence on the first count charging conspiracy, found that there had been no misdirection as to the law or the facts, and said that the convictions and sentences must stand, and continued]: We now turn to the other counts of the indictment. The certificate of the trial judge is expressed as being granted to enable the accused to argue before this court two points—(i) that the trial judge had no power under s. 5 (1) of the Indictments Act, 1915, to make the amendments which were in fact allowed; (ii) that on the indictment as amended there was no evidence to go to the jury that any valuable security had been obtained by any of the appellants from the society. As originally drawn, counts 2, 3, 4, 5 and 7 (there was no conviction on count 6) alleged against certain of the appellants the offence of obtaining various sums of money from the society by the false pretences set out in the various counts. The case was a long one occupying twelve days, and at the close of the case for the prosecution objection was taken that there was no evidence to support the charges of obtaining money by the different accused. The matter having been argued, the prosecution applied for leave to amend those counts by altering in each count the sum of money alleged to be obtained to “a valuable security, to wit, a cheque for” that sum of money. That application was granted and the question argued before us on this appeal was whether the judge had any jurisdiction to direct that amendment.

The power to amend an indictment has been contained since 1915 in s. 5 (1) of the Indictments Act, 1915. That enactment, as is generally known, was passed mainly for the purpose of doing away with the technicalities and redundancies of pleading in criminal cases. Up to that time the powers of amendment had been very limited, and the sub-section in question provides, and, as we think, was intended to provide, that in future the power should be very considerably extended. The sub-section is as follows:

“Where, before trial, or at any stage of a trial, it appears to the court that the indictment is defective, the court shall make such order for the amendment of the indictment as the court thinks necessary to meet the circumstances of the case . . .”

Then follow the all-important words:

“ . . . unless having regard to the merits of the case, the required amendments cannot be made without injustice . . .”

The argument for the appellants appeared to involve the proposition that an indictment, in order to be defective, must be one which in law does not charge any offence at all, and, therefore, is bad on the face of it. We do not take that view. In our opinion, any alteration in matters of description, and probably in many other respects, may be made in order to meet the evidence in the case so long as the amendment causes no injustice to the accused person. There is the most ample power in such a case, or in any case where the court is of opinion that a person accused may be prejudiced or embarrassed in his defence by any such amendment, to direct that one person should be tried separately from others, or the trial may be postponed. It is to be observed that in this case the matter in respect of which the prosecution suggested that the indictment was defective was in the mere description of the thing obtained. In substance, the charge was the same, but in the view of the prosecution it was necessary to show that what was referred to in the count was not the actual sum of money obtained but the cheque, i.e., the valuable security with which in fact the society parted. We have no hesitation in this case in supporting the action of the judge in amending the indictment.

[His LORDSHIP examined the ground of appeal that the evidence failed to prove that any valuable security had been obtained by any of the appellants as alleged in the amended indictment, and found that in respect of the offences charged in counts 2, 4, 5 and 7 the securities were handed to the solicitor acting for all the appellants who received the cheques in his capacity as agent for the society but that in respect of count 3 the cheque was received by the solicitor as agent for the appellant, Smith. Accordingly, the convictions of Smith on counts 2, 4 and 5, of Pople on counts 2, 4 and 5, of Dallimore on counts 4 and 5, of Lord on counts 2, 4 and 5, and of Mallon on count 7 must be quashed and the convictions of Smith and Dallimore on count 3 upheld. His LORDSHIP continued]:

A feature of this case which obviously troubled the learned judge, as it does this court, is the omission from the indictment of any charge framed on the language of s. 32 (1) of the Larceny Act, 1916, which was expressly inserted, as it seems to us, in order to meet such a case as the present. The sub-section enacts that every person who by any false pretence

“ . . . with intent to defraud obtains from any other person any chattel, money, or valuable security, or causes or procures any money to be paid, or any chattel or valuable security to be delivered to himself or to any other person for the use or benefit or on account of himself or any other person . . . ” shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. Had counts been inserted for causing and procuring under the latter part of that section, it is difficult to see what possible defence would have been open to the accused. In opening the appeals, counsel for the appellant, Pople, stated frankly that the case of his client was devoid of merits, and that he relied on the defects in an indictment which was badly drawn in the first place and was made worse by subsequent amendments. The court was not informed whether the indictment in this case was drawn in the office of the clerk of assize* or whether it was submitted to counsel for revision before being signed, but we think it desirable to point out that the responsibility for the correctness of an indictment lies in every case on counsel for the prosecution and not upon the court. No counsel should open a criminal case without having satisfied himself on that point. If in his opinion the indictment needs amendment, the necessary application should be made before the accused are arraigned and not, as in this case, after all the evidence for the prosecution has been called. There may well be amendments which would be properly made at the commencement of a trial which would be oppressive and embarrassing to the accused if made at the close of the case for the prosecution.

This was a badly drawn indictment. As soon as the learned judge heard the first count read he rightly directed an amendment of the statement of the date intended to be charged. The amendments made at the close of the prosecution did not improve matters. These mistakes have resulted in great loss of time and expenditure of money, and it is to be hoped will not occur in the future.

In the circumstances we direct that the sentence on Dallimore of five years' imprisonment on count 3 shall be reduced to one year, to be served consecutively to the two years passed on count 1, and in the case of Smith that his sentence of three years' imprisonment on count 3 be reduced to one of six months to follow the twelve months passed on count 1. The sentences to be served are, therefore, as follows:—Pople, two years' imprisonment, and the order for costs stands; Dallimore, three years' imprisonment; Lord, twelve months' imprisonment; Smith, eighteen months' imprisonment; and Mallon, twelve months' imprisonment.

Convictions quashed in part. Sentences reduced.

GARNER v. BURR AND OTHERS.

Street Traffic—Trailer—Poultry shed drawn by tractor—"Land Implement"—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 1—Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 670), reg. 3 (1).

A An empty poultry shed, which had no brakes or braking system, was not equipped with pneumatic tyres or tyres of soft or elastic material, and had no distinguishing mark exhibited on the back, was drawn along a public road by a tractor. The tractor was driven by the respondent who was charged under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 3 (1) and (3), with having used on a road "a trailer which did not comply with the regulations applicable to the class or description of vehicles to which the vehicle belonged, as to construction, weight and equipment thereof." The justices were of opinion that the shed was not a vehicle because it was not an instrument or thing by which persons or goods were conveyed, and so did not fall within the definition of a "trailer" in s. 1 of the Act of 1930, viz., a vehicle drawn by a motor vehicle. They were, further, of opinion that, even if the poultry shed was a vehicle, it was a "land implement" within the meaning of reg. 3 (1) of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 670) and, therefore, excluded from the requirements of the regulations. Accordingly, the justices found the respondent Not Guilty of the offence charged.

D HELD: the decision of the justices was wrong because (a) for the purposes of s. 1 of the Act of 1930 anything on wheels which was drawn by a motor vehicle was a "trailer," and, therefore, the shed was a "trailer" within the meaning of the section; and (b) the shed was not a "land implement" within reg. 3 (1) of the regulations of 1947, and, therefore, was not excluded from the requirements of the regulations.

E [FOR THE DEFINITION OF TRAILER, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 31, pp. 764-766, paras. 1187, 1188, and 1950 Supplement.]

CASE STATED by Norfolk justices.

F At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Aylsham on Mar. 28, 1950, an information was preferred by the appellant, William Garner, against the first respondent, Lawrence Godfrey Burr, that he used on a road "a trailer which did not comply with the regulations applicable to the class or description of vehicles to which the vehicle belonged, as to construction, weight and equipment thereof contrary to s. 3 (1) and (3) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930." Informations were also preferred against the second respondent, Edmund Burr, that he permitted "the above-mentioned offence contrary to s. 3 (1) and (3) of the said Act of 1930," and against the third respondent, Thomas Atlee Grix, that he "aided and abetted the said Lawrence Godfrey Burr to commit the offence [under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 3 (1) and (3)] contrary to s. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848."

H Before the justices it was proved or admitted that on Mar. 5, 1950, Lawrence Godfrey Burr, accompanied by Grix, was, with the consent of Edmund Burr, driving along a road a tractor which was towing an empty poultry shed fitted with four iron bogie wheels. The poultry shed had no brakes or brake system and was not equipped with pneumatic tyres or tyres of soft or elastic material, and there was not exhibited on the back of the shed a distinguishing mark in the form set out in the diagram contained in sched. II to the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 670).

The appellant contended that the poultry shed was a "trailer" within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act of 1930, and that it did not comply with regs. 49, 50, 51 and 60 of the regulations of 1947. The respondents contended that the poultry shed was a land implement within the meaning of reg. 3 (1) of the regulations of 1947. The justices dismissed the informations, being of opinion that the poultry shed did not fall within the definition of a "trailer" in s. 1 of the Act of 1930 since it was not a vehicle, viz., an instrument or thing by which persons or goods are conveyed, and, even if it was a vehicle, it was a land implement, and, therefore, excluded from the requirements of regs. 49, 50, 51 and 60 of the regulations of 1947. The appellant appealed.

Southall for the appellant.

The respondents did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Norfolk. It raises the short point whether an empty poultry shed fitted with iron bogie wheels is, when drawn by a motor vehicle, a "trailer" within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 1. This poultry shed was being drawn along a road by a tractor.

Section 1 of the Act of 1930 provides:

"This Part of this Act shall apply to all mechanically propelled vehicles intended or adapted for use on roads (in this Act referred to as 'motor vehicles') and to vehicles (in this Act referred to as 'trailers') drawn by motor vehicles."

If this shed while being drawn along the road was a "trailer," there is no doubt that the offence charged was committed because it did not comply with the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1947, which govern, inter alia, the use of trailers on a highway. These regulations are designed, among other things, to protect road surfaces. This poultry shed had ordinary iron tyres, and not, as required by reg. 51 of the regulations, pneumatic tyres. It was, therefore, liable to damage roads.

In my opinion, the justices have put too narrow an interpretation on the word "vehicle" for the purpose of the Act of 1930. It is true that according to the dictionary definition a "vehicle" is primarily a means of conveyance provided with wheels or runners and used for the carriage of persons or goods and also a receptacle in which anything is placed to be moved. This poultry shed was being taken to market. The justices do not find that there were any poultry in it at the time. The Act of 1930 is, however, clearly aimed at anything which will run on wheels and is being drawn by a tractor or other motor vehicle, and, accordingly, an offence was committed.

One must assume that the regulations are intra vires for this purpose, and the regulations of 1947 that have been made by the Minister of Transport under the Act of 1930 clearly deal with many vehicles which are not designed for the carriage of goods or passengers. They deal with drying or mixing plant for the production of asphalt and vehicles for road construction. Many things are "trailers" for the purpose of this Act, and it cannot really be doubted that a "trailer", being a vehicle drawn by a motor vehicle, envisages anything which can be drawn on wheels. Therefore, I think the justices ought to have found that this poultry shed was a vehicle drawn by a motor vehicle within the meaning of s. 1 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and, therefore, a "trailer" within the meaning of the section. There is an exception in the regulations of 1947 taking out from their requirements a "land implement," which by reg. 3 (1) is defined as "any implement or machinery used with a land locomotive or a land tractor in connection with agriculture, grass cutting, forestry, land levelling, dredging or similar operations and includes a living van and any trailer which for the time being carries only the necessary gear or equipment of the land locomotive or land tractor which draws it."

This poultry shed is not an implement or machinery used in connection with agriculture within the meaning of that definition, which is designed to deal with such things as reapers, binders, rakes and harrows.

For these reasons I think the justices were wrong and the case must go back with an intimation that the offence was proved.

HILBERY, J.: I agree. Having regard to the mischief and the purpose of the Act to which my Lord has called attention, I am satisfied we ought to give a generous construction to the words which are brought for consideration in this case. I am satisfied that for the purposes of the Act this poultry house on wheels, being drawn, as it was, by a motor vehicle along the highway, was a "trailer" within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act of 1930, and, for the reasons given by my Lord, I come to the same conclusion as he did. With regard to the finding of the justices that the poultry shed could be regarded as a land implement, I do not think that it could possibly be so regarded when one looks at the definition given in the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1947, reg. 3 (1), which defines "land implement" as "any implement or machinery used with a land locomotive or a land tractor in connection with agriculture." A poultry shed is certainly not an implement or machinery. It is not within the words of the definition, and nobody, I should have thought, by any ordinary process of reasoning, could bring it within those words. I agree that the Case must go back for conviction.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted with direction to convict.

DUNN v. FIDOE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Asquith, L.J.J., and Hodson, J.), July 24, 1950.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—"Aggregate of agricultural land"—Inn and orchard land and pasture—Inn buildings used in connection with agricultural trade—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 1 (1).

In 1943 the landlord's predecessor in title let to the tenant under a tenancy agreement an inn, outbuildings, and land, which together were twelve acres in area, on a yearly tenancy at a rental of £60 per annum. The inn and garden occupied 0.381 acre, and the remainder of the land consisted of orchard and pasture. The landlord purchased the property for £5,500, of which £600 was attributable to the value of the land, and the net rateable value of the premises was £22, the land being de-rated. The inn was fully licensed and did a substantial trade, but the tenant also made substantial profits from the land, mainly by the sale of fruit. The house was not a farm-house, but had been adapted for use with the land. The landlord gave the tenant notice to quit the premises expiring on Sept. 29, 1949, but, as the consent of the Minister of Agriculture had not been obtained, the tenant served a counter-notice under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24 (1). The landlord obtained the Minister's consent, but, on a reference under s. 25 (4), the agricultural land tribunal refused consent. The landlord now claimed possession on the ground that, nevertheless, the notice to quit was effective.

HELD: the inn buildings were used in connection with the agricultural trade carried on by the tenant, and as, in view of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1948, the test for ascertaining whether premises were an agricultural holding was no longer the dominant or main user, the whole of the premises, including the inn, constituted an "agricultural holding" within s. 1 (1), and, therefore, in the absence of the Minister's consent, the notice to quit was invalid.

Quaere whether in a case where premises are used partly for agricultural purposes only and partly only for purposes unconnected with the agricultural user, a notice to quit the whole (without the consent of the Minister of Agriculture) might, on the construction of the Act of 1948, be invalid as regards the agricultural part, but valid as regards the remainder.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order made by His Honour JUDGE LANGMAN at Tenbury County Court on June 6, 1950, dismissing the landlord's claim for possession of an inn and certain pasture and orchard land.

JUDGE LANGMAN held that the land and inn together constituted an agricultural holding within the definition contained in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 1 (1), and that, as the consent of the Minister of Agriculture to the notice to quit had not been obtained, the notice was invalid. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J., and are summarised in the headnote.

E. G. H. Beresford for the landlord.

N. A. Carr and G. Green for the tenant.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal by the landlord from a reserved judgment of His Honour JUDGE LANGMAN, delivered by him on June 6, 1950, in an action in which the landlord was seeking to recover possession of certain licensed premises known as the Live and Let Live Inn, together with certain land at Neen Sollars in the county of Salop. The licensed premises and land had been let by the landlord's predecessor in title for a tenancy from year to year, a notice to quit had been served expiring on Sept. 29, 1949, and the landlord claimed possession. The tenant's defence was that the land in question was an agricultural holding within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and that the necessary consent to the notice to quit had not been obtained, and, therefore, that it was invalid and ineffective, and the learned judge so held.

The validity of the notice to quit had been raised by the tenant, who claimed that consent should not be given. The matter was dealt with by the county agricultural executive committee, who advised the Minister to give his consent, but the matter was taken by way of appeal to the agricultural land tribunal under the provisions of s. 25 (4) of the Act of 1948. The land tribunal refused consent, and so the position is that, if this is an agricultural holding within the meaning of the Act and if the agricultural holding includes the licensed premises, the notice to quit is invalid.

The question turns primarily on the proper construction of the definition of "agricultural holding" in s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1948, which provides:

"In this Act the expression 'agricultural holding' means the aggregate of the agricultural land comprised in a contract of tenancy, not being a contract under which the said land is let to the tenant during his continuance in any office, appointment or employment held under the landlord."

By sub-s. (2):

"For the purposes of this and the next following section, the expression 'agricultural land' means land used for agriculture which is so used for the purposes of a trade or business and includes any other land . . ."

These definitions must be considered in the light of the previous legislation on this subject and the cases decided thereunder. In the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, s. 48 (1), the definition of "holding," which is the term used there, was:

A " . . . any parcel of land held by a tenant, which is either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural and as to the residue pastoral, or in whole or in part cultivated as a market garden, and which is not let to the tenant during his continuance in any office, appointment, or employment held under the landlord."

Under that statute, Re Lancaster and Macnamara (1) was decided, and the headnote to that case is as follows ([1918] 2 K.B. 472):

B "Where under a single agreement of tenancy at an entire rent a farm is let together with an inn upon which a business entirely separate from the farm is carried on, the subject of the letting is not a 'holding' within the meaning of s. 48 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, in respect of which the tenant is entitled, on the expiration of his tenancy, to claim compensation for improvements under the Act."

C I pause there to observe that under the Act of 1908 there were no similar provisions whereby notices to quit were rendered ineffective by reasons of the absence of the Minister's consent, and Re Lancaster and Macnamara (1) was dealing only with the tenant's right to obtain compensation. At the conclusion of his judgment LORD SWINFEN EADY, M.R., said (ibid., 481):

D "In my judgment, where you have a holding comprising substantial business premises with a going business as part of one demise, although a farm and lands are let with it, such a holding is not within the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act."

The basis of the decision is shortly stated by SCRUTTON, L.J., where he says (ibid., 483):

E "But if you find any substantial part of the land used for a purpose which is neither agricultural nor pastoral, Parliament for some reason, into which I have not troubled to inquire, has not thought right, in my view, to give compensation either in respect of the whole land, or in respect of that part of it which is wholly devoted to pasture."

F There you have the test whether or not a substantial part of the land is or is not used for agricultural or pastoral purposes.

In the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, s. 57, there was the same definition of "holding," but s. 33 was inserted, apparently to deal with the Macnamara case (1). Section 33 provided:

G "Where the land comprised in a contract of tenancy is not a holding within the meaning of this Act by reason only of the fact that the land so comprised includes land (hereinafter referred to as 'the non-statutory land') which, owing to the nature of the buildings thereon or the use to which it is put, would not, if it had been separately let, be a holding within the meaning of this Act, the provisions of this Act relating to compensation for improvements and disturbance shall, unless otherwise agreed in writing, apply to the part of the land exclusive of the non-statutory land as if that part were a separate holding."

H Re Joel's Lease (2) was decided under the Act of 1923, and it was held that a holding let for the breeding of pedigree horses was not necessarily an agricultural holding within the meaning of that Act, because the main purpose of the letting was the breeding of horses, and, although there were in most of the fields plots of grass or portions of pasture land, the holding was not wholly pastoral. MAUGHAM, J., said ([1930] 2 Ch. 366):

"In my view it is clear that the precise language of the section stating that the provisions of the Act in such a case relating to compensation for improvements and disturbance shall apply only to what is called the 'part of the land exclusive of the non-statutory land,' shows beyond reasonable doubt that the rest of the provisions of the Act do not apply; and accordingly I see no reason for supposing that s. 23 of the Act under which the tenant is entitled to not less than one year's written notice of the intention of the landlord to terminate the tenancy applies where part only of the holding is an agricultural holding. Now is it true to come to the conclusion, which I think must be a conclusion of fact on the evidence that has been adduced in this case, that those parts of the premises which are not pasture land in the ordinary sense can fairly be described as a holding of a pastoral character so that the whole holding is an agricultural holding? I think, in considering that, I have got to bear in mind the purpose of the letting as evidenced by the circumstances in relation to the nature of the property and to the terms of the lease."

The Agriculture Act, 1947, s. 31, for the first time in permanent form introduced provisions for the Minister giving or withholding his consent to notices to quit, although similar provisions had existed under war-time regulations. Part III of the Act of 1947, which deals with agricultural holdings, has been repealed, and the Act of 1948 has taken its place. It is to be observed that the definition contained in s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1948 is wholly different from the definitions in the previous Acts, and that it clearly contemplates a contract of tenancy which comprises in part agricultural land and in part land which is not agricultural, and it enacts that the "agricultural holding" is to mean the aggregate of the agricultural land comprised in such contract of tenancy. It is remarkable that in the remaining provisions of the Act no provision seems to have been made, at any rate in express terms, for severance of that part of the land which is agricultural from that part which is not agricultural where both are comprised in the same contract of tenancy.

The learned judge found that the premises were let under one tenancy at a rental of £60 a year. The premises comprised a village inn with outbuildings, garden and six enclosures of pasture and orchard land, the total area being twelve acres of which the house and garden occupied 0.381 acre and the remainder was orchards and pasture. The pasture land had until recently been sub-let to a tenant who did not have the use of the house and premises. The price of the property when purchased by the landlord was £5,500, of which £600 was attributable to the value of the land, and the net rateable value of the premises was £22, the land being de-rated. Having stated those facts the learned judge continued:

"The inn is fully licensed, and does a substantial trade. The house is not a farm-house, but has been adapted for use with the land. The tenant has made substantial profits from the land mainly owing to the sale of fruit in recent years."

The tenant had only let off the grazing of the pasture land, which was hilly, and had himself carried on the business of the sale of fruit on the premises which he occupied. Later in his judgment the learned judge said:

"The word 'land' includes buildings, and although the buildings are designed as an inn they are also used to a small extent for the tenant's agricultural business . . . Although the inn provides the larger and more constant part of his income he has made substantial profit from the fruit and pasture . . . Although the inn provides the main business of the tenant and the land is of very small value compared with the inn, it cannot be held that the agricultural portion is so small in extent or value that it should be disregarded."

A In my view, those findings, taken with the rest of his judgment, clearly indicate that he regarded the premises in which the tenant lived as a necessary part of the land, which would have admittedly been an agricultural holding if it had been let by itself. It is true that he finds that the most profitable user of the premises was that as licensed premises, but none the less the inn was used, and, I think, necessarily used, in connection with the agricultural trade or business carried on at the premises by the tenant. Therefore, unless counsel for the landlord is right in saying that the test is still what is the dominant or main user, the whole of these premises including the inn must be regarded as an agricultural holding. I can find no authority for the proposition that the primary or dominant user is now the test, because s. 1 of the Act of 1948 seems to me to enact the contrary by its plain language. Counsel for the landlord, however, strongly contended that the learned county court judge's judgment may give rise to difficult and harsh results in many cases—results which could not have been contemplated by the legislature. He says, for instance, that you may have a large hotel and some small portion of the land used for agricultural business purposes totally unconnected with the hotel. Or you might even have a large factory with a certain amount of land from which the produce was sold. He says that it cannot have been intended by the legislature that, in a case of that kind, a notice to quit relating to the whole premises, including the hotel or the factory, comprising the major portion of the premises, should be held to be invalid by reason of the absence of the consent of the Minister of Agriculture or the land tribunal (who are primarily interested of course in matters of agriculture), with the result that the landlord could not recover possession of the hotel or factory. It is not necessary to express any concluded view on that question, having regard to the facts found in this case by the county court judge. I am by no means convinced that our decision upholding the county court judge would necessarily result in those hardships, because I think it is a possible view that, having regard to the scheme of the Act of 1948, the language of s. 1, and the provisions of s. 31 and s. 32, it may be that a notice to quit premises of that nature could be held to be invalid without consent in so far as it applies to the agricultural portion but valid for the remainder. True that such a construction would be contrary to the common law rule that a notice to quit part of premises is bad, but none the less it may be a necessary inference from this Act that that result was intended in the case of a building, for instance, which is totally unconnected with the agricultural land with which it is let. It would not, however, be right in this case to express a concluded view on that matter, which is obviously one of considerable difficulty. It would appear from the Act as a whole that the legislature had not envisaged questions of this kind arising, and have certainly not made express provisions for dealing with them when they do arise. On the facts of this case as found by the learned county court judge I think this appeal fails.

G ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree that the appeal fails. The findings of fact of the learned county court judge make it unnecessary to decide some of the interesting and critical questions of law around which the argument revolved.

HODSON, J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

EARL OF RADNOR v. FOLKESTONE PIER AND LIFT CO. AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 20, 21, 1950.]

Requisition—Land—Compensation—Application of compensation—Land subject to mortgage—Land leased to company—Covenant by lessee to insure against fire—Insurance money to be laid out in re-building—Mortgage by lessee—Property destroyed by fire while requisitioned—Insurance policy not kept up—Whether compensation to be applied in same manner as money receivable under policy—Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939 (c. 75), s. 2 (1) (b), s. 14.

By a lease, dated July 9, 1891, property was demised for a term of nine hundred years, at a rent of £25 a year, with a licence for the lessee, a statutory company, to maintain and use thereon a pier. By cl. 16 the lessee covenanted to keep the pier continually insured against fire during the term of the lease in the joint names of the lessor and lessee, and, by cl. 17, to apply any money received under a policy of fire insurance in re-building and reinstating the pier. In 1894 the lessee created a mortgage, by way of assignment of its undertaking, to secure a sum of £2,940 with interest. From Sept. 3, 1940, until June 24, 1945, the property was requisitioned by the Crown, and the policy of fire insurance was allowed to lapse. In May, 1945, while the property was still requisitioned, the pier was completely destroyed by fire. Compensation in respect of the damage became payable by the Crown under the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, and the landlord contended that, as, under s. 2 (1) (b) of the Act, the compensation was to include "a sum equal to the cost of making good any damage to the land which may have occurred during the period for which possession thereof" was retained by the Crown, there was a contractual duty on the lessee to apply the compensation money, so far as it would extend, in restoring the pier, in the same manner as if the compensation had been money payable under a fire insurance policy, and that the mortgagee, as the assignee of the lessee's undertaking, could not claim the right to the money under s. 14 of the Act of 1939 except subject to the obligations contained in cl. 17 of the lease.

HELD: although the compensation payable was closely analogous to money payable under an ordinary fire policy, the provision in s. 14 of the Act that if at the time the compensation accrued due the property was subject to any mortgage, the sum so paid should be deemed to be comprised in that mortgage, was unqualified, and, therefore, the compensation payable was not subject to the obligations contained in cl. 17 of the lease.

[FOR THE COMPENSATION (DEFENCE) ACT, 1939, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 3, p. 988.]

(1) Borthwick-Norton v. Collier, [1950] 2 All E.R. 204; 114 J.P. 375.

ACTION by the lessor claiming (a) a declaration that the compensation money payable by the Crown under the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, in respect of the requisitioning of certain property, including the Folkestone pier, should be impressed in the hands of whichever of the defendants should be held to be entitled to it with a trust to lay out the money, so far as it might suffice, in repairing and re-building the pier and works in accordance with a covenant by the first defendant, the lessee, contained in the lease whereby it held the property, in respect of money receivable under a fire insurance policy; and (b) an order that the money be so laid out when received.

The lease, which was dated July 9, 1891, contained inter alia covenants by the lessee, Folkestone Pier and Lift Co. (the first defendant), to keep the pier and works insured against fire during the term of the lease, and to apply any money received under the fire insurance policy in re-building, repairing, and reinstating the insured property. When the pier was requisitioned by the Crown in September, 1940, the fire insurance policy was allowed to lapse. The pier was destroyed by fire while it was requisitioned and a sum of about £10,000 was payable under the Act of 1939. The action was originally brought against the defendant company alone, but, on realising their interest in the matter, the second defendants, the British Transport Commission, who were the present mortgagees under a mortgage created by the defendant company in 1894, obtained an order that they be added as defendants, having, in the meanwhile, commenced an action against the defendant company to enforce the security of the mortgage, and having obtained an order from ROXBURGH, J., dated May 20, 1949, for the appointment of a receiver of the defendant company. The second defendants claimed that, under s. 14 of the Act of 1939, the compensation was to be deemed to be comprised in their mortgage. The plaintiff contended that, as the second defendants were the assignees of the defendant company's undertaking under the mortgage, they could not claim the right to the money under s. 14 except subject to the obligations contained in the lease. The facts appear in the judgment.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and Newsom for the plaintiff.
Russell, K.C., and H. E. Francis for the second defendants.
 The first defendant did not appear.

VAISEY, J.: This is a strange action in some ways and the result is something which could not easily have been foreseen, and I doubt whether it was ever in the contemplation of the legislature that such a conclusion could be reached as that to which I have come in the present case. I have, however, to decide the matter as a question of law, and, although I might be able to cast my judgment into a more attractive form if I reserved it, having made up my mind I cannot see that any good purpose would be served by withholding from the parties the decision which I am about to state.

The plaintiff, the Earl of Radnor, may be regarded as the lessor and owner of the ground on which a pier stands, or stood, on the sea front at Folkestone, and, I think, also of the pier itself. The pier was constructed under a private Act—the Folkestone Pier and Lift Act, 1884. That Act, which incorporated certain general provisions of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, and other Acts, enabled the defendant company, Folkestone Pier and Lift Co., to construct, maintain and regulate the pier in question. It is rather strange to find that, notwithstanding that Act, the defendant company were obliged to become the lessees under a lease, dated July 9, 1891, and made between the plaintiff's predecessor in title, the then holder of the earldom of Radnor, of the one part, and the defendant company, of the other part. The pier is not specifically named in the endorsement on the document. I describe it as a lease, but it is, admittedly, both a lease and a licence. It is, in part, a lease of certain adjoining pieces of ground on the sea front at Folkestone and also, possibly, of some part of the ground on which the pier stood, but, besides being a lease of such property as that, it is also a licence which empowered the defendant company to deal with the pier in a certain way and in no other way. Indeed, the effect of it is very much the same as though there had never been the private Act which I have mentioned, and Lord Radnor had leased the ground to the company, retaining such rights over the site of the pier as are thereby reserved to him in the capacity of landlord.

The lease begins by demising the ground on the sea front which abutted on the landward end of the pier. It also demised "full liberty and licence to maintain and use the said pier and the works connected therewith as now constructed"—i.e., as constructed at the time when the lease was granted—according to certain plans and elevations to which the lease refers. The term of the demise and the licence is said to be nine hundred years from June 1, 1894, the rental being £25 a year which was subsequently, by certain other accretions being made to the structure, increased to a larger amount. The obligations of the lessee, i.e., the defendant company, were, many of them, of the usual kind, viz., to pay the rent, to pay the outgoings, to keep the approaches to the pier as an ornamental garden and in good order, to maintain the pier in its then existing form and not to turn it into a solid structure which would interfere with the flow of the tide or the passage of boats underneath it, and generally to maintain the pier as a pier, not to allow the pier to become an eyesore through being covered with advertisements, and generally to keep it in repair, not to assign the lease, and at the end of the term granted by the lease or its sooner determination to surrender and yield it up to the lessor with all buildings, improvements, and so forth. Clause 16 of the lessee's covenants is a covenant to insure, and the obligation laid on the company is, during the term of the lease

"... to insure and keep continually insured from damage by fire the said pier and works and all other buildings [which might be erected on the pier] in the sum of £5,000 in the Phoenix Fire Assurance Co. or such other of the public offices for insurance against fire in London or Westminster or in the county of Kent as the lessor shall direct in the names of the lessor and of the company..."

Then there is the usual obligation to produce the policy and the receipts for the current premiums. Clause 17 is in these terms:

"And also will as often as the said pier and works and buildings or any part thereof shall be destroyed or damaged by fire or other accident lay out and apply the money to be received by virtue of any such insurance as aforesaid and all such other sums of money as shall be necessary for that purpose such other sums to be provided by the company in re-building repairing and reinstating the same under the inspection and to the satisfaction of the architect or surveyor for the time being of the lessor."

Then there is a proviso for re-entry if the rent should be unpaid or the lessee's covenants should in any respect be in breach. It is, perhaps, somewhat strange to observe that the lessor does not covenant to do anything.

On Sept. 3, 1940, possession was taken by the Crown of the whole of the demised premises and the whole of the pier "in the exercise of emergency powers," that being the phrase used in the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 1, and that possession, so taken, was continuously retained until June 24, 1945. On May 28, 1945, while the pier was still in the possession of the representatives of the Crown, a disastrous fire broke out, and the pier (except those parts of it which were indestructible by fire) was for all practical purposes completely destroyed, and so it remains to this day. I need not go in detail into the reasons for it. It will suffice for me to state the fact that the insurance for which the lease provides in cl. 16 was not kept up. No policy in the joint names of the landlord and the pier company was in existence as from 1941. That came about, so far as one can discover, in these circumstances. Inasmuch as under the Act of 1939 the Crown was liable to compensate the owners for damage to property of which it had taken possession, the authority concerned, the War Office, represented to the defendant company that it was useless for them to continue to insure, and, rightly or wrongly, and with whatever object it may be, the defendant company did not insure. The War Office intimated that they were no longer prepared to reimburse the premiums under the Phoenix policy of insurance. There was no policy in existence, and, therefore, there is no money receivable under any policy in respect of the fire which took place on May 28, 1945.

This action was originally an action between the plaintiff, as landlord, and the defendant company. It was, however, subsequently realised that the British Transport Commission, as successors to the undertaking of the South Eastern Railway Co., and the Southern Railway, were the mortgagees under a mortgage dated May 4, 1894, created by the defendant company to secure a sum of £2,940 with interest, and that the British Transport Commission was obviously interested in the matter. The Crown having intimated that a sum, which is somewhere in the neighbourhood of £10,000, would be paid, or was likely to be paid, in respect of the damage occasioned by the fire, an action to enforce the security of the mortgage was brought by the British Transport Commission against the defendant company and the Public Trustee, who was sued on behalf of

A himself and other debenture holders in the company. In that action—to which, of course, the plaintiff in this case is not a party—an application was made for the appointment of a receiver, in order that the compensation money payable, as it was supposed, primarily and normally to the defendant company, should be negotiated as regards the amount and taken over and claimed by the British Transport Commission. The appointment of the receiver was made by ROXBURGH, J., on May 20, 1949, in the other action to which I have referred. I believe that some notification was made to the Crown authorities that, in view of the plaintiff's claim, they should not part with the money but should allow it to remain pending the decision of this action. In any case, the receiver appointed in that action has not been able to obtain possession of the compensation or any part of it.

C In the action now before me it was originally said that the plaintiff, as landlord, was the proper person to receive the compensation as being the "owner" of the land within the meaning of that word as defined in the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 17 (1) (a), that definition stating that "owner" means:

D "in relation to land, the person who is receiving the rackrent of the land, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the rackrent of the land if it were let at a rackrent."

The plaintiff's original contention was that he would be the proper person to receive the rackrent of this pier if it had been let at a rackrent (I interpose parenthetically to say that the defendant company appears to be completely derelict), but that contention, unfortunately, before this action came on for trial, was made completely unsustainable by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Borthwick-Norton v. Collier (1), which was to the effect that the person who must be regarded as receiving the rackrent must be the person who, in the case of a lease, was capable of being so described at the date of the lease. It was quite obvious that the plaintiff could not be said to have been a rackrent landlord

F at the date of the lease of July 9, 1891, under which all his rights arose.

Section 14 of the Act of 1939 provides:

G "Where any sum by way of compensation is paid in accordance with any provisions of this Act requiring compensation to be paid to the owner of any property, then, if at the time when the compensation accrues due, the property is subject to any mortgage, pledge, lien or other similar obligation, the sum so paid shall be deemed to be comprised in that mortgage, pledge, lien or other obligation."

That is a qualification of what appears in s. 2 (3), which says that, prima facie, the person entitled to receive the money is the person who is then the owner of the land. Having been deprived of his first avenue of approach, the plaintiff now puts his case in this way. He says that, for all practical purposes, the compensation money stands, or ought to stand, in exactly the same position as the money which would have been received under the policy of insurance contemplated as existing under the lease, and that there is really no difference (and there ought to be regarded as being no difference in equity) between that compensation money and the money which would have been paid under the policy taken out under the lease.

H Section 1 (1) of the Act of 1939 provides that where land has been taken possession of on behalf of His Majesty:

"... then, subject to the following provisions of this Act, compensation assessed in accordance with those provisions shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament, in respect of the taking possession of the land. . ."

By s. 2 (1) (b) the compensation is to include

"a sum equal to the cost of making good any damage to the land which may have occurred during the period for which possession thereof is so retained (except in so far as the damage has been made good during that period. . ."

The conditions under which this compensation money is payable are very closely analogous, in a case such as the present, to a claim made under an ordinary fire policy. When, however, it is said that the compensation money is subject to all the qualifications introduced as between landlord and tenant it is very difficult to see how that contention can be justified, because the compensation which has to be paid under the Act is, as appears from the provisions I have already read, compensation which is to be paid in accordance with the other provisions of the statute, among which is the provision in s. 14 that, if at the time when the compensation accrues due, the property is subject to any mortgage, the sum so paid shall be deemed to be comprised in that mortgage. That statement is apparently quite unqualified. The mortgage under which the British Transport Commission are the present mortgagees is in the form of a mortgage created by a statutory company and contains an assignment of "the undertaking of the company . . . and all the estate right title and interest of the company in the same"—which, I think, must mean "in the undertaking." The provisions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to the borrowing of money by statutory companies, are incorporated, and for all practical purposes it seems to me that the British Transport Commission, as successors to the South Eastern Railway Co., are really in the position, so far as this action is concerned, of ordinary mortgagees.

The plaintiff says that, as a matter of equity, and regard being had to what would have happened if this had been money payable under a policy of insurance, there is a contractual duty on the part of the defendant company to apply this money for the purpose of making good the pier and restoring it so far as that money would extend—and, indeed, to restore it without any limitation, although his rights against the company, as it is without funds, appear to be completely worthless. Counsel for the plaintiff contends that the British Transport Commission, as mortgagees and assignees of the undertaking, are entitled to the entirety of the undertaking, and that they cannot claim the right to this money except subject to the obligations originally attaching to that money, viz., the obligations under cl. 17 of the lease. Up to a point it certainly looks as if these compensation moneys ought to be in the same position as the policy moneys would have been if there had been no war, no Compensation (Defence) Act, and the pier had been burnt down in those imaginary circumstances. Unfortunately, however, those are not the facts, and although the name of equity and the great principle of equity have been called in aid, whilst I confess at once that I should like to be able to make use of that principle, I do not think it is possible. The money payable is not fire insurance money, but compensation under an Act of Parliament—and, just as it might be argued that, if it had been money under the lease, regard would have to be had to all the clauses in the lease, so, I think that, if this money is to be paid at all, it must be paid on all the terms of the compensation provisions, and those terms include in the plainest possible language the statement that, if the property—in this case the pier which is part of the undertaking—is at the moment when compensation is due (i.e., when the fire occurred) subject to a mortgage, the sum so paid shall be deemed to be comprised in the mortgage. That is a very strong provision because it envisages a case in which the compensation money was not, in fact, comprised in the mort-gauge. Counsel for the plaintiff has pressed me (and I think I agree with him) to say that the policy moneys would not have been affected by the mortgage for two reasons: (i) because the mortgagees would have had to take the money under cl. 16 subject to the obligations in cl. 17, and (ii) because the policy would have stood in the joint names of lessor and lessee, so that, as a matter of practical possibility, no use could have been made of it except with the lessor's consent. I have said that I do not think this situation can have been envisaged by the Act which, of course, was passed at a moment of great emergency and probably drafted in general terms and in a hasty manner, but I do comment (and I think it is a very curious position) that, even if a mortgagor had in the most express terms excluded from the scope of the mortgage this particular compensation money, yet it appears that, if the property is subject to any mortgage, the sum paid as compensation under the Act shall be deemed—contrary to the fact and disregarding the express intentions of the parties—to be comprised in the mortgage which expressly excluded it. That, of course, is the kind of position which arises when legislation is carried through in an emergency, but, although one has long ceased to be shocked at the consequences which flow from legislation passed in exceptional circumstances and at an exceptional time, it does seem to me to be a most extraordinary invasion of the ordinary rights of the subject. I have to decide the action on the true meaning of the statute, regard, of course, being also had to the terms of the lease, and it seems to me that I have no option but to dismiss the action. I am rather troubled about the costs, because it seems to me that the British Transport Commission are getting a very handsome present owing to the very curious language of s. 14 of the Act. In the circumstances, although it is very unusual to deprive successful defendants of their costs, I shall make no order as to the costs of the action and dismiss it without costs.

Action dismissed. No order as to costs.

CASE STATED by the appeal panel of the County of London Quarter Sessions.

On Feb. 21, 1950, on a complaint made by the appellant that she had been delivered of a bastard child of which the respondent was the father, an affiliation order was made against the respondent by the magistrate sitting at West London magistrate's court. The appellant was a single woman for the purpose of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, and on Aug. 15, 1949, she gave birth to a male child, James Edward Braune, at Hamburg, Germany. The appellant was born a German in Germany, and at the date of the birth of the child she was domiciled and resident in Germany. On Nov. 11, 1949, she came with her child to England at the instance of the respondent and had resided here ever since. The respondent appealed to quarter sessions where it was contended on his behalf that, as the said child was born abroad of a foreign mother who had a foreign domicile at the date of his birth, in view of the decision in R. v. Blane (1) the magistrate had no jurisdiction to make the order. It was contended for the appellant that the decision in that case was no longer good law and that there was nothing in the Act of 1872 which need be taken to limit jurisdiction in the circumstances of the present case. Quarter sessions allowed the respondent's appeal and quashed the order.

I. H. Jacob and Langdon-Down for the applicant.
Craymer for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the appeal panel of the County of London Quarter Sessions who allowed an appeal and quashed an affiliation order made by the magistrate at the West London magistrates' court. The chairman of the appeal panel, having stated the facts, expressed his opinion in this way:

"On the facts above related, we came to the conclusion, and so found, that the said facts were indistinguishable from those in R. v. Blane (1) and that we were bound by that decision, and that, therefore, neither we nor the said magistrate had the power to make an affiliation order under the said Act. The said appeal panel, therefore, allowed the appeal and quashed the said order."

Counsel for the appellant has asked us to distinguish R. v. Blane (1) in view of the decision in R. v. Humphrys, Ex p. Ward (2). It is important to look at the statute in force at the time of the decision in R. v. Blane (1). It was s. 2 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, and was in these terms:

"And be it enacted, that any single woman who may be with child, or who may be delivered of a bastard child, after the passing of this Act, or who has been delivered of a bastard child within the period of six calendar months before the passing of this Act, may either before the birth, or at any time within twelve months from the birth of such child, or at any time thereafter, upon proof that the man alleged to be the father of such child has within the twelve months next after the birth of such child paid money for its maintenance, make application to any one justice of the peace acting for the petty sessional division of the county, or for the city, borough, or place in which she may reside, for a summons to be served on the man alleged by her to be the father of such child; and if such application be made before the birth of the child the woman shall make a deposition upon oath stating who is the father of such child, and such justice of the peace shall thereupon issue his summons to the person alleged to be father. . ."

That was the law in 1849 when a Frenchwoman domiciled in France brought bastardy proceedings against a man in this country, and the court decided that the bastardy laws did not apply. LORD DENMAN, C.J., giving a very short judgment in R. v. Blane (1), said (13 Q.B. 772):

A “Assuming that the magistrate who made this order has examined the law of France, and ascertained that according to that law the child is a bastard, we are clearly of opinion that children born out of this country are not the subject of our bastardy laws. I will only add that the principles of humanity are not concerned in this decision; for every destitute person in this country has a right to maintenance as casual poor.”

B Observe that the learned Lord Chief Justice said that, even assuming that the child was a bastard according to French law, in his opinion, children born out of the country were not the subject of the bastardy laws. COLERIDGE, J., gave a long judgment, and, having pointed out that the bastardy laws in their origin were designed to relieve the parish where the child was born of the obligation to maintain it, said (ibid., 773):

C “The legislature in all these statutes is obviously dealing with bastards born in some parish; that is, in this country. The word ‘bastard’ therefore has always been used by the legislature in a sense known to our law; and as denoting all the incidents which belong to the status of bastardy according to our law. If the word ‘bastard’ is, on the other hand, to comprehend any bastard born in any part of the world, an immense field of inquiry must be traversed respecting the status of children according to the different laws of different countries. On this ground, I am of opinion that this order is bad.”

D ERLE, J., said (ibid., 774):

“It is quite clear that our statutes relating to bastardy never contemplated the case of a child born a bastard in a foreign country.”

E Those judgments seem to me to lay down in the clearest possible terms—by a court of very considerable authority—that the bastardy laws of this country have no application where a bastard or a child appearing to be a bastard is born out of the country.

F Then comes R. v. Humphrys, Ex parte Ward (2), a case which in some respects is somewhat difficult to understand. The highest at which, it seems to me, that decision can be put is that the majority of the court considered that, if the applicant was an English subject and was domiciled in this country, she could obtain a bastardy order notwithstanding that she was actually delivered of the child out of the country. The odd thing is that BANKES, J., having laid that down, quotes the judgment of LORD DENMAN, C.J., in R. v. Blane (1) and says ([1914] 3 K.B. 1241):

G “The Lord Chief Justice meant that the case in question was clearly one in which the status of the child had to be ascertained according to French law, and that, even assuming that the magistrate had examined the law of France and ascertained that according to that law the child was a bastard, he still thought that the case was not subject to the bastardy laws. With that I entirely agree.”

H I can only think that the learned judge entirely agreed with that, having regard to the rest of his judgment, for one of two reasons. First, he may have taken the view he did because it had not been made clear in the affidavit on which certiorari was moved that the woman was not domiciled in this country and she was assumed to be a British subject. I think also that he may have meant that he agreed with R. v. Blane (1) because in that case the mother was a foreigner and was domiciled out of the country, whereas in the case which he was considering the mother was an English subject and domiciled in this country. LUSH, J., who agreed with BANKES, J., after saying that he could see nothing in the language of the statute to indicate that the Act did not apply, unless the child were born in England or Wales, went on ([1914] 3 K.B. 1243):

"If the mother domiciled and resident in England goes to Scotland and is confined there and then returns to the place where she was formerly resident, I see nothing to suggest that in that case the statute does not apply. On the other hand, there is much to indicate that the Act would not apply when the mother is a foreigner and the child is born abroad."

AVORY, J., dissented from that and said that, in his opinion, the case was entirely covered by the judgments in R. v. Blane (1).

The matter which impresses me is that the legislature, which must be presumed to have had knowledge of the decision in R. v. Blane (1), passed the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, but did not in any way purport to overrule the decision in R. v. Blane (1) or to make any provision that would have the effect of enabling the courts to distinguish R. v. Blane (1). I notice that they provided in the Act that the application could be made at any time within twelve months after the return to England of the man alleged to be the father of the child. That provision was not in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, so the legislature were considering the case of one parent returning to this country and providing for what was to happen if the father were out of England and within what time after his return an application could be made. No provision was made with regard to the mother who was out of England when the child was born, and no right was given to her to apply to the court on her return.

In my opinion, R. v. Blane (1) must be regarded as good law. It has never been reversed. The grounds on which it was distinguished in R. v. Humphrys, Ex parte Ward (2), do not exist in this case. Some day it may have to be considered whether the grounds on which it was distinguished are correct, and if so, which line of authority the court should follow, but that does not arise in the present case because the grounds on which the court distinguished R. v. Humphrys, Ex parte Ward (2) from R. v. Blane (1) do not exist here. Accordingly, in my opinion, quarter sessions were right in considering that they were bound by R. v. Blane (1), and this appeal must be dismissed.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

DONOVAN, J.: I agree. With diffidence, I would say that, in my view, R. v. Humphrys, Ex parte Ward (2) is not irreconcilable with R. v. Blane (1), if one bears in mind the difference in the facts. In R. v. Blane (1) there was no question of the woman being domiciled here. She was a Frenchwoman, described as a native of France, whose domicile of origin was, therefore, presumably French. There was no evidence of her having acquired a new domicile of choice. Obviously, to my mind, a domiciled Englishwoman ought to have the right to apply because, as is pointed out in R. v. Humphrys, Ex parte Ward (2), she may have gone to France merely to hide her shame and to come back after the birth. In my view, she should have such a right, because under s. 3 of the Act of 1872 it must be ascertained whether the child is a bastard child. That means a bastard subject to English law. If the mother's domicile is English, English law applies to her personal status and also to that of her child, and, therefore, the child is a bastard within the meaning of s. 3. In the present case, the domicile of the mother is German, and so her child is not a bastard child within the meaning of s. 3. The appellant wants to show that the child is a bastard under German law, but, in my opinion, s. 3 contemplates no such inquiry.

Appeal dismissed; no order as to costs.

NOEMIJULIA STEAMSHIP CO., LTD. v. MINISTER OF FOOD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), July 10, 11, 12, 17, 24, 1950.]

Shipping—Charterparty—Loading—"Ready to load"—Stowage space occupied by bunkers—Mainmast and after derricks not in position.

A Under her voyage charter a ship was required to be ready to load a cargo of grain in bags or bulk by 6 p.m. on Dec. 27, 1948, the time specified in the cancelling clause (cl. 12). By cl. 6 of the charter the charterer was "to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer including 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc. (provided same are not occupied by bunker coals and/or stores)." By cl. 17 it was provided that the cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside at the charterer's expense and risk. At the time specified in cl. 12 the No. 3 lower deck hold (which was designed as reserve bunker space, but was capable of carrying cargo) contained bunker coal and the ship had no mainmast or after derricks, without which it might have proved impossible to load certain of the holds. In these circumstances the charterer claimed to be entitled to cancel the charterparty on the ground that the ship was not ready to load. The charterparty did not give the charterer the right to use any part of the ship's gear, or prescribe or permit the charterer to select the method of loading.

D HELD: (i) on the construction of cl. 6, the charterer was entitled to have the use of the No. 3 lower deck hold providing that it was not occupied by bunker coals; even if the hold was to be treated primarily as cargo space, the charterer had to establish that the coal therein was not reasonably required for the whole voyage; and he had failed to do so.

E (ii) to support his allegations of unreadiness by reason of the insufficiency of loading gear the onus was on the charterer to prove that at the cancelling date the ship was in such a condition that the shipowner would necessarily (and not merely that he might) be unable to comply with his obligation to load some cargo which the charterer was entitled under the charterparty to call on him to take on board at the first or some subsequent port, and that onus had not been discharged.

APPEAL by the charterer from an order of DEVLIN, J., dated Apr. 5, 1950, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 985, on a Special Case stated by an umpire.

The charterer, the Minister of Food, claimed to be entitled to cancel the charterparty on the ground that the ship was not ready to load at the time for loading specified in the option clause in the charterparty by reason of the presence of bunker coal in No. 3 lower deck hold and the absence of mainmast and after derricks. The shipowners contended that there was a right to use No. 3 lower deck hold for bunkers under the charterparty when reasonably necessary to carry sufficient coal for the whole voyage (and the charterer had not shown that it was not necessary), and that readiness to load did not involve the presence of gear which might in certain circumstances, but would not necessarily, be required. DEVLIN, J., upheld the shipowners' contentions, and awarded them damages assessed at £19,607 6s. 1d. The facts appear in the judgment of Tucker, L.J.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 24. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of DEVLIN, J., given on the consideration of an award stated in the form of a Special Case for the decision of the court under the Arbitration Act, 1934, s. 9 (1) (b).

In the arbitration proceedings the claimants were the Noemijulia Steamship Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called "the shipowners") and the respondent was the Minister of Food (hereinafter called "the charterer"). The claim arose under a charterparty dated Oct. 15, 1948, under which it was agreed that the steamship San George should proceed to certain Argentine ports, there load a full and complete cargo of wheat and/or maize and/or rye in bags and/or bulk and carry same to the United Kingdom. The charterer had cancelled the charterparty under an option clause in the charterparty whereby he was entitled to cancel it if the steamship was not ready to load at the first loading port ordered by the charterer by a specified date. The shipowners contended that such cancellation was wrongful and claimed damages. The umpire awarded that the San George was not ready to load by the cancelling time and that the charterer was entitled to cancel, but in an alternative award he assessed the damages at £19,607 6s. 1d., if the court should hold that the cancellation was wrongful. The learned judge upheld the alternative award for damages.

The charterparty, the material clauses of which are set out in para. 1 of the Case, is annexed thereto. I do not, therefore, consider it necessary to repeat them here. The umpire held that the ship was not ready to load at the material time, namely, 6 p.m. on Dec. 27, 1948, at San Lorenzo, on the River Parana, in two material respects. First, her No. 3 'tween deck and No. 3 lower hold contained bunker coal, and, secondly, she had no mainmast or after derricks.

With regard to the presence of bunker coal, the question largely depends on the proper construction of cl. 6 of the charterparty, which reads as follows:

"Charterers have the option of shipping other lawful merchandise, cotton, sugar, quebracho wood, quebracho extract, and distillery residue excluded. The charterers are to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer including 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc. (provided same are not occupied by bunker coals and/or stores)."

The umpire has found that both No. 3 'tween deck and No. 3 lower hold were designed as reserve bunker space, but that if not used for this purpose were capable of carrying cargo. The question at issue really concerns No. 3 lower hold as there was no evidence that on any view No. 3 'tween deck was not reasonably required for bunkers. So far as cargo carrying holds are concerned, it is, I think, well settled that as stated by LOPES, J. (1 Cab. & El. 311) in Groves, Maclean & Co. v. Volkart Bros. (1):

"A ship . . . must be completely ready in all her holds . . . so as to afford the merchant complete control of every portion of the ship available for cargo."

The argument for the charterer was that No. 3 lower hold is within the full reach and burthen of the steamer and that the proviso does not apply since it is confined to 'tween decks, shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc., which items do not include No. 3 lower hold. On this the learned judge said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 986):

- A "Counsel for the charterer argues that No. 3 lower hold is within the full reach and burthen of the steamer, and that the proviso does not apply since on its true construction it is restricted to 'tween and shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc., which items do not include No. 3 lower hold. I do not agree with this construction of the proviso and I think that in any event it is rendered ineffective by the presence of the word 'etc.' That word must bring in at the least other parts of the ship similar to 'tween and shelter decks, bridges and poop. The only general description which can be given of these spaces is that given by BRANSON, J., in Sociedad, etc. (Dreyfus & Co.) v. National S.S. Co. (2) ([1935] 2 K.B. 319), namely, that they are 'spaces which might in the ordinary course be used for bunker coals and/or stores.'
- C A reserve bunker space certainly comes under that description. It would, indeed, be curious if the proviso applied to all the 'tween decks and to such places as bridges and poop, while excluding a space specially designed as a reserve bunker space."

I agree with this construction. The word "including" is, I think, intended to embrace the enumerated spaces which follow within the ambit of the full reach and burthen of the ship, which expression standing alone is ambiguous and might be read as excluding or including the enumerated spaces. The word "same" must, I think, from its position refer either to the full reach and burthen plus the enumerated spaces or to the enumerated spaces alone. If it refers to both, No. 3 lower hold is clearly covered under one head or the other. If it refers only to the enumerated spaces, then I think No. 3 lower hold is included in "etc.", which is an expression apt for including in the spaces enumerated space sometimes used for cargo but often also used for reserve bunker coal and denominated in the capacity plan as "No. 3 reserve."

- On this construction, and assuming that No. 3 lower hold is to be treated primarily as cargo space, the question arises whether the presence of coal was reasonably required for the voyage. As to this, the learned judge has held that
- F the onus is on the charterer, who seeks to cancel, to show that it was not reasonably required for the whole voyage, and that he does not discharge this burden by showing that the quantity was in excess of that which was required to reach the first available coaling port at which he had liberty to call on the voyage. It was contended by the charterer that the learned judge had erred in placing the onus on him and that once the presence of coal was established in a part of
- G the vessel not exclusively appropriated to bunkers, the onus shifted to the shipowners to justify its presence. No authority for this proposition was cited to us, and it seems to me to be contrary to the principle that he who seeks to enforce a forfeiture clause, which in effect this is, must strictly prove the existence of all the matters on which he relies as justification of his conduct, and in my view DEVLIN, J., rightly placed the onus on him. Furthermore, I think the
- H right test is what is required for the whole voyage. It is true that it has been decided that the shipowner is not in breach of the warranty of seaworthiness if the master has elected to divide his voyage into stages for coaling purposes and only carries sufficient coal to carry the vessel on its first stage (see The Vortigern (3)), but this doctrine is in relief of the shipowner's liability under his warranty that the ship is seaworthy for the whole of the charter voyage and cannot, in my view, be used as imposing on him an obligation, at any rate in the absence of any election on his part so to do, to bunker in stages. For these reasons I agree with the conclusion of the learned judge on this part of the case.

The second question is, I think—as DEVLIN, J., said—more difficult. The duty to load was by the charterparty on the shipowners, the charterer being required to bring the cargo alongside at his risk and expense. The charterer had the option to load in bags. The Case finds that after loading at the up-river ports, which could have been carried out without the ship's gear, namely, by means of elevator, chute or belt conveyor in case of bulk cargo, and by use of shore loading gear in the case of bags, the vessel, not being able to cross the bar at Martin Garcia with a full cargo, would have had to have completed the loading at ports below the bar, and such completion would have entailed the loading of some cargo in bags either by shore crane, if alongside, or by ship's gear from lighters in the river. Owing to a fire which had occurred on board the San George, the vessel had lost her mainmast and the after derricks attached thereto, and it had been decided to defer permanent repairs to the mast until the vessel's return to the United Kingdom. Consequently, she was unable to load by ship's gear into Nos. 4 and 5 holds. As already indicated, this gear would only have been required in the event of the vessel not being able to obtain a berth in port below the bar and consequently being compelled to load from lighters.

The Case finds at the end of para. 5 (ii) (a) as follows:

“There was no evidence before me which method of loading would have been used at San Lorenzo or elsewhere, or to which other ports in the permitted range the vessel would have been sent. Nor was there evidence before me whether the mainmast could have been re-erected after loading at San Lorenzo, with or without removing the part cargo, and, if so, with what delay.”

The concluding words are, I think, of first importance. The learned judge decided that the charterer was not entitled to cancel for this reason on the ground that the rule as to readiness to load applicable to cargo space ought not to be so stringently applied in the case of gear required for loading and that, on the facts found by the umpire, the ship was not proved to be unready in the business sense because of the possibility of her not being able to meet this somewhat remote contingency. I have reached the same conclusion though I would venture to express my view in slightly different language. It seems to me that there is a real distinction to be drawn between the cargo space and the gear. The charterer is entitled to the control of the whole of the cargo space from the outset of the voyage. His rights in this respect are stated in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, 2nd edn., vol. 30, p. 427, in these words:

“The ship must be ready to load, that is to say, the shipowner must be in a position to place the whole of the chartered space at the charterer's disposal.”

The loading gear had not to be placed at the charterer's disposal, and he had no rights with regard thereto, save in so far that it was necessary to enable the shipowner to perform his contractual obligations under the charterparty. Provided the shipowner was able when required to load any cargo which the charterer was entitled to tender to him alongside, it was a matter for him to decide by what means he would carry out his contractual obligations.

I am unable to draw the distinction for which counsel for the charterer contends between gear which is part of the ship's normal tackle and any other gear which may be required for what he calls “unusual cargoes.” He argues that the charterer is entitled to cancel if any of the “ordinary equipment” is not ready at the first loading port at the cancelling date even if it will not be required at that port or at any subsequent port. Alternatively, he contends that it must be ready at the cancelling date if it may be required at some future date to deal with some cargo which the charterer is entitled to load. As regards equipment for what he calls an “unusual” cargo, he was, I think, inclined to concede that he might not be entitled to require that this should be ready in the absence of notice that it would be required. On the other hand, counsel for the ship-owners contended that the charterer was not entitled to cancel unless he proved what kind of cargo he intended to load, in what form it was to be (for example, in bags or bulk), and in what way he intended to bring his cargo to the vessel. No authority relating to ship's gear was cited to us which supports to the full the contention of either side. In Sun Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Watson & Youell Shipping Agency, Ltd. (4), there is nothing to show that the court was concerned with any cargo except grain in bulk. For this purpose shifting boards were required in the holds. They were not all in position at the first loading port. It was held that she was not ready to load for the purpose of calculating the lay days. It is to be observed that the charterers in their contentions had argued that there was a distinction between the degree of readiness to load for the purpose of lay days and the degree of readiness required for creating their right to cancel. The case is no authority for the proposition that if the shifting boards would not have been required until the vessel reached a later loading port the fact that they were not in position at the first loading port would have been a good ground for cancellation. In Vaughan v. Campbell, Heatley & Co. (5) the charterparty provided for shipment of a full and complete cargo of wheat and/or flour in bags and/or other lawful merchandise. The ship was not at the cancelling date lined in the manner usual and necessary for the protection of a wheat or flour cargo. The charterers cancelled and it was held they were not entitled to do so. The case is very briefly reported, but it appears that LORD ESHER, M.R., based his judgment on the ground that the charterparty required the ship to be "ready" to load, not "fit" to load. COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ., however, added that the charterparty left it open to the charterers to load any kind of cargo and that many kinds of cargo would not require the ship to be lined. There was no evidence as to what kind of cargo it was intended to load, but the additional ground on which the lords justices based their decision negatives the idea that so far as equipment is concerned the shipowner has to be ready from the outset to deal with any kind of cargo which the charterer is entitled under the charterparty to call on him to take on board.

In Grampian S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Carver & Co. (6) the charterparty required the shipowners to provide the necessary mats for a cargo of cotton, seed, wheat, beans, maize or other grain. DAY, J., decided that it was not obligatory on the shipowners to have the mats laid down in order to be ready to load, but it was sufficient if they had the mats ready to lay if required and that the charterers were not entitled to cancel. In Armement Adolf Deppe v. John Robinson & Co., Ltd. (7), in dealing with the question of readiness to discharge, SWINFEN EADY, L.J., said ([1917] 2 K.B. 207):

"It is the duty of the merchants to co-operate with the owners in the receipt of cargo, and upon the facts I am satisfied that the only reason why the ship did not take on board the gang and rig the gear to fulfil the owners' duty in discharging was that the receivers were not desirous of receiving the cargo at the buoys, and so were not willing to co-operate in her discharge there and made no preparations for doing so. The ship was lying at a waiting berth, her voyage being ended; it would have been an idle form to take on board men and open hatches and make other preparations at the buoys when there was no desire or intention of the merchants to receive cargo until the ship was berthed at the quay. The ship was ready to discharge in a business and mercantile sense, and the idle formality of incurring useless expense was not necessary as a condition precedent to the commencement of the lay days."

These observations are, I think, equally applicable to a case where the charterer is seeking to justify a cancellation on the ground of unreadiness to load.

In this state of the authorities I am of opinion that, in principle, a charterer, who has cancelled on the ground of unreadiness to load by reason of the insufficiency of the loading gear, in a case where the obligation to load is on the shipowner, and where there is more than one port of loading and different kinds of cargo which may be loaded at the option of the charterer, must at least prove that at the cancelling date the ship was in such a condition that the shipowner would necessarily be unable to comply with his obligation to load some cargo which the charterer was entitled under the charterparty to call on him to take on board at the first or some subsequent port. It is, in my view, not enough for him to show that at the cancelling date the shipowner may be unable to load some particular cargo. He must prove that he could not do so. In the present case the charterer failed so to do. There is nothing in the facts found by the umpire to indicate that the shipowner could not have devised some temporary equipment to take bags on board from lighters in the unlikely event of his being required to load in this manner. For these reasons I agree with the judgment of DEVLIN, J., and would dismiss this appeal. A B

COHEN, L.J. (read by ASQUITH, L.J.): I am of the same opinion. The charterer seeks to justify his notice of cancellation on two grounds: (i) the fact that bunker coal was at the material time to be found in No. 3 'tween deck and No. 3 hold; and (ii) the fact that at the material time the mainmast was cut away and two wooden derricks dismantled and out of use. I do not desire to add anything to the reasons given by TUCKER, L.J., for thinking that DEVLIN, J., reached the right conclusion on the first point. I also agree with what my brother said on the second point, but as, like DEVLIN, J., I find it more difficult, I will state shortly in my own language my reasons for my conclusions. C

Counsel for the charterer urged that there was no difference in principle between the requirements as to cargo space and those as to ships' gear. The authorities establish that "the ship" must be completely ready in all her holds so as to afford the charterer complete control of every portion of the ship available for cargo: see Groves v. Volkart (1). So, said counsel, any portion of the ship's gear—or at any rate of its ordinary gear—which might be required at any loading port for loading any cargo which the charterer was entitled to bring alongside must be ready when notice of readiness is given, and if it is not, the charterer is entitled to give notice of cancellation. I am unable to accede to this argument. I agree with the learned judge that there is a difference, if not in principle, at least in the application of the principle between space in the hold and readiness of ship's gear. The charterer is responsible for bringing the goods alongside, but the method of loading the goods when brought alongside is a matter for the shipowner. As the learned judge said, some of the ship's gear may not be required at all, some of it may not be needed until an advanced stage of the loading, and the keeping of it in constant readiness from the first moment to the last may involve labour and expense unnecessarily without any advantage to the shipowner. D E

Where a charterer gives notice of cancellation, the onus is on him to prove the existence of a state of circumstances which justify him in giving such a notice. As regards ship's gear, I do not think he discharges that onus by proving that a part of the gear was not available at the first port of loading if it is established, as in substance it was in the present case, that it could not be required for use at that port; nor do I think that the mere fact that it might be required at a subsequent loading port is enough to discharge the onus of proof which rests on the charterer or shift it to the shipowner. The charterer must, I think, at least prove that it might be required at the subsequent port and that it or a substitute for it would not be available if required. Like the learned judge, I derive some support from the cases which he cited. If the strict rule which counsel for the charterer advocated was in fact the law, it seems to me that the charterer would have been entitled to succeed in Vaughan v. Campbell, Heatley & Co. (5), since wheat was a permitted cargo and the ship was not lined to receive it. Counsel F G H for the charterer relied particularly on Sun Shipping Co., Ltd v. Watson & Youell Shipping Agency, Ltd. (4), but in that case the shifting boards were required at the first port of loading and it was found that some were not available. Moreover, the question at issue was when lay days commenced. Had the issue been as to the validity of a notice of cancellation, and had the charterers sought to rely on the fact that shifting boards were required at a second port of loading, I do not think they would have succeeded without proving that probably the shifting boards would not be available on arrival at that port.

If I have correctly stated the law, it necessarily follows that the learned judge reached the right conclusion, since the arbitrator has found that there was no evidence to prove the material fact that the loading gear would have been defective when required: see para. 5 (ii) (a) of the award. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J: I agree entirely with both the judgments, and do not think it necessary to add anything of my own.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

D HARTWELLS OF OXFORD, LTD. v. BRITISH MOTOR TRADE ASSOCIATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), July 26, 27, 1950.]

Sale of Goods—Non-delivery—Delivery to be within reasonable time—Refusal by manufacturer to supply dealer except subject to conditions regarding sale by dealer unacceptable by purchaser—Liability of dealer.

The plaintiffs, motor car dealers, were members of the British Motor Trade Association, the object of which was to "protect the interests of the motor trade and safeguard the purchasing public against unfair treatment and discrimination." As from Jan. 1, 1946, the system whereby a government permit containing a condition against re-sale was necessary for the purchase of a new motor car came to an end, and on Aug. 15, 1946, to meet the difficulties caused by the shortage of cars, the association brought into operation a rule that no member should sell or deliver a new motor car without obtaining a covenant by the purchaser to use it for a period of six (and, later, twelve) months for his private, professional or trade purposes only, and not to re-sell, hire, or give it away during that period. Between Jan. 1, 1946, and Aug. 15, 1946, contracts between the plaintiffs and their customers contained the following terms: "1. The purchaser agrees to the 'conditions of sale' of the manufacturers of the car as incorporated in the lists issued by them. 2. The seller will use his best endeavours to secure delivery of the goods on the date agreed, but he shall not be liable for any damages, or claim of any kind, which may arise in case of delay." No date was ever agreed, and the contract contained no covenant by the purchaser against re-sale. From Aug. 15, 1946, until July 6, 1950, the plaintiffs introduced into their contracts with their customers a covenant against re-sale in accordance with the association's rule. The agreement between the plaintiffs and the F. Motor Co., Ltd., motor car manufacturers, for the supply of cars to the plaintiffs contained inter alia terms (a) that during the currency of the agreement the plaintiffs were to remain members of the British Motor Trade Association and observe its rules, and that a breach by the plaintiffs of a rule of the association was to constitute a breach of the agreement; and (b) that the manufacturers should have the right instantly to terminate the agreement if the plaintiffs appeared on the association's stop list. Contracts between the plaintiffs and other manufacturers contained similar terms. On June 16, 1950, the F. Motor Co., Ltd. wrote to the plaintiffs informing them that delivery of cars to them was conditional on their enforcing a priority scheme when carrying out their contracts with their customers so that the needs of individual customers should be considered. On July 6, 1950, after the decision of the High Court in Monkland v. Jack Barclay, Ltd. ([1950] post, 715) the plaintiffs wrote to the association informing them that in future they would complete all orders for new cars in strict rotational order without following any system of priority and without requiring a covenant from the purchaser against re-sale, whether or not the order had been received before Aug. 15, 1946, when the covenant scheme came into operation. The association replied that, if the plaintiffs carried out their proposals, they might be put on the association's stop list, a course which would put the plaintiffs out of business. The plaintiffs sought an injunction restraining the association from putting them on their stop list for failure to carry out the priority scheme and to observe the association's rule in regard to the covenant against re-sale in respect of contracts made by them before the rule came into force, on the ground, inter alia, that observance of the scheme and the rule would involve them in actions by their customers for damages for breach of contract.

HELD: as no date for delivery was ever agreed by the plaintiffs in a contract with a customer during the material time, the contract was for delivery within a reasonable time, and that had to be calculated with regard to all the circumstances of the contract one of which was that, if the F. Motor Co., Ltd., refused to deliver except on the terms which they had laid down, the plaintiffs would be unable to deliver any car, within a reasonable time or at all, or (per JENKINS, L.J.) as each contract was for the sale of goods which were not yet in existence and were to be made by a third party over whom the plaintiffs had no control, the plaintiffs were not liable for any delay if the manufacturer refused to deliver a motor car to the plaintiffs except on conditions which the plaintiffs' customer was unwilling to accept; and, therefore, the plaintiffs were not entitled to the injunction as they had failed to show that they would be liable to their customer for a breach of contract if they failed to observe the rule in regard to the covenant against re-sale and the manufacturer's condition in regard to the system of priority.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs, motor car dealers, from an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated July 19, 1950, whereby he refused to grant an injunction restraining the defendants, the British Motor Trade Association, from putting the plaintiffs on the "stop list" if they failed to observe (a) a system of priorities on the sale of motor cars, and (b) a rule of the association requiring the purchaser of a new car to enter into a covenant against re-sale for a specified period. The plaintiffs, who were members of the association, contended, inter alia, that their agreement to be bound by the rules of the association must be held subject to an implied term that they were not, by any retrospective alteration of the rules, to be compelled to commit breaches of contracts lawfully entered into by them before such alteration, and that, by putting them on the stop list, the association would be committing a breach of that implied term. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Shelley, K.C., and J. Brewis for the plaintiffs.

Pritt, K.C., and Aldous for the defendants.

A SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of DANCKWERTS, J. The plaintiffs are Hartwells of Oxford, Ltd., who carry on the business of dealers in motor cars, and the defendants are the British Motor Trade Association, an association of which the plaintiffs are themselves members. The objects of the association, as stated at the beginning of their rules, are

B “... to encourage, promote and protect the interests of the motor trade and safeguard the purchasing public against unfair treatment and discrimination.”

How those objects are to be carried out is particularised in the words which follow. The plaintiffs seek an injunction against the defendant association which is, they say, threatening to put them on a “stop list”—which would, in effect, put them out of business—for carrying out their contracts with their customers. C DANCKWERTS, J., refused the injunction, and the plaintiffs appeal.

The trouble between the plaintiffs and the association arises in these circumstances. During hostilities, to acquire a new motor car the purchaser had to obtain a government permit, and the permits issued contained a condition against re-sale. When hostilities came to an end many applications for new cars were outstanding, and very many further applications were made with the result that it became impossible to deal with them under the procedure which had operated sufficiently well during hostilities. That system, therefore, was abandoned and came to an end, as from Jan. 1, 1946, under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Acquisition and Disposal of Motor Vehicles (Revocation) Order, 1945 (S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1577). It is clear from the evidence that it was contemplated by those D in the trade and by the government that a scheme would be devised and operated by the trade so that applications for motor cars could be dealt with to some extent according to their merits, and, in particular, so as to prevent persons from buying or getting cars, not because they wanted a motor car either for business or pleasure, but simply for re-sale. It was realised that motor cars were in short supply, and they remain in short supply. There were some figures showing that, E on the present allocation of cars to the home market, it would take many years to satisfy the orders which have already been received. On Aug. 15, 1946, the defendant association, which has been in existence for many years, brought into operation a rule, the present form of which—we were told that the original rule was similar in all respects to the present rule—is as follows:

G “No member shall sell or deliver a new motor car or new commercial vehicle to any person without obtaining from him a covenant duly executed in a form appropriate to the transaction approved and supplied by the association and subsequently lodging it with the association.”

Then the word “new” is defined. There was, therefore, a period (which has been called in this argument the inter-regnum) between the end of the statutory H permit scheme and the appearance of that rule in the rules of the association, and this appeal is concerned with orders placed with the plaintiffs during that period. We have before us a specimen of the form which the customer signed. It sets out the make of the car, and so on, and the terms and conditions, cl. 2 of which is:

“The seller will use his best endeavours to secure delivery of the goods on the date agreed, but he shall not be liable for any damages, or claim of any kind, which may arise in case of delay.”

Some argument was based on that clause, but I do not think that it is maintainable, because no date ever was agreed. I think that clause is inoperative, and the contract remains, therefore, one for delivery within a reasonable time. That form of contract contains no reference to a covenant.

After the rule came into operation the plaintiffs, in common with other dealers, introduced a form of order under which the customer undertook to sign a covenant against re-sale. We have a form of such a covenant before us under which the customer (as owner) covenanted with the association and (as a separate covenant) with the dealer that he would not within a period, initially of six months, later of twelve months "... without the consent in writing of the association which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld use the said vehicle or permit the same to be used for any purpose whatever other than for the private, professional or trade purposes of the owner so that (without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing) the owner shall not during the said period without the consent in writing of the association sell, give, pledge, hire (whether by way of hire purchase or otherwise) or otherwise deal with the said vehicle in any manner whereby the property therein is or may be transferred to any other person."

We are concerned, in the first place, with the orders placed in the inter-regnum. We are also concerned with orders placed after the inter-regnum in this respect. The broad issue that has emerged here is this. The association is seeking to enforce, not only the covenant scheme, viz., asking purchasers of motor cars to sign a covenant, but also, through the manufacturers and dealers, a scheme by which the needs of individual customers for motor cars are considered. The plaintiffs' contention is that under their contracts, whether made during the inter-regnum with no reference to the covenant, or whether made after the inter-regnum with reference to a covenant, they are bound to have regard only to the dates on which those orders were placed, and that the principle of "first come, first served" must be applied to their contracts.

The first point that was argued by counsel for the defendant association was that that was wrong. First, he submitted that in law there is no general principle applicable to those who sell articles by which they must supply the purchaser who gives his order on Monday before the purchaser who gives his order on Tuesday. Secondly, he said that in the circumstances of this trade—certainly at all material times—no such right to be dealt with in rotation could be implied. In fact, he submitted that the implications must be the other way. I will deal with this point later. I will now continue with the history, because I think that this case should be disposed of on another point, which counsel for the association put second. We have before us the agreement made between Ford Motor Co., Ltd., and the plaintiffs. It was common ground that this settled the legal position as between the parties at the material date, and was in a similar form to agreements made by other manufacturers with dealers. Clause 1 reads:

"The manufacturer during the term of this agreement agrees to sell and the dealer agrees to buy cars commercial vehicles chassis and parts (hereinafter unless specifically named called 'the products') upon the terms and conditions hereinafter provided."

Clause 20 (to which JENKINS, L.J., drew attention) reads:

"Nothing contained in this agreement imposes upon the manufacturer any obligations to accept any order for any of its products from the dealer or to deliver any of its products to the dealer."

Clause 30 is:

"The dealer agrees that during the currency of this agreement he shall be and remain a member of the British Motor Trade Association and shall be bound by and observe the objects bye-laws and rules of the said association in force from time to time. In the event of such breach by the dealer of any object bye-law and/or rule of the British Motor Trade Association such act shall also constitute a breach of this agreement and notwithstanding and in addition to any other provision hereof the matter may be dealt with by the British Motor Trade Association in accordance with the rules of the said association."

A Before I come to cl. 32 (d), which is also relevant, I will refer to a letter, dated June 16, 1950, which preceded Monkland v. Jack Barclay, Ltd. (1), a decision of HUMPHREYS, J., which led to the present proceedings. On June 16, 1950, Ford Motor Co., Ltd., wrote to dealers, including the plaintiffs, and, after opening paragraphs about public policy and what the government desire, and so on, it said:

B "The Ministry of Supply consider it essential that each case should be studied in detail by dealers before delivery is arranged and allocations to you are conditional upon this action being taken. The delivery sequence must be as follows."

A scheme of what may be called priorities is then set out. The first class of customers to whom delivery should be made are doctors sponsored by the C British Medical Association, and midwives sponsored by the Ministry of Health, and then there is a reference to veterinary surgeons. The letter goes on to say this, which I think is important:

D "It is imperative that you should take the greatest care to ascertain your customer's need, condition of present transport and other material circumstances, in order that you may be fully armed with all relevant facts to enable you properly to exercise the discretion entrusted to you. If, however, you feel you have entered into contractual obligations which run counter to this directive, you should refer the details of the order to us."

E The plaintiffs, with other dealers, were carrying out this scheme until the decision of HUMPHREYS, J., in Monkland v. Jack Barclay, Ltd. (1). In that case the plaintiff sued the defendant company for delivery of a Bentley motor car. The company refused to deliver it on some of the grounds raised in the present appeal. HUMPHREYS, J., decided in favour of the plaintiff and gave him damages, and that case is subject to appeal. After the decision in that case, the plaintiffs wrote to the secretary of the defendant association on July 6, 1950, saying:

F "In view of a recent High Court decision we have been considering in what order we should deliver new cars to our customers in the future and have decided to adopt the following course. All orders for new cars received and accepted by us whether before or after the date when the covenant scheme came into force will in future be completed by us in strict rotational order, G that is to say, the customer who placed his order first will be the first to receive delivery of the particular make of car he has ordered irrespective of whether he is prepared to sign a deed of covenant or not (except when he has expressly agreed so to do when giving the order) or whether he requires the car for his own use or for immediate re-sale. Moreover we do not intend to alter our list in any way to give priority to some customers, such as H doctors, who are in more urgent need of cars than other customers as we are advised that we are not entitled to discriminate in this manner."

That, of course, if carried out by all the dealers in the country, would, undoubtedly, have brought the whole scheme to nothing. It was agreed by counsel for the plaintiffs that that letter might be read as going further than he wished to go in suggesting that, even after the covenant rule had come into force, the plaintiffs were going to disregard the question whether they had stipulated for a covenant in the order or not. He asked leave this morning to amend the injunction which he claims, and obviously no one would object, because he was restricting what he asked for. A reply to that letter was sent on July 7, and was as follows:

"The proposals you put forward indicate a course of conduct that would be contrary to the objects and rules of the association. I must advise you that if you commit a breach of the rules the matter will be referred to the price protection committee which, if it finds that a breach of the rules has been committed, may insert your name upon the association's stop list."

The association's rule as to the stop list is:

"The secretary shall compile and maintain a record known as 'the stop list' containing the names of all persons placed upon the stop list under the provisions of these rules."

Then there is a further rule, r. 14, which says:

"No member of the association shall supply, directly or indirectly, any new or used trade goods (or, in a particular case the specified goods) to, or have trade relations in respect of any new or used trade goods (or, in a particular case the specified goods) with, any person whose name is placed upon the stop list except under a contract already existing which the member is, by law, obliged to fulfil."

That, I think, would indicate that being placed on the stop list would probably put a dealer out of business. Rule 3 (5), which deals with membership of the association, says:

"Any person elected to membership of the association shall be supplied with a copy of these rules and shall be deemed to have agreed to be bound by them."

Rule 28 reads:

"These rules may be amended by a two-thirds majority of the council, not less than ten being present in person; provided that no amendment by the council shall come into operation until fourteen days after notice thereof has been posted to members."

The price protection committee is dealt with in r. 17, which sets out the constitution of it, and r. 20 provides that any person aggrieved by the decision of the price protection committee shall have a right of appeal to an appeal committee appointed by the council.

After receiving the association's reply to their letter, the plaintiffs issued their writ and claimed an injunction "... to restrain the defendants whether by themselves their servants agents or otherwise from taking any steps with a view to having the plaintiffs' name placed on their stop list or from taking any other steps to prevent the plaintiffs from allocating new cars to their customers in the manner set forth in the letter of July 6, 1950."

Counsel for the plaintiffs contends that, as regards orders placed in the inter-regnum, the plaintiffs must deliver in rotation without demanding the covenant, and, as regards orders placed after that date, though he agrees that the covenant must be demanded, he also says that, under their contracts, the plaintiffs must deliver in rotation. He says that the plaintiffs are put in the dilemma that they have entered into a large number of contracts which have the construction for which he contends, and, if they are not allowed to do what they state in their letter, they will be sued by a large number of people, and may have to pay heavy damages. Therefore, they should be entitled to an injunction against the association to prevent it setting the price protection committee stop list procedure in motion. In my view, therefore, the plaintiffs have to show that they are in danger of being sued for breach of contract if they carry out the rules which the association are seeking to enforce, because if they are not breaking their contracts, no trouble will arise.

I will now deal with the order form current during the inter-regnum. The plaintiffs have undertaken to take reasonable steps to obtain a car in the first instance, and to deliver it within a reasonable time. A reasonable time for delivery cannot arise so long as they are unable to obtain one, and the suppliers, Ford Motor Co., Ltd. (and, we were told, other suppliers) are saying to them: "We will not let you have a car for any of your customers unless in dealing with your customers you carry out the rules of the association," one of the rules of the association being that the customer should sign a covenant not to part with it within a year. The suppliers are also imposing a condition, which they are, in my view, entitled to impose, in the broad terms of the letter I have read, as to considering each individual case and dealing with it.

This appeal, of course, inevitably raises the contractual position and the rights and obligations as between the plaintiffs' customers and the plaintiffs. Clearly those rights cannot be finally determined, so far as the customers are concerned, in these proceedings. This decision would not make res judicata any issue that might arise between a customer and the plaintiffs. Indeed, there may be circumstances in cases which have not in any way been brought to our attention to-day. Indeed, in Monkland v. Jack Barclay, Ltd. (1), there were some very special circumstances which, when that case goes to appeal and is decided, may or may not be relevant as distinguishing it from the ordinary type of case which counsel for the plaintiffs has put before us. We have, however, to decide whether the plaintiffs are in such jeopardy as to entitle them to an injunction. I think that the form of the Ford agreement and the letter of July 7 from the defendant association—prima facie, at any rate—would afford a good answer to the type of claim which the plaintiffs are contemplating and on which their application to the court is based. Clause 32 (d) of the Ford agreement is:

"The manufacturer shall have the right instantly to terminate this agreement . . . if the dealer shall at any time appear on the stop list of the British Motor Trade Association or if he sells or offers for sale or supplies directly or indirectly the manufacturer's products to any person or firm or any employee of any person or firm whose name appears on such stop list."

In view of that clause, I think that the plaintiffs' claim for an injunction fails, and, that being the strongest point of counsel for the association, I think it is right that I should decide this case on that point.

A great deal of argument was devoted to what I may call the contractual position under a contract of the kind which the plaintiffs made with their customers, having regard to the circumstances, but disregarding the fact that the manufacturer is now saying: "Unless you will enforce this scheme, you will not get any cars." If I have taken a right view of the documents, that point does not arise. This is one of those happy cases where counsel on both sides rely on the same authority, which is, in this case, Hick v. Raymond and Reid (2). That case decided that a reasonable time under a contract for unloading a ship, or, indeed, for other purposes, depends on the circumstances prevailing at the time. One does not, as it were, say: "Ordinarily you take a week to unload this ship, and, therefore, if you exceed a week, necessarily you are in default." The man who has undertaken to unload the ship is entitled to say: "There was a strike on, and I could not get any workmen for such and such a time." Counsel for the plaintiffs relies on the fact that LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., after stating the general principle ([1893] A.C. 29), says that the delay must not be due to any act or default on the part of the respondents. Counsel for the plaintiffs says that the carrying out of this scheme (where one is dealing with a motor car, and giving a doctor or a midwife priority over a customer who wants to buy merely to re-sell, or a customer who merely wants his car for pleasure, or who merely wants a better car to replace one that is in quite reasonable running order) is an act or default on the part of the dealer within those words of LORD HERSCHELL, L.C. What I would say first is that, when he was referring to the act or default of the respondents, LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., was, to my mind, plainly not directing his mind to the issue that has arisen in this case as between the plaintiffs and the association. I quite agree that the substance of the decision has relevance, but I am quite certain that LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., had in mind the ordinary case where, e.g., a defendant had failed to take reasonable steps to engage workmen, or to engage stevedores, though he knew that the ship was coming along at a certain time, or where he took men from one ship to unload another ship because he thought it would pay him to unload that ship first. If the matter ever arose—it may possibly arise and be dealt with to some extent in the Monkland case (1)—as between a customer who placed an order in 1946 for a motor car and a dealer who, without anything in the nature of the Ford contract to rely on, was seeking to say: “Motor cars being in short supply, and it being clear that certain people need motor cars to carry out essential duties for the State, as you are not one of those people I am in no way committing a breach of my contract with you if I put such people before you,” I think that there is a great deal to be said for the view that some such implication might well be made. I do not, however, find it necessary to express any opinion on that point. As we, in effect, have not to deal with rights as between customers and dealers, there being no customer before us, I think it desirable that, if there is a narrower ground on which the appeal can be decided, we should not express opinions on the wider issues involved.

That applies with even greater force to a third point which counsel for the association took. He submitted that, even if there was an express term in a contract that the customer should be supplied in rotation according to the date when he placed his order, it would in present circumstances be contrary to public policy to allow the customer to enforce that term or condition. He quoted to us statements on that general subject from the speeches in Egerton v. Earl Brownlow (3). I find it unnecessary, however, to express any opinion on that point, because I think that the point with which I dealt first disposes of this appeal.

DANCKWERTS, J., I think, disposed of it on a somewhat different ground. I think he took the view that, if the plaintiffs have entered into a contract with a customer, and are and remain members of an association and bound by its rules, and those rules compel them either to break a term of their contract with their customer, with the consequences which follow on that, or to break the rules of the association by which they have agreed to be bound, then they have put themselves in an unfortunate position, but that would not entitle them to an injunction against the association. I do not dissent from the reasons which DANCKWERTS, J., gave for his decision, but I prefer to rest my view that the appeal should be dismissed on the grounds which I have stated.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs, Hartwells of Oxford, Ltd., dealers in motor cars, are anxious to know what their position is, and that is the reason that they started this action, in which they claim an injunction. That injunction, as claimed, was, as SOMERVELL, L.J., has said, in wide terms, much wider than counsel for the plaintiffs put it when he asked for an amendment this morning. The defendants, the British Motor Trade Association, publish a little book in which their rules appear, and before their rules they state their objects:

“The objects of the association are to encourage, promote and protect the interests of the motor trade and safeguard the purchasing public against unfair treatment and discrimination, and for this purpose (a) to take such steps as may be deemed expedient to prevent price cutting or price inflation of trade goods.”

Everyone agrees that in taking the steps which they have taken they seek to promote the good of the motor trade and (apart from one consideration which counsel for the plaintiffs raised) that they are seeking to act in accordance with public policy and public weal.

After a judgment given in the King's Bench Division in Monkland v. Jack Barclay, Ltd. (1), a position arose which caused the plaintiffs to write the letter of July 6 to the defendant association, and which brought in reply the association's letter of July 7. [HIS LORDSHIP read the relevant terms of the letter, and continued:] I am not surprised that that letter was sent, in view of the wide terms of the letter of July 6. The plaintiffs thereafter commenced this action.

A It is clear beyond measure that in hearing and deciding this appeal we are doing so on the evidence before us and on nothing else. The case as put to us at first was that the plaintiffs were in the position either of being put on the stop list by the association or of committing breaches of contract, which would involve them in hundreds of thousands of pounds worth of damages. I am not satisfied, for myself, that that is the true position on the evidence before this court. It may be that the plaintiffs will have actions for breach of contract against them, but it is impossible to say without knowing the terms of each order which has been given to them and which they have accepted. Before us it was stated that their contracts for the supply of motor cars to customers were all on the same form, as exhibited. The two parts of that which were said to be of importance are cl. 1 and 2:

C "1. The purchaser agrees to the 'conditions of sale' of the manufacturers of the car as incorporated in the lists issued by them. 2. The seller will use his best endeavours to secure delivery of the goods on the date agreed, but he shall not be liable for any damages, or claim of any kind, which may arise in case of delay."

D There was no date agreed, and so it is said that the duty of the plaintiffs in this action was to deliver the car in a reasonable time. Counsel for the plaintiffs said that, if they did not deliver in ordinary rotation, they would have claims against them for damages for breach of contract which they could not well meet.

E I was attracted by the statement of counsel for the association in reply that, when one has to consider whether or not delivery under a contract of this kind, or of any kind, is given within a reasonable time, one must calculate the reasonable time by regard to all the circumstances of all the parties to that contract, and, furthermore, that in the circumstances of this case it could not be said that a reasonable time had elapsed if the manufacturer of the motor car can say, and does say, without any breach of contract, that he will not deliver except on conditions which the customer is unwilling to accept. In the course of his judgment SOMERVELL, L.J., referred to the form of agreement between Ford Motor Co., Ltd., and dealers who enter into arrangements for the supply of motor cars with them, and we were told that other manufacturers of motor cars have the same kind of agreement. In view of the terms of that agreement, it seems to me that, if a customer has in the inter-regnum given an order for a Ford motor car to the plaintiffs and brings an action against the plaintiffs for damages for breach of contract, the plaintiffs may well have a defence by reason of the fact that they are only able to get a Ford motor car delivered to them on the terms of their agreement with Ford Motor Co., Ltd., and it is open to the Ford company to say: "We will not deliver to you unless you comply with these terms or conditions, and we will not deliver to you unless your customer says he will enter into a covenant." There may be other considerations of which I know nothing, but that leads me to think that it is not shown in this case that the plaintiffs' position is so awkward as we were led to think at first it would be, if they did not succeed in getting an injunction. Furthermore, as far as I see, the injunction which is asked for now would not really help the plaintiffs. They would, indeed, be no better off if the manufacturer still refused to supply them with a car, so that the injunction, if granted, is the kind of remedy which would not be of help to them. That, I think, is another reason why the court should not grant it. The position at the moment is confused. As to what it would be if the court thought it right to grant an injunction, either in the terms originally asked or in the terms as now amended, I confess I have some doubt. I am inclined to think that in the motor trade generally it would make confusion worse confounded. I do not think that it would help the plaintiffs or be any solution to the difficulties generally. For those reasons, I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree and have very little to add. The plaintiffs are asking the court to interfere with the domestic procedure of an association of which they themselves are members, and to whose rules they have subscribed. It, therefore, behoves them to show, and to show with reasonable clearness, that what is proposed to be done by the defendant association will inflict some actionable wrong on the plaintiffs, notwithstanding that it is done in accordance with the express provisions of those rules. A

Counsel for the plaintiffs put the proposition of law on which he relied in two ways. First, he said that the plaintiffs became members of the association before 1946, and, no doubt, then agreed to be bound by the rules of the association for the time being in force. But, he said, their agreement so to be bound must be held subject to an implied term that the plaintiffs were not, by any retrospective alteration of the rules, to be compelled to commit breaches of contracts lawfully entered into by them before such alteration and involving no infringement of the rules as they stood at the time when such contracts were entered into. On that submission he founded the contention that, by putting the plaintiffs on the stop list, the defendant association would be committing a breach of the implied term. Secondly, he said that, if it was within the power of the association under the rules to compel the plaintiffs to commit a breach of contract in circumstances such as these, then the rules to that extent were void as being contrary to public policy. B

Of those two submissions it seems to me that the first is the stronger, and I confess that I personally am attracted by it, although it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to express any decided opinion. I thus, to some extent, part company with the learned judge, because he decided the case on the footing that the plaintiffs could not comply with the present rule without committing breaches of the contracts entered into before the new rule was passed, but, even so, felt it impossible to interfere. I am, as at present advised, disposed to think that, if it was clearly shown that breaches of antecedent contracts would inevitably be involved in complying with the rules as they now stand, then the proper course for the court to take might well be to grant an injunction. However, on the evidence before us I entirely agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., and SINGLETON, L.J., that the plaintiffs have failed to show that it is not possible for them to comply with the rules of the association as they now stand without committing breaches of the contracts in question. My Lords have stated fully the reasons for that conclusion, as to which I only wish to add this. Clause 2 of the terms and conditions of sale in the plaintiffs' form of order provides: C

"The seller will use his best endeavours to secure delivery of the goods on the date agreed, but he shall not be liable for any damages, or claim of any kind, which may arise in case of delay." D

It has been said that, as no delivery date is mentioned, that clause means no more than that delivery shall be in a reasonable time. With diffidence, I venture to suggest that this view of cl. 2 overlooks the fact that this was a contract for the sale of goods not yet in existence, and to be made by a third party over whom the vendor had no control. Reading cl. 2 with that in mind, I think there is force in the words: "The seller will use his best endeavours to secure delivery of the goods," even though no date for delivery is fixed. I think the effect of it is that the seller is to use his best endeavours to procure delivery of the goods by the manufacturers in a reasonable time, but is not to be liable for any delay. Construing the clause in that way, it seems to me to be reasonably plain, when one comes to look at the plaintiffs' agreement with Ford Motor Co., Ltd., that the plaintiffs, without any breach of contract, could refuse to deliver to a given E purchaser any vehicle supplied by the Ford company on conditions requiring (in effect) that the particular car in question must be delivered to some other purchaser, perhaps a purchaser who, in fact, placed his order at a later date than the first-mentioned purchaser. In that state of affairs there never would have been a vehicle available to fulfil the particular order, and the disappointed purchaser could not, in my view, contend with success that any breach of contract had been committed by the plaintiffs in failing to appropriate the car in question to his order, for that car would never have been delivered except on terms, in effect, that it was not to be sold to the disappointed purchaser. Accordingly, I agree that on the facts in evidence in this case the plaintiffs have failed to make out their claim, and, therefore, that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed. By consent, no order as to costs.

MONKLAND v. JACK BARCLAY, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Humphreys, J.), June 28, 29, 30, 1950.]

Sale of Goods—Non-delivery—Conditions in regard to sale by dealer imposed by manufacturer after date of contract between dealer and customer—Customer required to enter into covenant against re-sale—Refusal by customer to enter into covenant—Dealer's failure to deliver car—Liability of dealer.

In May, 1946, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendants, motor car dealers, for the purchase of a new Bentley motor car, for which he paid a deposit. It was a term of the agreement that: "The sellers will use their best endeavours to secure delivery of the goods on the estimated delivery dates from time to time furnished, but they do not guarantee time of delivery, nor shall they be liable for any damages or claim of any kind in respect of delay in delivery." On Aug. 15, 1946, the British Motor Trade Association made a rule that on the sale of a new motor car its members should obtain a covenant by the retail purchaser against re-sale within a period of six (later, amended to twelve) months. On Mar. 28, 1947, the manufacturers of Bentley motor cars wrote to the defendants saying that they had decided to adopt the association's scheme and that the supply of a new Bentley car would be conditional on the retail purchaser executing a covenant against re-sale. The plaintiff refused to execute the covenant on the ground that it was not part of his original agreement, and, as a result, the defendants failed to supply him with a car. In an action by the plaintiff for damages for breach of contract, the defendants contended (a) that, having regard to the circumstances, a reasonable time for delivery had not elapsed, and (b) that it would be against public policy to supply the plaintiff with a car without obtaining the covenant from him.

HUMPHREYS, J., found that a reasonable time for delivery had elapsed and the defendants were in a position to deliver the car, had they wished to do so, long before May 12, 1948, when the writ in the action was issued. He held that, as the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants had been entered into before the covenant scheme was in existence, the question whether it was contrary to public policy for the defendants to sell the car to the plaintiff without obtaining a covenant from him against re-sale did not arise, and, therefore, the defendants were liable to the plaintiff in damages for breach of contract.

Re HONE (a bankrupt). Ex parte THE TRUSTEE v. KENSINGTON BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), July 24, 1950.]

Bankruptcy—Effect on transaction by bankrupt—Payment by cheque before bankruptcy—Collection of money by payee's bank after bankruptcy—Bankrupt granted secured overdraft by bank—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 45, s. 47 (1).

On Oct. 4, 1949, H. was served with a demand note for rates in respect of the six months from Oct. 1, 1949, to Mar. 31, 1950. On Nov. 3, 1949, H. signed a cheque for the appropriate amount payable to the rating authority, which received it on the same day and gave a receipt for the money. On Nov. 4, 1949, at 11 a.m. the cheque was paid into the authority's bank. During the afternoon of Nov. 4, H. filed her petition in bankruptcy, and at or about 3 p.m. a receiving order was made against her and she was adjudicated bankrupt. The cheque in question was honoured by H.'s bank on Nov. 8, 1949. H.'s account with her bank was at all material times overdrawn pursuant to an arrangement made with the bank by H. under which the bank held security for advances made by it. The trustee in bankruptcy moved for an order to the rating authority to pay the amount received by it to him for division among H.'s creditors.

HELD: (i) the rating authority was not paid until the money was collected on Nov. 8, 1949, and, therefore, payment did not "take place before the date of the receiving order" within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 45, and so was not protected by that section.

Hadley (Felix) & Co. v. Hadley ([1898] 2 Ch. 680) and Marreco v. Richardson ([1908] 2 K.B. 584), distinguished.

(ii) as the payment by the bank constituted a loan by the bank to H., the money paid belonged to H. and not to the bank.

(iii) although the money was lent to the bankrupt by the bank at the time the cheque was met it could not be said that the amount so lent was an asset acquired by H. after the adjudication within s. 47 (1) of the Act of 1914 because the advance depended on H.'s credit, which existed before the bankruptcy, and the security given by her before that time, and so the transaction was not protected by s. 47 (1).

MOTION by the trustee in bankruptcy for a declaration that a sum of £55 5s. received by the Kensington Borough Council on or about Nov. 8, 1949, from the bankrupt formed part of the property of the bankrupt divisible among her creditors and vested in the trustee of the bankrupt; and also for an order that the borough council do pay the trustee the said sum of £55 5s.

Claude H. Duveen for the trustee in bankruptcy.

Dennis Lloyd (Muir Hunter with him) for the Kensington Borough Council.

HARMAN, J.: The debtor, a Mrs. Hone, was the rated occupier of certain property in London, and on Oct. 4, 1949, she was served by post with a demand note in the ordinary form by Kensington Borough Council in respect of the six months' rate from Oct. 1, 1949, to Mar. 31, 1950. The amount demanded was £55 5s. On Nov. 3 she wrote a cheque payable to the borough council for that sum. The demand note stated:

"Cheques, money orders and postal orders should be made payable to Kensington Borough Council and crossed 'Westminster Bank' and should not be made payable to any individual officer. Post-dated cheques cannot be accepted. Cash should not be sent by post unless registered . . ."

- A So one of the ways in which the borough council invited the ratepayers to satisfy the rate demand was by sending a cheque. This cheque was received by the borough treasurer on Nov. 3, and he gave a receipt for it in these words: "Paid, J. Deacon, Borough Treasurer, Nov. 3, 1949, £55 5s. 0d." The cheque was paid into the borough council's bank at 11 a.m. on Nov. 4, to the credit of the general rate fund. After 3 p.m. on the same day the bankrupt filed her petition in bankruptcy, there being no previous act of bankruptcy. She was made bankrupt at once, a receiving order was issued against her, and she was adjudicated on the same day. It appears that the bankrupt had some arrangement with her bankers, the National Provincial Bank at Colchester, whereby she was enabled to overdraw her account. What the arrangement was I do not know, but I shall
- C assume that the bankers entered into it for valuable consideration, viz., some security lodged with them, and that she had a right to draw against that security. In the ordinary course of the business of the clearing house, the cheque was not collected until Nov. 8, when it was honoured by the bank and the proceeds were credited to the Kensington Borough Council. The trustee in bankruptcy now moves the court for a declaration that this £55 5s. 0d. formed part of the property
- D of the bankrupt divisible among her creditors and vested in her trustee, and an order on the borough council to pay him that sum.

- Prima facie*, if this were a straightforward case of a person with money in the bank and money going out of that banking account after the date of the receiving order, that would be part of her assets paid to somebody else in defiance of the trustee's rights and he would be entitled to recover it, but it is said here that
- E there are three reasons why that result does not follow. First, it is said that, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 45, this payment was made on Nov. 3, when the cheque was received by the borough council, and not on Nov. 8, when the money was collected. Section 45, so far as relevant, provides:

- " . . . nothing in this Act shall invalidate, in the case of a bankruptcy—
- F (a) Any payment by the bankrupt to any of his creditors . . . Provided that . . . the payment . . . takes place before the date of the receiving order . . . "

- To say that a payment takes place is to use a vile phrase, but I must make the best of it. Did this payment "take place" before the date of the receiving order? On the face of it, it clearly did not. It took place on Nov. 8, when, for the first time, the Kensington Borough Council got the money into its coffers. It was not
- G paid before that date. The fact that it has now become the custom of the council to give a receipt for a cheque without qualification showing that only a cheque has been received cannot make any difference to that, but counsel for the borough council drew my attention to two cases which he said showed that, under the general law, payment by cheque of a debt or obligation is made when the cheque is handed to the payee and not on the date when the money is collected, and,
- H therefore, "payment" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 45, takes place when a cheque is received and not on the later date.

In Hadley (Felix) & Co. v. Hadley (1) the defendant sold to the plaintiff company, among other things, "all book and other debts due to the vendor" in connection with his business at such and such a date, and it was held—and I think inevitably held—that cheques which he had received on that date were not debts due to the vendor in connection with the business, because he, having received the cheques, on the true construction of that agreement had received payment of the money, but BYRNE, J., does make this observation ([1898] 2 Ch. 682):

"I think the true view of this agreement is that where debts were paid conditionally or unconditionally, then such debts were not meant to pass to the purchasers. In this case I think what took place amounted to a conditional payment of the debt; the condition being that the cheque or bill should be duly met or honoured at the proper date. If that be the true view, then I think the position is exactly as if an agreement had been expressly made that the bill or cheque should operate as payment . . ."

That, of course, is confined strictly to the construction of that agreement, and, if I may say so with great respect, it was inevitable that the conclusion should be reached that the position was the same as if there had been an express agreement that any bills or cheques in the vendor's hands at the relevant date should be considered to be debts paid and not moneys due. Therefore, it does not seem to me that that decision helps me at all.

Marreco v. Richardson (2), which is said to be of more general purport, turned on a question under the Statute of Limitations. In that case there was a handing over of a cheque in part payment, and the question arose whether the promise to pay the balance to be implied by the part payment by the cheque was made on the date when the cheque was handed over or on the date when it was cashed. It seems to me clear that the promise to pay was made on the earlier date and it was from that date that the Statute of Limitations must run and not from the later date when the post-dated cheque was honoured, but FARWELL, L.J., made some observations which may be said to be near this case. He says ([1908] 2 K.B. 592):

"There is no doubt the cheque was given in part payment of the debt, and if it was so given in due time, that is, within six years of the commencement of this action, the case is taken out of the statute; if not, the debt is statute-barred."

Then he quotes a case before PATTESON, J., Pearce v. Davis (3), and adds (ibid., 593):

"... the payment is made at the time when the cheque is given, and I infer from the judgment of PATTESON, J., that the giving of a cheque would support a plea of payment."

He refers with approval to BYRNE, J.'s decision in Hadley v. Hadley (1), and says (ibid.):

"... I should myself prefer to say that the giving of a cheque for a debt is payment conditional on the cheque being met, that is, subject to a condition subsequent, and if the cheque is met it is an actual payment ab initio and not a conditional one."

On that it is argued that in the present case the cheque was met and, therefore, there was an actual payment ab initio, namely, before the bankruptcy.

I cannot take that view as between the trustee in bankruptcy and the bankrupt. It may be that, as between debtor and creditor, in certain circumstances that might be so. In both Hadley (Felix) & Co. v. Hadley (1) and Marreco v. Richardson (2), the ratio of the decision was that the promise to pay was what counted, but I cannot think that in the present case the borough council did receive payment when the piece of paper passed to it. It got the money when it was the richer by £55. It is quite true the council could not have sued for the money, having accepted the cheque, until the cheque was dishonoured. Nevertheless, it was not till the council collected it that it was paid. At that time the receiving order had been made, and, therefore, s. 45, I think, does not apply, because there was no payment before the date of the receiving order.

Next there is taken a point which is formidable. This debtor was overdrawn, and, therefore, it is said, the money with which the debt was paid was, not her money, not her asset, but the bank's money. In my judgment, that is not right. A payment by a bank under an arrangement by which the customer has an overdraft is a lending by the bank to the customer of the money. The customer pays the money, not the bank. Otherwise, in certain circumstances which might arise, the bank might be able to sue for the money, which they clearly could not do. They have only paid the money as agent for the customer just as if her account was in fund. Therefore, the money paid was, in my judgment, the bankrupt's money.

Thirdly, however, it is said that this is a transaction by the bankrupt with a person dealing with her bona fide and for value in respect of property acquired by the bankrupt after the adjudication within s. 47 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. It is said that the bank never had this £55 5s. 0d. in the bankrupt's account until after the adjudication, because the bank did not lend it to the bankrupt until Nov. 8. The answer to that is that there was an asset of the bankrupt's, namely, the state of her credit in her account with the bank, which existed before the bankruptcy, and the security given to the bank before the bankruptcy, and, by appropriating this money to their arrangement with the bankrupt, the bank merely decreased another asset, namely, the value of the security charged by the bankrupt with which, in other circumstances, his creditors might have been paid.

I hold, therefore, that neither s. 45 nor s. 47 (1) applies, and that what seemed to be the prima facie view of the case turns out in the end to be the right one, viz., that this was a payment by the bankrupt after the date of the receiving order and that the trustee is entitled to say that an asset of the bankrupt was paid away without his authority so that he is entitled to recover it. I, therefore, order the borough council to pay the trustee the sum of £55 5s. 0d. with costs.

Order accordingly.

JOYCE v. BOOTS CASH CHEMISTS (SOUTHERN), LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), July 11, 12, 13, 1950.]

Factory—Chemist's shop—Staff comprising manager, dispenser, assistants and porter—Porter alone employed in manual labour—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 151 (1).

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants, who were multiple shop chemists, as a porter in one of their branch shops, the staff of which comprised, in addition to the plaintiff, the manager, a dispenser, and three shop assistants. The ground-floor of the premises consisted of a chemist's shop with a dispensary which was separated from the rest of the shop by a partition. A flight of stairs led up to the first floor consisting of the stockroom and another room. The plaintiff's duties included loading and unloading vans, carrying goods and bottles up and down the stairs, cleaning floors and windows, and weighing out soda, soap powder and other similar commodities in convenient quantities for sale to customers. While carrying a box of bottles from the stockroom along the passageway leading to the stairs the plaintiff tripped over a piece of linoleum on the top stair and fell and sustained injuries. In an action for damages against the defendants for breach of statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937.

HELD: the shop was not a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 151 (1) as (a) the manager, the dispenser, and the shop assistants were not persons "employed in manual labour" within the meaning of s. 151 (1) of the Act of 1937 (Bound v. Lawrence ([1892] 1 Q.B. 226), applied), and (b) while the porter was employed in manual labour "in a process"—a phrase which was used in s. 151 (1) of the Act of 1937 as equivalent to "in an activity" (definition of "process" in Ward v. Coltness Iron Co., Ltd., 1944 S.C. 318, adopted)—for or incidental to the purposes specified in s. 151 (1) (a) and (c), his manual labour was incidental only to the purposes for which the shop was used.

ACTION for damages for breach of statutory duty and for negligence.

The plaintiff was employed as a porter by the defendants, who were multiple shop chemists, at their branch at 275, High Road, Leytonstone. The ground floor of the premises consisted of an ordinary chemist's shop, with a dispensary in one corner separated from the rest of the ground floor by a partition. A flight of stairs led up to a half landing where there was a tea-room for the female staff. Three stairs led from the landing to the first floor, comprising a stockroom and tea-room for the male staff. There was no handrail on either side of the three stairs and each of the three stairs was covered by a rectangular piece of linoleum. The dispensary was used for dispensing medicines and for making ointments and pills. The stockroom held bottles of preparations for use in the dispensary, which had to be cleaned from time to time and which were then taken from the stockroom to the dispensary. Certain commodities in common use, such as soda, were weighed and put into containers of various weights for retail sale. The cleaning and carrying of the bottles to and from the dispensary, the measuring out of the soda, and the packing of it into containers formed part of the regular duties of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's duties also included the loading and unloading of packing cases from vans, unpacking goods and carrying them up and down the stairs, and the cleaning of floors and windows. The staff of the shop consisted of the manager, who was a member of the Pharmaceutical Society, a dispenser, three female shop assistants, and the plaintiff.

On Dec. 4, 1948, the plaintiff, while walking along the passageway carrying a case of bottles, caught the toe of his left foot in the linoleum on the top stair of the flight of three stairs. He tried to save himself by letting go of the box and clutching at the wall, but his hand slid along the wall and he fell down the three stairs with the case and suffered injuries. The damages sustained by the plaintiff as a result of the accident were assessed by SLADE, J., at £764 16s. The plaintiff contended that the shop was a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 151 (1), and that the accident was caused by a breach of the defendants' statutory duties under s. 25 (1) and (2), and s. 26 (1), of the Act, or, alternatively, by their common law negligence as his employers. The defendants denied that the premises were a factory within the meaning of s. 151 (1) of the Act of 1937, or, if the premises were a factory, that they had been guilty of any of the breaches of statutory duty alleged, or of negligence.

J. G. K. Sheldon for the plaintiff.

R. M. H. Everett for the defendants.

SLADE, J., stated the facts and continued: The plaintiff bases his case on two distinct grounds: first, on breach of statutory duty, i.e., contravention of the provisions of s. 25 (1) and (2) and s. 26 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and secondly, on negligence by the defendants at common law. Having regard to the provisions of s. 25 (2), it is necessary for me to decide whether or not these premises are in law a factory.

In the first place, it is clear that the Factories Act, 1937, applies only to premises which are a factory as defined by that Act: see s. 149. The definition of a factory is contained in s. 151, and for the purposes of the Act of 1937, that definition bears no relation to the dictionary or colloquial definitions of a factory. By s. 151 (1), any premises are a factory for the purposes of the Act in which . . . persons are employed in manual labour in any process for or incidental to any of the purposes specified in paras. (a), (b) and (c) of the subsection. Therefore, to constitute premises a factory, they have to fall within both limbs of the definition in s. 151 (1), i.e., there must be (i) persons employed in manual labour in some process, and (ii) that process must be for or incidental to one or more of the purposes specified in paras. (a), (b) and (c).

I will deal with the second limb first. Paragraph (a) refers to "the making of any article or of part of any article," and (c) to "the adapting for sale of any article." It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the making of pills and ointment and the dispensing of doctors' prescriptions (which are admitted activities of the defendant's shop) constitute the making of an article and/or the adapting for sale of an article. I will assume, without deciding the point, that that contention is right and that, therefore, there are carried on at this shop premises processes for or incidental to the purposes mentioned in paras. (a) or (c), or both of them. Making that assumption in favour of the plaintiff, these premises become factory premises within the definition if, but only if, persons are employed in them in manual labour in any process for or incidental to either of the purposes which I have assumed to exist. Under the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 1 (1), not only does the singular include the plural, but the plural includes the singular, and, therefore, the word "persons" would include "person".

As to the word "process" in the first part of s. 151 (1), in Ward v. Coltness Iron Co., Ltd. (1) LORD MONCRIEFF, dealing with s. 151 (1) of this Act, said that he read the words "in any process" as used in the section as equivalent to "in any activity". He said (1944 S.C. 324):

"I do not think these words mean 'process' in a technical sense, seeing that 'processing' in such a sense is covered by the later words of the definition which deal with the 'making, altering or repairing of articles'."

I respectfully adopt that meaning of the word "process", and, in any event, it is safer in the present case for me to assume that "process" includes "any activity". With regard to the words "in manual labour", normally there were six persons employed at this shop. First, there was the manager, who is a member of the Pharmaceutical Society. I decide that he was not engaged in manual labour. Then there were the three shop assistants. I think that Bound v. Lawrence (2) shows that a shop assistant is not engaged in manual labour. That was a decision under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. The definition of a person engaged in "manual labour" in the Act of 1875 has also been applied to cases arising under the Truck Acts. I appreciate that there are differences in the wording of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, s. 10, and s. 151 of the Act of 1937. Section 10 of the Act of 1875 enumerates certain trades and ends with the words "or otherwise engaged in manual labour", and I appreciate that those words might have to be construed with what has gone before. Bound v. Lawrence (2) is a binding authority on me only in respect of the language of the statute on which it was decided, but I derive considerable assistance from that case. I find, so far as it is a question of fact, as a fact, and so far as it is a question of law, as a matter of law, that none of the three shop assistants was engaged in manual labour. I find that the plaintiff was engaged in manual labour and, therefore, the only remaining person is the dispenser.

The only evidence about him is that he dispenses medicines from doctors' prescriptions and that he makes pills and ointments. It is in considering him that I desire to refer to passages in the judgments of LORD ESHER, M.R., and FRY, L.J., in Bound v. Lawrence (2). LORD ESHER said the question which arose in the case before him as stated by the magistrates was whether the appellant could be said to be engaged in manual labour within the meaning of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. He continued ([1892] 1 Q.B. 228):

"It seems to me that the decision in Morgan v. London General Omnibus Co. (3) assists us to this extent, that it shews that we must not look at what the appellant may do incidentally in the course of his employment, but must see what is his real and substantial work. Now, I take it that if we examine this case it appears that the appellant was employed as a grocer's assistant in a shop, and his business was to take orders from the customers and to carry them out. In doing this he may have to shew goods, and if the customers take away the goods he has to make up the parcels. In doing this he has to use his hands, and the question is whether that makes him a manual labourer. There can be no manual labour without user of the hands; but it does not at all follow that every user of the hands is manual labour, so as to make the person who does it a manual labourer."

After dealing with what he said was the substantial employment of the shop assistants in that case, the learned Master of the Rolls said (ibid., 229):

"If the mere user of the hands in matters incidental to a man's employment is to constitute him a manual labourer, it would extend the Act to every shop-assistant in every shop, great or small, which cannot have been the intention of the legislature."

FRY, L.J., said (ibid.):

"It is to be observed that it is difficult to imagine any work done by man so purely intellectual as to require no kind of work with the hands; and the converse is equally true, that there can hardly be work with the hands that requires no intellectual effort. If, then, the words 'manual labour' are to have the full significance which could be put on them, they would be extended to every kind of employment. That cannot be the true meaning of the statute, but some more confined interpretation must be arrived at. I agree that this must be done by looking to the nature of the substantial employment, and not to matters that are incidental and accessory. The determination of what is substantial and what accessory may be a question of difficulty; but, in my view of this case, the appellant was not engaged in manual labour."

Applying that criterion (which I do apply notwithstanding the difference in phraseology between the two statutes) to the dispenser in the present case, I find as a fact that, in view of the skill which he employs in dispensing, the knowledge which he must have to enable him to carry out the instructions contained in the prescriptions, the care he has to exercise in seeing that the prescription is accurately dispensed, and so on, the intellectual part of the work is the substantial or dominant part and the use of the hands is purely subsidiary, or, to use the word in Bound v. Lawrence (2), "accessory." I find, therefore, that the dispenser in this shop was not employed in manual labour.

A The upshot of these findings is that of the six persons normally employed in the shop one, namely, the plaintiff, was employed in manual labour and five were not. Again applying the Interpretation Act, 1889, and saying that "persons" includes "person" and bearing in mind that "process" means nothing more than "activity" and that the words are "for or incidental to any of the purposes," notwithstanding what I have said it would appear at first sight as though this shop fell within the definition, because it could be said that it is premises in which one person is employed in manual labour in some activity incidental to one of the purposes specified in (a), (b) and (c) of s. 151 (1) of the Act of 1937—"incidental" because at the very time of the accident what was B the plaintiff doing but carrying down a two-foot box of bottles to the dispensary to enable them to be filled by the dispenser, and, if making prescriptions or ointments is an activity, as indeed I have assumed, what could be more incidental to that than to provide the dispenser with a bottle without which he would be unable to dispense the prescription?

C I now have to consider whether there are any decisions, or any persuasive authorities—even if they do not bind me—which suggest that some restriction must be placed on the apparently all-embracing width of this definition. In that connection counsel for the defendants has referred me to Hoare v. Green (Robert), Ltd. (4), and, in particular, to a passage from the judgment of LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J. The facts are not important, but it was a Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate who had found that the respondents carried on the business of retail florists and that they employed a number of young women and girls whose duty consisted partly in serving the customers in the shop and partly in making up flowers into wreaths, crosses and bouquets and arranging floral decorations, for which purposes frames of wood or wire were sometimes used, in a room behind the shop. That case fell to be decided on the meaning D of the term "workshop" in s. 128 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The definition of "workshop" in s. 149 of that Act is in almost identical terms with the definition of "factory" in s. 151 of the Act of 1937. LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., in the course of his judgment, found that the activities of the shop in that case (as I have found in the present case) fell within the purview of the words in the Act of 1901 corresponding to paras. (a), (b) and (c) of s. 151 (1) of the Act of 1937. LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., continued ([1907] 2 K.B. 320):

F "I have had more difficulty in coming to a conclusion on the question as to whether this room is a place where manual labour was exercised by way of trade. It is, I think, clear that there must be some limit placed on the scope of these words, and I think that the question as to the limit is best answered by saying that, if the substantial purpose for which the place is used is the employment of persons in manual labour, then the Act applies. G On the other hand, if the place is only incidentally used for the purpose of manual labour—if, for example, the place is a shop and the manual labour is merely incidental to the general business of the shop—then different considerations would arise."

H That test I propose to apply in the present case. It seems to me to be almost fantastic to suggest that, merely because the plaintiff is employed as a porter at this ordinary chemist's shop, the shop becomes a factory, but would cease to be a factory the moment the plaintiff left. Counsel for the plaintiff suggested that, if the plaintiff left, it would be necessary to employ some other person to carry out the duties of a porter. That may or may not be so. I would expect some limitation to be placed on the apparently all-embracing width of the language of s. 151 (1), and I find that limitation expressed in the passage from the judgment of LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., in the case to which I have just referred. Emphasising the distinction, as I think LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., was emphasising it, between "persons", on the one hand, and "place", on the other, and taking the criterion which he posed, I ask myself: Are these shop premises premises which are only incidentally used for the purpose of manual labour or is that the substantial purpose for which they are used? I have no hesitation in answering that question by saying that manual labour, confined, as I find it to be, to the plaintiff as being the only member of the staff of six who is engaged in it, is a purpose incidental only to the substantial purpose for which the premises were used. In the result, therefore, I find that the shop premises were not a factory within the meaning of the Factory Act, 1937, s. 151 (1).

[HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence; held that, if, contrary to his decision, it was found that the premises were a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, there was no breach of statutory duty under s. 25 (1) or s. 26 (1) of the Act, and, though there was a breach of statutory duty in the failure to provide a hand-rail under the provisions of s. 25 (2) the plaintiff had not discharged the onus, if it was on him, of showing that the presence of a hand-rail would have prevented the fall or minimised the results of it; and found that there was no negligence on the part of the defendants in relation to the premises.]

WILLEY v. PEACE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Finnemore, JJ.), July 25, 1950.]

Arrest—Search—Metropolis—Police officer's powers—Suspicion of possession of stolen property—"Having or conveying" property in street—Search during voluntary visit to police station—Metropolitan Police Act, 1839 (c. 47), s. 66.

A police constable observed the appellant acting in a street within the metropolitan police district in a manner which was calculated to arouse suspicion and asked him what he was doing. In reply the appellant used obscene language and said he would go to the police station and complain of the constable's conduct. The two men walked to the station where the officer told the station sergeant what had occurred. The respondent, a detective constable, who was present and heard this account, observed that the appellant's pockets were bulging and that the appellant was trying to conceal it. The respondent asked the appellant what was in his pockets, but the appellant refused to say or to offer any explanation and the respondent then proceeded to search him. During the search the appellant resisted violently and assaulted the respondent. No stolen property was found, but the appellant was charged with assaulting the respondent in the execution of his duty and convicted.

HELD: a constable's power under the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 66, to "stop, search and detain . . . any person who may be reasonably suspected of having or conveying in any manner anything stolen or unlawfully obtained" was not confined to dealing with persons who were "having or conveying" something in the street; the appellant was conveying something in the course of a journey and the transit was not broken because he voluntarily entered the police station to lay a complaint; the respondent reasonably suspected that what was conveyed by the respondent had been stolen or unlawfully obtained; and, therefore, the respondent had been rightly convicted.

B CASE STATED by Middlesex Quarter Sessions.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Enfield on Jan. 23, 1950, the appellant was convicted of having on Jan. 18, 1950, at Chase Side, Southgate, assaulted the respondent, a detective constable of the Metropolitan Police Force, in the execution of his duty, contrary to s. 12 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, and was fined £5 and ordered to pay five guineas costs.

- C The appellant appealed to quarter sessions where it was contended on his behalf that the respondent was not acting in the execution of his duty within the meaning of s. 12 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, at the time of the assault, because he was engaged in searching the appellant by force and detaining him by force when he was not under arrest. It was also contended that there was no right at common law to search by force a person who was not under arrest and
- D that the respondent had no power to stop, search, and detain the appellant under s. 66 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, because the appellant was in a police station and was not conveying anything in a street at the time when the respondent formed the suspicion that the appellant was in possession of stolen property. The respondent contended that in the circumstances he had a duty to exercise the power of search granted by s. 66 of the Act of 1839. Quarter sessions
- E accepted the contentions of the respondent and dismissed the appeal.

Sir John Cameron for the appellant.

Thesiger, K.C., and J. C. Phipps for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In my opinion this case is very clear, and the appeal committee of Middlesex Quarter Sessions were right.

- F Shortly the facts were these. A police officer observed the appellant acting in the street in a manner which was calculated to arouse the suspicion of any police officer. The officer walked up to the appellant and asked him what he was doing, and so forth, and all the officer received in reply was obscene abuse. The appellant then said he was going to the police station to report the officer, and the officer walked with him to the station. The officer at that time only suspected the
- G appellant of being a person loitering with intent to commit a felony. Not knowing of any recent theft or housebreaking, he did not suspect him of being in possession of property unlawfully obtained or stolen. At the police station the respondent, a detective constable, heard the account which the police officer gave. He knew that the appellant had just come in from the street, he noticed that the appellant's pockets were bulging, and he saw the appellant doing things which
- H he regarded as an endeavour to conceal something. The respondent, therefore, asked him what he had in his pocket. The appellant would not say, and thereupon the respondent said: "Very well, I shall search you," and, as the appellant resisted, he was detained—there is no question about that—by the police while he was searched. He was not found to have any stolen property in his possession.

The question is whether anything unlawful was done? The matter seems to depend entirely on the construction of s. 66 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, which provides:

"... and every such constable may also stop, search and detain any vessel, boat, cart, or carriage in or upon which there shall be reason to suspect that anything stolen or unlawfully obtained may be found, and also any person who may be reasonably suspected of having or conveying in any manner anything stolen or unlawfully obtained."

Therefore, a police officer who suspects on reasonable grounds that a person is carrying something stolen or unlawfully obtained may, first of all, stop him, then search him, and then, if necessary, detain him. It is argued that that can only apply when the person is "having or conveying"—which are said to have the same meaning, and I think they have—something in the street. That is putting far too fine a point on it, as was shown in R. v. Fisher (1). That case followed Hadley v. Perks (2), in which BLACKBURN, J., in giving the judgment of the court, frequently used the expression "in the street," but what the learned judge was doing in that case, I think, was contrasting the powers of search where a person is conveying something with the powers where the goods are not being conveyed, but are in a house, warehouse, or other premises, in which case a search warrant must be obtained. A person does not cease to be conveying or having something in his possession if he has it when he walks along the street and then goes into a police station with the thing still in his possession and is going to walk out of the police station if the police let him go.

In my opinion, in the present case, as soon as the appellant entered the police station and the respondent formed a reasonable suspicion—and there is no question he had a reasonable suspicion—the respondent had power to search him. There was no necessity for him to say, in view of what took place here: "I reasonably suspect you of having stolen goods," because, if that point had arisen, I think the case would come within the exception which VISCOUNT SIMON mentioned in Christie v. Leachinsky (3), where he said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 573):

"The requirement that the person arrested should be informed of the reason why he is seized naturally does not exist if the circumstances are such that he must know the general nature of the alleged offence for which he is detained."

In that case the House was considering an arrest at common law and what was necessary at common law. The procedure under s. 66 is appropriate whether a crime has been committed or not and whether or not the police are actually going to arrest a person in the sense of taking him before a magistrate. They may take him before a magistrate if they find property on him which has been stolen or unlawfully obtained, and this section gives them power to stop, search and detain. It need not necessarily be in a street because a vessel or boat is not to be found in a street. This power is given where a person is carrying something, that is to say, is in the course of a journey. In the present case, the appellant was in the course of a journey. He went into the police station to make a complaint about a police constable, but that did not break the transit. He had still got the property on him. He had got it while he was in the street and in the police station. In my opinion, there was ample power to search him given by this section. The appellant knew perfectly well why he was being searched—there can be no question about that—and I think the police here acted strictly in accordance with s. 66. Therefore, the appeal committee and the justices at Enfield came to a perfectly right decision and this appeal fails.

LARNER v. FAWCETT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Singleton and Jenkins, L.J.J.), July 25, 1950.]

Lien—Enforcement—Sale—Jurisdiction of court to order sale where no right to sell at common law or in equity—R.S.C., Ord. 50, r. 2.

On Jan. 19, 1949, F. agreed with D. that D. should take F.'s filly on lease for a certain period on the basis that any money won in racing her should be equally shared and that D. should pay all expenses and have the right to purchase her at any time. D. agreed with L. that L. should train the filly. In October, 1949, F. learned that L. had the filly, and L. informed him that he had started an action against D. in respect of her upkeep. F. wrote to L. stating the facts and asking him to "hold the filly on behalf of" F. who would "be responsible for any expenses in connection therewith." On Nov. 9, 1949, F. wrote to L. that "I shall have to withdraw or modify" the request to L. to hold the filly on his behalf. L. obtained judgment against D. and on June 30, 1950, began an action against F. claiming, inter alia, a declaration that he was entitled to a lien on the filly in respect of its upkeep and an order that the filly should be sold, and on the same day L. filed a notice of motion asking for an order of sale under R.S.C., Ord. 50, r. 2.

HELD: rule 2 was not confined to cases in which the applicant had, apart from the rule, a right of sale at law or in equity, but conferred power on the court in the present case to order the sale of the filly, and, on the facts, it was proper to make the order claimed.

APPEAL by the respondent from an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated July 14, 1950, that a filly in the possession of the applicant should be sold unless the respondent paid £150 into court within ten days.

The applicant issued a writ against the respondent claiming (a) a declaration that he was entitled to a lien to secure payment to him in respect of the keep and/or training and/or veterinary expenses of a filly, belonging to the respondent, from February, 1949, to November, 1949, or until such later date as the court might determine; (b) an order for the sale of the filly; and (c) payment out of the proceeds of the sale of the amount due to the applicant in respect of the matters referred to under heading (a). The applicant gave notice of motion for an order for the sale of the filly, on which DANCKWERTS, J., made the order above stated. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Threlfall for the respondent.

Astell Burt for the applicant.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order made by DANCKWERTS, J., that a grey filly named Veloce, now in the possession of the applicant in the motion, should be sold

"unless the defendant on or before July 24, 1950, lodge in court to the credit of this action the sum of £150 as directed in the lodgment schedule hereto."

The filly was, and has remained, the property of the respondent to the motion. On or about Jan. 19, 1949, the respondent made an agreement with a Mr. Davis according to which Mr. Davis was to take Veloce on lease

"on the terms of half winnings to both parties, Mr. Davis to pay all expenses to train and insure against accident, Mr. Davis having the right to purchase at any time."

Mr. Davis, having got the filly into his possession, made an agreement with the applicant to look after and train her. Although there is no reference to this in the agreement between the respondent and Mr. Davis, we were told that it was in the contemplation of the respondent and Mr. Davis that the filly was suitable for training only for flat racing, though she might be used later as a brood mare. The applicant did not hold a licence to train horses for flat racing. From January to October, 1949, the respondent was unable to find out where the filly was, but he found that she was in the possession of the applicant on or about Oct. 24, 1949. He wrote to him a letter which we have not got, but we have a copy of the reply from the applicant's solicitors who say:

"We do not know if Mr. Davis has told you, but we have issued a writ against him on Mr. Lerner's behalf claiming the sum of £125 for keep of the filly. This action was dealt with in the High Court in London on the 24th instant when Mr. Davis was given leave to defend, provided only that he paid the sum of £90 into court by the 31st instant."

Mr. Davis did not pay the money into court, and judgment was entered against him for £125. A judgment summons was taken out against him and it was ordered that he should pay £1 a month, and he only paid the sum of £2. The letter goes on:

"Mr. Davis has treated our client very shabbily indeed. Our client has never hear of you prior to these present proceedings and was always under the impression that the filly belonged to Davis. Naturally, our client has a lien on the filly and is not prepared to part with her until his account and the costs of the proceedings have been paid."

The reply to that letter from the respondent's solicitor, dated Nov. 1, 1949, is of some importance and is in these terms:

"It is news to him [the respondent] that your client had had to sue Mr. Davis for the keep of the filly and he is somewhat astounded. The animal was leased to Mr. Davis on Jan. 19, 1949, and I send you herewith a copy of the memorandum relating thereto, which is in the handwriting of Mr. Davis. I have, of course, had to advise my client that your client, in the circumstances, has a particular lien on the animal, but I shall be glad if, when you obtain judgment, you will try to execute it otherwise than applying for an order for sale of the filly. Surely Mr. Davis has something upon which to levy. Thereafter it would be a great kindness if your client would hold the filly on behalf of my client who would, of course, be responsible for any expenses in connection therewith."

A question arose whether "thereafter" meant after he had obtained judgment, or after the period in respect of which the judgment for recovery of the charges was incurred, or whether it meant "after you have recovered the money from Mr. Davis" which might be never and it looks as if it is going to be never. I think the common-sense construction of this letter is that "thereafter" means after judgment or after the period covered by the judgment, so I read that letter as a clear expression by the respondent of his desire that the applicant should continue to keep the horse. It is said that that letter was written before the respondent realised that the applicant could not train for flat racing. It may be so, but it is a little odd, if the respondent attached so much importance to the training of the filly, that there is no reference to that in the letter.

On Nov. 9, the respondent's solicitor wrote this somewhat cryptic letter:

A "In view of the fact that I have given you notice as to whom the filly belongs, I anticipate that you will serve me with notice of any application for an order for the sale thereof, so as to enable my client to be present at the hearing. In the light of certain facts which have emerged since I wrote to you on the 1st instant, I shall have to withdraw or modify the fourth and fifth paragraphs of my letter of the 1st instant."

B The fifth paragraph was the paragraph in which he asked the applicant to continue looking after the horse, and this last sentence of the letter may have been designed to try to make the best of two worlds.

C There was further correspondence, but none of the letters after that date was relied on. The applicant pressed the respondent. In May, 1950, the applicant began an action in the King's Bench Division claiming from Nov. 1, 1949, to May 1, 1950, sums due, as was alleged, under a contract. Leave was given to defend, but the action was discontinued. The present proceedings were started on June 30, 1950. The applicant claimed a declaration

D "(a) That he is entitled to a lien . . . to secure payment to him in respect of the keep and/or training and/or veterinary expenses . . . from February, 1949, to November, 1949, or until such later date as the court may determine. (b) An order for the sale of the said filly. (c) Payment out of the proceeds of the sale of the amount then due to the plaintiff in respect of the matters referred to in (a) hereof."

On the same day a notice of motion was filed asking for an order that the filly should be sold. That is the order with which we are concerned.

E On that motion, DANCKWERTS, J., was asked to make an order under R.S.C., Ord. 50, r. 2, which provides:

F "It shall be lawful for the court or a judge, on the application of any party, to make any order for the sale, by any person or persons named in such order, and in such manner, and on such terms as the court or judge may think desirable, of any goods, wares, or merchandise which may be of a perishable nature or likely to injure from keeping, or which for any other just and sufficient reason it may be desirable to have sold at once."

G The points taken in this court are three. First, it was submitted as a matter of law that a common law lien such as is claimed by the applicant in this case confers no right of sale. I would accept that. It was then said that Ord. 50, r. 2, cannot be construed as conferring a right of sale on a party who at law, or in equity, or law and equity combined, as they are, has no right of sale. That submission seems to me to fail in principle, because, if the party has a right of sale under his lien or under some other procedure, the rule would be unnecessary. Also the rule does not seem to me to be directed to that type of question. In construing it I think it is important to bear in mind that it refers primarily to goods of a perishable nature. In the course of the argument I gave an instance which seems to me as good as any other. One imagines goods which are claimed by A and B. They may be in the possession of a third party and there may be interpleader proceedings. One party or other would have the right of sale, and I can conceive he might sell at his own risk, but if there were interpleader proceedings that could not happen. The rule, it seems to me, is not based on a consideration of the right of sale of one party or another, but is directed to the injustice which might result if perishable goods perished and became of no value while the dispute between the parties as to their ownership was being decided at law.

Therefore, I think that the first point fails, because it seems to me to deprive this rule of any real application or meaning. It is also, I think, inconsistent with Bartholomew v. Freeman (1). That case also concerned a horse, and the head-note states (3 C.P.D. 316):

"The horse was bought and paid for by the plaintiff at Aldridge's repository, of which the defendants are proprietors, for thirty guineas, and was warranted to draw."

There were certain conditions of sale on breach of which the purchaser had a right to return the horse. The plaintiff returned it with a certificate that it was incapable of work. A veterinary surgeon was appointed who decided against the plaintiff, so it remained the plaintiff's horse but was in the possession of the defendants. There was a further dispute as to its capacity and the plaintiff started an action for breach of warranty. There was correspondence between the solicitors, and the defendants' solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors (ibid., p. 317):

"Will your client consent to the horse in question being sold at Aldridge's, 'as in dispute' without warranty or reserve, and, of course, without prejudice to all parties? At present it is eating its head off without benefit to any one."

It is clear that the horse was in the possession of Messrs. Aldridge, who would have no right to sell it as it was the property of the plaintiff, but the court, consisting of GROVE, J., and LINDLEY, J., decided that it should be sold. It might be possible to distinguish that case on the facts, but it seems to me to dispose of the first point which was made for the respondent.

We were referred to various other cases, in particular to Thames Iron Works Co. v. Patent Derrick Co. (2), decided before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. Counsel for the respondent said that that case shows (and I think he is right) that the mere fact that a person claiming a lien might be inconvenienced by having to retain the chattels while the right to the lien was being decided did not entitle him to go either to a court of common law or a court of equity and get an order for sale. Counsel then submitted that, that being so, Ord. 50, r. 2, ought not to be applied to order the sale of goods with regard to which a plaintiff could not either at law or equity obtain an order for sale. At one time in the course of his opening it was indicated that there might be a suggestion that Ord. 50, r. 2, was ultra vires, in that it was a procedural rule purporting to confer a new substantive right. A search was made, and it was discovered that this rule was in the schedule to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, so that it has statutory force, but, even if it had not been so, that argument would not have commended itself to me. The rule has statutory force, and may well have been designed inter alia to enable the court in appropriate cases to order a sale of goods in respect of which a possessory lien was being claimed.

I do not propose to indicate or lay down any general principles, but I am satisfied that the rule confers on a judge power to order a sale in such a case as this, and, that being so, the only question which remains is whether in the circumstances of this case as they appear we ought to interfere with the order which DANCKWERTS, J., has made. It is not without importance that in Thames Iron Works Co. v. Patent Derrick Co. (2) SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, V.-C., in the course of his judgment, says (1 John. & H. 97):

"As regards the lien which I am asked to enforce by sale, there is no question that it is in its nature a mere passive lien. It is not founded upon any stipulation in the contract, but arises simply from the usage of trade. It has been settled by numerous authorities that such a lien does not, in general, authorise a sale. It was argued that to create a mere right of retainer, involving considerable expenditure, and rendering the subject of the lien utterly useless to both parties, would be absurd; and, to a certain extent, there is authority to show that this is not the law. The case referred to, of a horse having eaten its full value, is one instance of a right of sale being held to flow from a lien."

A There is evidence that this filly is worth about £150. The charges which were due from Mr. Davis and the charges which have accrued since must, I should think, exceed that sum. The respondent says that the horse would be worth more than that to him, but he has not taken advantage of that part of the judge's order which enabled the sale to be postponed if £150 was paid into court. I think, on the facts, that there is no reason why we should interfere with the learned judge's order.

B It is, perhaps, worth repeating what was pointed out in argument, that the respondent, in the letter which I have read, seems to have invited the applicant to continue to look after his horse. Whether that correspondence constituted a legal contract or not I do not consider at the moment, but the later letter did not, it seems to me, clearly withdraw that invitation. The respondent is in effect seeking to say: "I am ultimately going to claim this horse." He must admit, I think, that there is a perfectly reasonable issue whether a lien exists or not, but in the meantime he proposes to stand by and let the applicant feed the horse at his (the applicant's) expense which he maintains cannot be recovered by the applicant from him. That seems to me an unreasonable attitude. I should certainly regret it if there was no power in the rules to enable a court or a judge to deal with it. I think there is such a power under Ord. 50, r. 2. I have no reason for disagreeing with the exercise by the learned judge of the power conferred by that rule, and I think this appeal should be dismissed.

D SINGLETON, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I should like to pay tribute to counsel for the respondent for the industry he has shown in tracing the history of lien and in bringing to our notice various authorities on that subject. He told the court, quite rightly, that lien in its primary sense is the right of one man to retain that which is in his possession belonging to another until certain demands of the person in possession are satisfied. He reminded us that the law does not, except in special circumstances, give any right to sell the thing retained, nor can a lien itself be assigned. In support of his proposition he cited the case to which my lord has already referred, Thames Iron Works Co. v. Patent Derrick Co. (2), and, in particular, to two passages in the judgment of SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, V.-C. In the first of such passages SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD said (1 John. & H. 97): "It has been settled by numerous authorities that such a lien does not, in general, authorise a sale", and in the other he said (ibid., 99): "I can find nothing to justify me in saying that the right to sell would arise at law on the ground of expense alone." It is clear indeed that the right to a lien does not give any right to sell the thing retained, speaking generally. For myself, I think that was probably one reason for the widening of the rule and for the introduction of Ord. 50, r. 2, which, apparently, was at one time

G Ord. 52, r. 2, for it is so referred to in Bartholomew v. Freeman (1). The rule provides:

H "It shall be lawful for the court or a judge, on the application of any party, to make any order for the sale, by any person or persons named in such order, and in such manner, and on such terms as the court or judge may think desirable, of any goods, wares, or merchandise which may be of a perishable nature or likely to injure from keeping, or which for any other just and sufficient reason it may be desirable to have sold at once."

In Bartholomew v. Freeman (1) the court was dealing with the case of a horse, and GROVE, J., in the course of his judgment, said (3 C.P.D. 318):

"The case comes sufficiently within the final clause of Ord. 52, r. 2. There seems 'just and sufficient reason' why it may be desirable to have the animal sold at once. I certainly should not make such an order if the horse were a valuable one for which either party particularly cared. But here neither of them values it per se nor wishes to keep it."

LINDLEY, J., in the course of his judgment, said (ibid.):

"I also think the case is within the latter words of Ord. 52, r. 2. The defendants' object in having the horse sold is to save expense. It costs money to keep, and it is uncertain on whom the cost will ultimately fall. There is no cause for keeping the horse unsold."

The case was dealt with under the concluding words of the rule "or which for any other just and sufficient reason it may be desirable to have sold at once."

The circumstances of this case are somewhat unusual. The filly is now a three year old, and, so far as I gather, she has not yet been trained in the way in which the owner, the respondent, would like to have her trained. He has known where she was since October of last year, but he does not appear to have taken any active steps to get her back into his own possession, she having been placed with the applicant by someone who was going to arrange the training. Now a filly of that age obviously ought to be trained for flat racing, if she is ever to do any good in flat racing, but nothing apparently can be done because the parties do not know where they stand, or what their position is, and month after month the position has remained the same. The applicant who has the filly is spending considerable money in respect of her keep and that which he would describe as training. I suppose it may be some time before the action is tried, if ever it is tried. If the respondent had been anxious to have his filly back he could have commenced proceedings last October or November or at any time since. He has not done so. Thereupon the applicant commenced an action claiming a declaration that he is entitled to a lien. He added a claim for an order for the sale of the filly. Personally I think it was unnecessary that he should include that on his writ, for once the action was launched he could proceed by way of motion under the terms of Ord. 50, r. 2. That is what he did. He obtained leave to serve notice of motion with the writ, and the question came before DANCKWERTS, J., who made an order for the sale of the filly, having suggested terms on which the order would not be enforced, that is, if the respondent paid a certain amount of money into court to abide the result. That was not done, and the learned judge made the order because he thought there was just and sufficient reason for making it. I think there was. I think the purpose of this rule is to meet a case of this kind where the parties are at arms' length, and it is desirable that the matter should be brought to a head. The respondent can, if he likes, buy in the filly. The money will be paid into court to abide the result of the action. He really is no worse off.

I agree entirely with that which DENMAN, J., said in Dangar, Grant & Co. v. Gospel Oak Iron Co. (3) (6 T.L.R. 261) that:

"The rule ought to be construed with a very tender regard to the persons in whom the legal property is vested."

If the respondent, the owner of the filly, had shown any great desire to have the filly, I should have been less willing to apply the powers of that rule in this case, but, in view of his obvious reluctance to take any step to recover the filly, I think it would be deplorable if this court had not the power to do that which DANCKWERTS, J., ordered, and if, having the power, it did not exercise it. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re A DEBTOR, No. 277 OF 1950. Ex parte THE DEBTOR
v. LIGUORI AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), July 18, 24, 1950.]

Bankruptcy—Notice—Validity—Judgment creditor resident abroad outside the scheduled territories—Notice requiring payment into court—Exchange Control Act, 1947 (c. 14), sched. IV, para. 3—Exchange Control (Bankruptcy Notices) Order, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 585), art. 1 (a), sched., pt. I—R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 1 (2).

A creditor resident in Switzerland obtained judgment in England against a debtor, resident in this country, for £6,087. Treasury permission for the payment of the debt was not obtained as required by the Exchange Control Act, 1947, s. 5 (Switzerland not being one of "the scheduled territories" within the meaning of that Act), and the creditor served on the debtor a bankruptcy notice in the form prescribed by the Exchange Control (Bankruptcy Notices) Order, 1949, made by the President of the Board of Trade under the Act of 1947, requiring the debtor to pay the £6,087 into court within seven days "in accordance with the rules of court made pursuant to sched. IV to the Act" of 1947 or to secure or compound for that sum. The registrar held the notice to be valid and made a receiving order against the debtor, who appealed.

HELD: R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 1 (2) (which directs that the debtor shall, in the circumstances therein mentioned, pay the amount of a judgment debt into court) did not go beyond the powers conferred on the rule-making authority by para. 3 (a) of sched. IV, to the Act of 1947, and, therefore, the premise on which the Order of 1949 rested, viz., the validity of r. 1 (2), was correct, the President of the Board of Trade was entitled to make the Order, and the notice was valid.

[FOR THE EXCHANGE CONTROL ACT, 1947, sched. IV, para. 3, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 16, pp. 606, 607.]

APPEAL by the debtor against a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar PARTON on June 7, 1950.

The petitioning creditor had secured judgment against the debtor in respect of a debt, and thereafter he served a bankruptcy notice on the debtor in the form prescribed by the Exchange Control (Bankruptcy Notices) Order, 1949, which was made by the President of the Board of Trade under the Exchange Control Act, 1947, s. 33 (3) and sched. IV. The debtor contended that the notice was invalid, but the registrar rejected that contention. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

Muir Hunter for the debtor.

H. J. Phillimore for the petitioning creditor.

Aronson, K.C., and H. J. Phillimore for the Board of Trade.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: On Apr. 15, 1950, the petitioning creditor in the present proceedings obtained against the debtor final judgment in these courts for £6,087. The petitioning creditor was then resident in Switzerland, which is not one of the scheduled territories within the meaning of the Exchange Control Act, 1947. The result of his being so resident was, and is, that, by virtue of the Exchange Control Act, 1947, s. 5, it is unlawful for a person resident in this country, as is, and was, the debtor, to make any payment to or for the credit of the petitioning creditor save with the permission of the Treasury, and it is conceded in this case that no such permission has been given. The petitioning creditor, however, has sought to take advantage of further provisions of the Act of 1947 and certain rules and a statutory instrument which emanated from that Act—the Exchange Control (Bankruptcy Notices) Order, 1949—in order to make the debtor a bankrupt. There was served on the debtor on Apr. 19, 1950, a bankruptcy notice in a form which has its authority in the order of 1949. The form of that notice, so far as relevant, is:

"Take notice that whereas the petitioning creditor, a person residing outside the scheduled territories has obtained judgment against you for the sum of £6,087, and whereas permission of the Treasury for payment of the sum by you to him has not been obtained, you must within seven days after service of this notice on you, excluding the day of such service, pay into court in accordance with the rules of court made pursuant to sched. IV to the Act the said sum of £6,087, the amount of the said judgment whereon execution is not now stayed, or you must secure or compound for the same . . ."

The question raised in this appeal is whether that bankruptcy notice had any effect or validity. The learned registrar held that it had, and made a receiving order accordingly. Counsel for the debtor has, however, argued that bankruptcy is a matter affecting the liberty and status of the citizen and that it is the duty of the court to take care that the bankruptcy law should not be applied as regards any individual unless there is clear jurisdiction and authority for its application. The question—and it is one on which I have felt some little difficulty—really turns, on analysis, on the fact that in the bankruptcy notice which I have read there is reference to rules of court made pursuant to sched. IV. The particular rules which are invoked are R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 1 (2) and (3)—rules which were made ostensibly in pursuance of the power conferred by the Exchange Control Act, 1947. The whole matter turns, I think, on whether r. 1 (2) is or is not ultra vires.

Bankruptcy notices under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, are the subject of s. 2 of that Act:

"A bankruptcy notice under this Act shall be in the prescribed form, and shall require the debtor to pay the judgment debt or sum ordered to be paid in accordance with the terms of the judgment or order, or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor or the court . . ."

It is right to say at once that the prescribed form indicated in s. 2 comes into existence as a result of a procedure which admittedly has not been applied in this case, the bankruptcy notice with which we are concerned not being made in the prescribed form under the Act, but, if it was validly made at all, being made pursuant to a special power conferred on the President of the Board of Trade by the order of 1949. There is, therefore, no doubt that as regards the subject-matter of this appeal the more normal procedure in reference to bankruptcy matters has been departed from, but if Parliament has, on the proper construction of the Exchange Control Act, 1947, given the necessary authority and created liability to bankruptcy proceedings by means which differ from the more stereotyped method enshrined in the Bankruptcy Act, plainly it is not for this court to question their propriety.

I now turn to the Act of 1947. I have referred to s. 5 which prevents a debtor paying to, or for the credit of, a creditor outside the scheduled territories the judgment debt without Treasury permission. By s. 33 it is provided that there shall be an implied condition in any contract that where the requisite Treasury permission is necessary, then payment in accordance with the contract is not to take place save after the permission has been obtained. Section 33 (3) provides:

"The provisions of sched. IV to this Act shall have effect with respect to legal proceedings, arbitrations, bankruptcy proceedings, the administration of the estates of deceased persons, the winding-up of companies . . ."

Schedule IV is headed "Legal Proceedings, etc," and, having regard to the terms of s. 33 (3), Parliament was plainly intending to deal, among other things, with bankruptcy proceedings. Schedule IV, para. 1, provides, in effect, that where (as here) a judgment is recovered by a creditor outside one of the scheduled territories against a resident here, the judgment is to be treated as having an implied term in it that the sum awarded or ordered to be paid shall not be so paid save with the permission of the Treasury. Paragraph 3, on which the whole argument has turned, provides, so far as relevant:

A "Without prejudice to the provisions of any enactments relating to the making of rules of court, rules of court—(a) enabling any person who is required by any judgment, order or award to pay any sum, if he apprehends that the payment of that sum is unlawful under this Act except with the permission of the Treasury, to pay that sum into court; and (b) declaring that payment of a sum into court by virtue of the preceding sub-paragraph, together with the delivery to the other party concerned of such evidence of the payment as may be prescribed by the rules, shall, to the extent of the payment, be a good discharge to the person making the payment; and (c) . . . regulating the process of execution which may issue . . . may be made, as respects the High Court, under s. 99 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 . . . Provided that—(i) the form of any bankruptcy notice shall be such as may be prescribed by the Board of Trade . . ."

B I will come back to that, but I should like to make a brief reference to two other paragraphs. First, in para. 5 (1) Parliament states:

C "In any bankruptcy . . . (being a bankruptcy . . . carried on under the law of any part of the United Kingdom) a claim for a sum not payable without the permission of the Treasury shall, notwithstanding that the permission has not been given . . . be admitted to proof."

D Then para. 6:

E "A debt for the payment of which the permission of the Treasury is required under this Act shall, if in other respects it complies with the requirements of s. 4 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, be allowed to be a good petitioning creditor's debt, notwithstanding the said requirement, if and to the extent that the debt can be satisfied either by a payment into court or by a payment to a blocked account."

F I have read those other paragraphs because they seem to point inevitably to the fact that Parliament is expressing clearly the intention that, in the case of a judgment such as we have here which cannot be paid because of the Exchange Control Act, 1947, failure to pay the sum into court after receiving the necessary notice is to constitute an act of bankruptcy. I think there can be no doubt whatever that it was the intention that the debtor should not be entitled to say: "I cannot pay because of the Exchange Control Act, 1947. I am not going to bother about asking the Treasury for permission. If I do, I shall not get it, and there is nothing you can do." I think it was intended to provide, first, that there should be an alternative means of discharge to the debtor, viz., by payment into court, and, further, that the creditor should have the right to invoke bankruptcy procedure if the alternative means were not taken advantage of. I emphasise that, because it is the burden of the argument of counsel for the debtor that Parliament, whatever it may have intended, has expressed itself in terms which leave, as a matter of construction, no doubt that all that the rules were intended to do, and, therefore, all the rule-making authority had power to achieve, was to give to a person in the position of the present debtor a right, if he chose to make use of it, and, particularly, if he bona fide apprehended that he could not pay because of the Exchange Control Act, 1947, a privilege, without his being under any positive obligation to do anything; that since the rule, as will appear, went beyond that, it is ultra vires; and since, finally—and I agree with counsel on this point—the bankruptcy notice which was prescribed in the statutory instrument proceeded on the footing that the existing rule was valid, or, at least, that a valid rule had been made, it, therefore, in turn falls to the ground. That is the argument, and as, I think, counsel admitted, any bankruptcy notice which proceeded merely on the failure of the debtor to take advantage of a privilege, as distinct from a failure to do what he had been told he was bound to do, would not, according to bankruptcy procedure, be a good bankruptcy notice, with the rather startling result that, notwithstanding the strong indications to the contrary, having regard to the language which Parliament chose to adopt in sched. IV, no effective bankruptcy notice could possibly have either been prescribed or made use of in any such case as the present. The Exchange Control (Bankruptcy Notices) Order, 1949, bears date Mar. 28, 1949, and was made by the President of the Board of Trade. I hold that he was entitled to make it if the premise on which it rested, viz., the validity of the new rule, R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 1 (2), is assumed.

Is r. 1 (2) valid? It provides:

"Where any person is directed by any judgment, order, or award, to pay any money to or for the credit of any person who is resident outside the scheduled territories . . . he shall, unless the permission of the Treasury . . . has been given . . . pay the amount thereof into court."

Rule 1 (3) follows para. 3 (b) of sched. IV, in that it provides:

"Payment into court under the preceding paragraph of this rule shall, to the extent of the payment, be a good discharge . . ."

There is at first blush an obvious disparity between the language of para. 3 (a) of sched. IV to the Act and the language of Ord. 42, r. 1 (2), for the former refers to something enabling a person, if he apprehends a certain state of affairs, to pay money into court, whereas the latter in terms appears imperative and says that, whatever his apprehension may be, if the Act applies he shall pay the money into court. It was because of that difference in language that I felt for some time troubled whether it could be said that this rule really was within the rule-making authority conferred by sched. IV.

I observe that the opening words of para. 3 of sched. IV are: "Without prejudice to the provisions of any enactments relating to the making of rules of court," and there is a specific reference to the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 99. We are, as counsel for the petitioning solicitor pointed out with some force, dealing here with an order of the court, and Ord. 42 is headed "Execution," and is dealing with the consequences of an order made by the court to pay money. I think there is some force in the argument that, apart from particular authority conferred on the rule-making body by para. 3, there may be added power in the general language of s. 99 itself. I need not, however, pursue that further because I have come to the conclusion that r. 1 (2) was within the scope of the rule-making power by virtue of the Act of 1947. I think that the difficulty created by the distinction between "shall" in the rule and "enabling" in the schedule is resolved when one considers the context and object. I have already said that Ord. 42 deals with execution. It makes provision for what is to happen after an order has been made by the court to pay money, what steps have to be taken, and what is liable to happen to the person ordered to make the payment if he does not pay. As counsel for the Board of Trade pointed out, that context is quite different from that in which you may find the word "shall," e.g., in an Act of Parliament which imposes a duty to do or not to do something—a frequent formula to-day is: "No person shall do" so-and-so—failure to comply with which involves the person in question in penalties. In Ord. 42, r. 1 (2), the word "shall" cannot be used to impose an obligation subject to a penalty of that kind. As I have said, it merely provides for what is to be done in the case of an order of the court directing a payment which cannot be performed according to its terms because of the Exchange Control Act, 1947.

There is no general provision enabling a debtor who has been ordered by a judgment of the court to pay A.B. a sum of money to comply with that judgment by paying the money into court. The only way in which a debtor who has been ordered to pay A.B. £100 can fulfil that obligation is to find A.B. and pay him. He cannot do it in any other way without A.B.'s consent. That being so, I think the proper construction, going back now for the moment to sched. IV to the Act, to be given to the word "enabling" is to treat it as equivalent to "providing machinery whereby any person," etc. As I have said, in the absence of some rule, there is no such machinery, and it is to be observed that under para. 3 (a) no consequences follow. It is simply a paragraph authorising or directing the rule-making authority to provide the machinery. What happens afterwards, if the machinery is taken advantage of, is ascertained by looking at para. 3 (b), viz., that the person paying the money into court gets pro tanto a discharge. If that be the right view of para. 3, it seems to me that, on its true construction, r. 1 (2) does not go beyond the powers conferred on the rule-making authority, for it merely provides that in the cases mentioned a person ordered to pay a particular individual is to pay into court instead. That is the way in which, according to the rules, he will satisfy the judgment. If he does not do it, he will not suffer any penalty. He does not commit a criminal offence, but he will be a debtor who has not paid the debt ordered to be paid, and such other consequences as the rules or the Act of Parliament provide if he does not pay will ensue. The rule, therefore, is simply doing in other words what sched. IV says—providing machinery whereby in such a case discharge of the debt is to be achieved by payment into court.

There still remains the point that r. 1 (2) speaks of payment "to any person who is resident outside the scheduled territories as defined by the Act," whereas para. 3 (a) of sched. IV, speaks of "the debtor apprehending that the payment of the sum is unlawful." The word "apprehends" is commonly used as meaning "is afraid," though it does not necessarily have that meaning, but in all the circumstances I think there is no real substance in this point. As has been pointed out, where proceedings are started by a person resident outside the scheduled territories it must appear on the face of the writ that they are so started. A debtor sued in such circumstances, I think, is bound to apprehend, that is, to learn or understand, that the prohibition is applicable. I do not, therefore, think that change of language is sufficient to invalidate the construction which I think ought to be given to the rest of the paragraph, or to qualify the conclusion I have reached that r. 1 (2) is within the scope of the power conferred by para. 3 (a).

I agree with counsel for the debtor that this is a matter of principle in the sense that it turns mainly on the proper construction of these paragraphs, and is one on which we are not likely to get guidance from authority. I, therefore, will not take up time by making any reference to the few cases to which we have been referred. I conclude, for the reasons I have stated, that the argument against the validity of Ord. 42, r. 1 (2), fails, and, therefore, in my judgment, it follows that the premise on which the present statutory instrument rested is established. As I have said, on that assumption I see no grounds for suggesting that the form of notice which the statutory instrument prescribed was not well within the scope of the proviso at the end of para. 3 and conferred on the Board of Trade, acting by its President, the power so to prescribe. Everything else I think from that stage follows. The form used in this case followed the statutory instrument and nothing more remains to be said except that I agree with the view of the learned registrar, and that I think the appeal should be dismissed.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs. No order as to the costs of the Board of Trade.

LEICESTER PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY v. SHEARLEY.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), July 26, 1950.]

Mortgage—Possession of mortgaged property—Mortgagor not in occupation—Person in occupation under agreement with mortgagor—Need to join occupier as defendant to claim for possession by mortgagees—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A.

Practice—Originating summons—Parties—Summons by mortgagees for possession—Mortgagor not in occupation—Person in occupation under agreement with mortgagor—Need to join occupier as defendant to claim for possession by mortgagees—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A.

By a legal charge, dated Oct. 9, 1946, and made between the L. Building Society, of the one part, and S., of the other part, £4,250 was secured on certain property belonging to S. including premises known as No. 25, E. Avenue. The statutory power of leasing was expressly excluded, except with the consent of the building society to whom S. attorned tenant. The money secured was repayable with interest by monthly instalments. Instalments fell into arrear and on Mar. 3, 1950, the building society issued an originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, claiming possession of No. 25, E. Avenue, and citing only S. as defendant. In July, 1950, the building society became aware that, although no consent to any lease had been given, No. 25, E. Avenue, was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. G., who claimed that the premises had been let to them after the date of the legal charge, furnished at five guineas per week.

HELD: the building society should be ordered to give notice to Mr. and Mrs. G. that the society were applying for an order for possession, and that that order would be made unless within fourteen days an occupier of the premises applied to be added as a defendant.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS issued by mortgagees, the Leicester Permanent Building Society, under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, for possession of certain mortgaged premises.

After the summons had been issued, it came to the knowledge of the mortgagees that persons other than the mortgagor were in possession of the premises and that they claimed to be in possession by virtue of a tenancy, and the present question then arose, viz., whether these persons should be made defendants. The facts appear in the judgment.

A. F. M. Berkeley for the mortgagees.

The mortgagor did not appear.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This is an originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, by which the mortgagees ask for an order against the mortgagor for possession of premises known as 25, Eastcombe Avenue, Greenwich, as part of the property comprised in a legal charge dated Oct. 9, 1946, and made between the mortgagor, of the one part, and the mortgagees, of the other part. That was a charge to secure £4,250, together with interest at 4½ per cent. per annum, on a number of properties including the property to which I have referred.

By the terms of the legal charge the statutory power of leasing was excluded except with the express consent of the mortgagees. The mortgage provided for the payment of monthly instalments of £27 5s. 6d. and the mortgagor attorned tenant to the mortgagees. On Feb. 3, 1948, owing presumably to the mortgagor being in arrear, the mortgagees determined that tenancy, which expired on Feb. 7. On Jan. 20, 1949, the mortgagees obtained leave under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1939, to institute proceedings for possession. Payments of the instalments were resumed, but on Jan. 20, 1950, the mortgagor paid the last instalment which he has paid, leaving six instalments to be paid which are now in arrear, and on Mar. 3, 1950, the present originating summons was issued claiming possession of the Eastcombe Avenue property and citing the mortgagor as the sole defendant. In July, 1950, inquiry agents, making normal inquiries on behalf of the mortgagees, ascertained that the premises in question were, as they still are, in the occupation of a Captain and Mrs. Goddard, who claim that they were let to them on a furnished tenancy at the rate of five guineas per week. No permission was given by the mortgagees to the mortgagor to effect a letting, and the evidence shows that the alleged letting to Captain and Mrs. Goddard was effected after the date of the mortgage. The originating summons came before the master who directed that Captain and Mrs. Goddard should be made defendants, and it is in those circumstances that the matter has been adjourned before me that the question may be decided whether or not it is necessary in such a case as this that the mortgagee should in every case join any person who, he learns, is in occupation of the premises possession of which is sought.

There is a certain body of authority bearing on applications of this kind, but no case covers the case before me. It is established by the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Alliance Building Society v. Varma (1) that Ord. 55, r. 5A, entitles the court

“... to make an order for delivery up of possession to the mortgagee against a person in occupation, even though that person is neither the mortgagor nor a person claiming to derive title under him in the sense of having a right to redemption.”

In that case the person involved was before the court.

It also appears from the judgment of ROXBURGH, J., in Martins Bank, Ltd. v. Kavanagh (2) that on such a proceeding as this the mortgagor must be a defendant, but the question has been left open whether the person in occupation should be joined as a defendant. The nearest case is Minet v. Johnson (3) in which the plaintiff issued a writ against one Johnson to recover possession of a house and signed judgment in default of appearance. The sheriff, in pursuance of a writ of possession, ejected from the premises one Hartley, who was in possession, and put in the plaintiff. Hartley had no knowledge of the action and did not claim to hold through Johnson. Hartley applied that the writ of summons and all subsequent proceedings in the action should be set aside for irregularity and that the plaintiff should restore possession of the house to him. WILLIAMS, J., at chambers, made an order setting aside the judgment and subsequent proceedings, and directing the plaintiff

“to go out of any possession obtained by reason of or under the judgment, such order to take effect only if the applicant [Hartley] within twelve days should elect to be added as defendant; applicant to be at liberty so to appear upon filing an affidavit that, at the time of the issue of the writ, he was in possession by himself or his tenants.”

The Divisional Court affirmed the order of WILLIAMS, J., and the matter was taken by the applicant to the Court of Appeal, where LORD ESHER, M.R., said (1890) 63 L.T. 507):

“In this case the plaintiff bona fide and without any abuse of the process of the court brought an action against Johnson to recover possession of certain premises. There is nothing to show but that he had a bona fide belief that the defendant Johnson was the person in possession. The writ was served on Johnson only, and he allowed judgment to go by default, which was an admission that, as between himself and the plaintiff, he was in possession and the plaintiff was entitled to turn him out. Then, in pursuance of a writ of possession the sheriff turns out of possession the persons on the premises and delivers possession to the plaintiff. If Hartley were a tenant of Johnson's of course he must go out; therefore to support his complaint now he must say that he had some independent right of his own. What then is his remedy? There has been a miscarriage of justice, and Hartley has a right to be heard, and he must be let in to assert his case. If he had taken his point before judgment had been signed, he would have been treated as though he were a defendant in the action; if he has done so after judgment has gone by default, without his knowing anything of the former proceedings, he must then also be allowed to defend. But the judgment must not be set aside as between the plaintiff and Johnson; it can only be set aside so far as it concerns him. That is what has been ordered here, but it is said that that is not enough."

His Lordship held that it was the correct order in the circumstances. He says later (ibid., p. 508):

"If the judgment was set aside simply, Johnson would be able to come in and defend if he liked; therefore the judgment must be set aside, and also the writ of possession, only so far as it affects Hartley. WILLIAMS, J., has imposed no terms on Hartley; his order merely says in effect that Hartley must come in in the same way as if he had come in before judgment had been signed. The order is right, and this appeal must be dismissed."

LINDLEY, L.J., said, in the course of his short judgment (ibid.):

"On principle a person in actual possession ought to be made a defendant; but where this has not been done Ord. 12, r. 25, seems to me to point out what is the proper course of procedure. The moment the person in possession has done as he is there directed he is treated as a defendant in the action."

BOWEN, L.J., said (ibid.):

"The mistake at the root of this application is, that the applicant has been deprived of some right."

It appears to me that, although that case does not directly cover this case, it provides me with guidance as regards the correct course to follow in this matter. The evidence, as I have observed, shows that Captain and Mrs. Goddard are in possession, and claim to be in possession under a furnished letting. It is difficult to imagine how they came to be in possession under that letting unless it was a letting purporting to have been made by the defendant, but that is not a matter on which, as it seems to me, at this stage the court can finally pronounce, and an opportunity ought to be given to Captain and Mrs. Goddard to take any point that they may consider is open to them with a view to resisting an order for possession against them. On the other hand, if there were to be laid down a hard and fast rule that in every case such as this the mortgagee ought to join as a defendant every person who in the course of the proceedings he learns is in possession, the result in many cases might well be very serious and an unnecessary embarrassment to the mortgagee—as, for instance, in the case of a large block of flats—and it appears to me that this summons, on the information which the mortgagees had at the time of its issue, was properly commenced by citing only the mortgagor. Now, however, that it has been learned that somebody is in occupation and claims to be in occupation under some form of letting it would be a miscarriage of justice not to give that person an opportunity to be heard. It further appears to me that it would be inconvenient in such a case to follow the course which was followed in Minet v. Johnson (3), that is, to make the order, leaving Captain and Mrs. Goddard to make an application to set it aside. That was the only course that could be taken in Minet v. Johnson (3), having regard to the circumstance that the order for possession was made when it was not known that Hartley was in possession. Here it is known before judgment that Captain and Mrs. Goddard are in possession.

A It, therefore, appears to me that the practical course is to refer this summons back to the master with a direction that he should order the mortgagees to give notice to the persons in actual possession that the mortgagees are applying for an order for possession, and that that order will be made unless within fourteen days of the service of the notice any occupier applies to be added as a defendant to the proceedings.

D Mandamus—Application for order directed to chairman of university convocation—Alleged refusal to perform duty imposed by university statutes—Matter for visitor of university—Refusal to re-employ teacher in school.

E Statute 6 of the University of London made and approved by His Majesty in Council under the authority of the University of London Act, 1926, s. 4 (1), provided that His Majesty in Council should be the visitor of the university. The statute imposed no limitation on his visitatorial powers.

F Fifty members of convocation of the university served a requisition on the chairman of convocation, in accordance with statute 62 of the statutes of the university, to summon an extraordinary meeting of convocation to discuss, inter alia, the refusal of a school connected with the university to re-employ one of its teachers. The chairman refused to call the meeting on the ground, among others, that the motion was not one which related to the university or one on which convocation could properly declare its opinion to the senate because it related to a matter within the discretion of the council of the school in question. On a motion by one of the fifty members for an order of mandamus,

G HELD: the question whether an officer of the university had refused to perform a duty placed on him by the statutes of the university was a domestic matter and, therefore, one essentially for the visitor, and the application for mandamus would be refused.

MOTION for mandamus.

Fifty members of convocation of the University of London served a requisition on the chairman for the summoning of a meeting of convocation to consider certain matters, but he refused to do so and an order of mandamus was now sought to compel him to summon the meeting in accordance with the statutes of the university. For the chairman it was contended that the matter was a domestic one within the jurisdiction of His Majesty in Council as visitor of the university, and, therefore, that mandamus did not lie. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Pritt, K.C., and Ralph Millner for the applicant for the order.

Diplock, K.C., and Boileau for the respondent (the chairman).

Cur. adv. vult.

July 28. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read this judgment of the court. Counsel for the applicant moved for an order of mandamus calling on the respondent, the chairman of the London University Convocation, to summon an extraordinary meeting of convocation following a request by not less than fifty members of convocation as provided by statute 62 of the statutes of the university. The requisition served on the chairman stated the matter which the members desired should be brought before the meeting, viz., that a school connected with the university had refused to re-employ a person as a teacher of Slavonic languages. They also desired to raise certain questions with regard to political opinions influencing the appointment of teachers. The chairman refused to summon the meeting on the grounds, inter alia, that the motion was not one which "related to the university," nor was it one on which convocation could properly declare its opinion to the senate. It related, he submitted, to a matter within the discretion of the council of the particular school. Counsel for the respondent objected that this was not a matter in which the court should act by way of mandamus, but submitted that the appropriate authority to deal with the question was the visitor of the university.

By the University of London Act, 1926, it was provided by s. 1 (1): "There shall be a body of commissioners to be styled 'The University of London Commissioners' . . ." By s. 4 (1) it was provided:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, the commissioners shall make statutes for the University of London (in this Act referred to as 'the University'), in general accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of the committee [appointed by the Board of Education], subject to any modifications which may appear to them to be expedient, and, so far as may be necessary for giving effect to any of the said recommendations, the commissioners may, subject as hereinafter provided, make statutes for any school of the university, or for any other college, school, or institution for the purpose of enabling it to become a school of the university."

By s. 5 (1) it was provided:

"No statute or part of a statute made under this Act shall have effect until it has been approved by His Majesty in Council, but every statute or part of a statute so approved shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, have effect notwithstanding anything in any Act of Parliament, charter, deed, or other instrument whatsoever."

It is common ground that the statutes had been duly approved by His Majesty in Council. By statute 6 of the statutes of the University, it is provided:

“His Majesty in Council shall be the visitor of the university”.

The only two statutes which deal with the powers of the visitor are statutes 109 and 115. Those confer some special powers and duties on the visitor, but there is nothing in the Act to show that there is any limitation imposed on the ordinary visitatorial powers of the visitor.

It is important to remember that mandamus is neither a writ of course nor a writ of right, but that it will be granted if the duty is in the nature of a public duty and specially affects the rights of an individual, provided there is no more appropriate remedy. This court has always refused to issue a mandamus if there is another remedy open to the party seeking it. This is one of the reasons, no doubt, why, where there is a visitor of a corporate body, the court will not interfere in a matter within the province of the visitor, and especially this is so in matters relating to educational bodies such as colleges. I see no difference for this purpose between a college and a university. Any question that arises of a domestic nature is essentially one for a domestic forum, and this is supported by all the authorities which deal with visitatorial powers and duties, and, although the question has generally arisen with regard to election to fellowships, I see no difference in principle between the question whether a particular person ought to be elected to a fellowship or whether a particular person is a fit and proper person to be appointed or retained as a teacher at a university or a school. Unless the question really does affect the suitability of the person in question to be a teacher at a college connected with the university, it would be difficult to see how the matter could be one which, in the words of statute 61 of the statutes, must be a matter relating to the university.

The authorities on the matter seem to be fairly consistent. In St. John's College, Cambridge v. Toddington (1), LORD MANSFIELD said (1 Burr. 200):

“The visitatorial power, if properly exercised, without expense or delay, is useful and convenient to colleges. However (be that as it may), we must take it, as it is now established by law: and it is now settled and established (since the case of Philips v. Bury (2) in the House of Lords) that the jurisdiction of the visitor is summary and without appeal from it.”

Philips v. Bury (2) decided that the visitor's decision was final, and it seems to me that it is a very desirable thing that in a matter of this sort there should be some means of obtaining a final decision. It should not have to be brought before courts with the possibility of an appeal first to the Court of Appeal, and then to the House of Lords, on a matter which, after all, is a domestic matter referring to the government and internal affairs of the University of London.

In A.-G. v. Talbot (3), LORD HARDWICKE decided that the powers of the visitor were such that the court would not interfere by injunction or otherwise in a court of equity. He said (3 Atk. 674):

“If the chancellor of this university then is visitor, the general powers of a visitor are well known; no court of law or equity can anticipate their judgment, or take away their jurisdiction, but their determinations are final and conclusive. And it is a more convenient method of determination of controversies of this nature, it is at home, forum domesticum, and final in the first instance, and they should be adjudged in a short way secundum arbitrium boni viri; it is true this power may be abused, but if it is exercised in a discreet manner, it is a much less expense than suits at law, or in equity; and in general, I believe, such appeals have been equitably determined”.

To the same effect is A.-G. v. Smythies (or Smithies) (4), and we were referred to R. v. Hertford College (5), the importance of the latter case being that it shows that the same principles apply where the corporation is governed and set up by an Act of Parliament as when it is set up by a charter. There are also several cases in the books in which mandamus has been sought by either students or barristers of the Inns of Court to admit them, but the court has always refused to grant a mandamus to the benchers of the Inns, the method of questioning their decision now being well-established as an appeal to the judges, not as a court, but in their capacity as visitors of the Inns.

In Thomson v. University of London (6), the headnote states (33 L.J.Ch. 625):

"The University of London conferred upon the plaintiff a gold medal, as being the candidate who had obtained the highest number of marks in the examination of 1861 for the LL.D. degree. Two years afterwards, it was discovered by the senate of the university, that, according to the construction put by the senate on the regulations for the LL.D. examination, the examiners had miscarried in the mode which they had adopted in ascertaining the highest number of marks; and the senate thereupon determined to confer a second gold medal upon the candidate to whom according to their view the medal ought to have been awarded. The plaintiff filed his bill, alleging, in effect, that before becoming a candidate he made inquiry of the registrar of the university, and had been informed by him that the examination would be conducted upon the principle and the marks ascertained in the mode upon and in which they were in fact subsequently conducted and ascertained, and that he had become a candidate and paid his examination fee upon that footing, and praying that the university might be restrained from awarding such other medal:—Held, upon demurrer, that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, the matter being one solely within the jurisdiction of the visitor".

That shows, therefore, the extensive power of the visitor.

If a visitor refuses to act, a mandamus may go to the visitor calling on him to act, but that is an entirely different matter. Here the statutes actually have been approved by the visitor. Statutes 61 and 62 of the statutes must be read together. Statute 61 provides:

"The ordinary meetings of convocation shall take place on such days as convocation shall determine, provided that at least one ordinary meeting shall be held in each year. Convocation may discuss any matter relating to the university and declare its opinion thereon to the court or to the senate".

Statute 62, which is the clause under which this mandamus was moved, provides:

"The chairman of convocation may at any time at his discretion, and shall upon the requisition in writing of not less than fifty members of convocation stating the purpose for which the meeting is to be called, summon an extraordinary meeting of convocation and the notice summoning such meeting shall specify the business to be considered".

It is obvious, therefore, taking those two statutes together, that the business to be considered must be a matter relating to the university.

The case, then, is that an officer of the university is alleged to have refused to perform a duty placed on him by the statutes of the university, and that seems to me to be essentially a matter for the visitor, because it is a domestic question. The officer objects to calling this meeting on the ground that the matter sought to be discussed is not a matter relating to the university. Whether it is such a matter is essentially a question for the visitor, who is also presumed to understand the statutes generally relating to the university, and will have knowledge of the status of these particular schools, which we have not gone into at any length, and which do not seem to be entirely clear. For these reasons, the court has come to the conclusion that this matter is a matter within the visitatorial jurisdiction of His Majesty in Council, and, therefore, this application for a mandamus is refused.

Application refused with costs.

CORKERY v. CARPENTER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Byrne, JJ.), July 21, 1950.]

Highway—Drunk in charge of “carriage”—Inclusion in “carriage” of bicycle—Licensing Act, 1872 (c. 94), s. 12.

A The appellant, while pushing his pedal bicycle along a road, was drunk and incapable of having proper control over the bicycle. He was arrested without warrant and charged with “being drunk in charge of a bicycle on a highway, contrary to s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872,” which provides that “every person . . . who is drunk while in charge on any highway or other public place of any carriage . . . may be apprehended”, and shall be liable to a penalty.

B HELD: the word “carriage” in s. 12 was wide enough to include a bicycle, and, therefore, the appellant was guilty of an offence under the section.

CASE STATED by Devon Quarter Sessions.

F On Jan. 19, 1950, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Ilfracombe, the appellant was convicted, inter alia, of being drunk while in charge of a bicycle on a highway, contrary to s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and was sentenced to one month's imprisonment. The appellant appealed to quarter sessions contending that since a bicycle was not a “carriage” within the meaning of s. 12 of the Act of 1872 his arrest without warrant was unlawful, and that, as he had been brought before the justices solely by virtue of such unlawful arrest, no information having been laid against him, he was never properly before the court, and G the proceedings against him resulting in his conviction and sentence were a nullity. Quarter sessions were of opinion that a bicycle was a “carriage” within the meaning of s. 12 of the Act of 1872, and that the proceedings against the appellant were, therefore, regular. Accordingly, they dismissed the appeal and confirmed the conviction and sentence. The appellant appealed.

H D. M. Scott for the appellant.

Wilmsers for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Devon before whom the appellant was charged with “being drunk in charge of a bicycle on a highway at Ilfracombe on Jan. 18, 1950, contrary to s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872.” He was arrested by a police constable, and, with the assistance of another constable, was taken to the police station where he was put in a cell which he proceeded to damage. For the offence under s. 12 he was sentenced to one month's imprisonment, and for damaging the cell to three months. He has appealed by way of Case Stated and argues that he was not liable to be arrested without warrant because the offence for which he was arrested was that of being drunk in the highway in charge of a bicycle, a bicycle is not a carriage within the meaning of s. 12, and, therefore, he had not committed an offence against that section.

The point, though it seems trivial, is of some importance since some doubt has been expressed by text-book writers whether a bicycle is a "carriage" within the meaning of s. 12. That section was passed for the protection of the public and the preservation of public order. It provides inter alia:

"... Every person who in any highway or other public place, whether a building or not, is guilty while drunk of riotous or disorderly behaviour, or who is drunk while in charge on any highway or other public place of any carriage, horse, cattle, or steam engine, or who is drunk when in possession of any loaded firearms, may be apprehended, and shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings, or in the discretion of the court to imprisonment with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding one month..."

In my opinion, it is clear that the word "carriage" is wide enough to include a bicycle for this purpose. It does not follow that in every Act of Parliament a bicycle is a "carriage." That may depend on the words of the Act in question. The question has most commonly arisen with regard to toll-bridges, because the proprietor of the toll-bridge has to show that the vehicle from which he seeks a toll is covered by the words of the Act of Parliament which allows him to impose a toll. In the present case, bearing in mind that the object of the Act of 1872, is the protection of the public and the preservation of public order, I think a "carriage" can include any sort of vehicle—certainly a vehicle which is capable of carrying a person, and, it may be, one capable of carrying goods. Indeed, in my opinion, this case is decided, so far as this court is concerned, by Taylor v. Goodwin (1). That was a case, it is true, under the Highway Act, 1835, but for this purpose there cannot be any distinction, it seems to me, between a section in a highway Act which is passed for the protection of the public and a section in a licensing Act which is passed for the same purpose, both of them dealing with the conduct of persons on the highway and the preservation of public order. In Taylor v. Goodwin (1) the headnote reads (4 Q.B.D. 228):

"A person, riding a bicycle on a highway at such a pace as to be dangerous to the passers by, may be convicted of furiously driving a carriage..."

The relevant words of s. 78 of the Act of 1835, under which the appellant was charged in that case provided:

"... if any person riding any horse or beast, or driving any sort of carriage, shall ride or drive the same furiously so as to endanger the life or limb of any passenger..."

he shall be guilty of an offence. It is true that the words there are "any sort of carriage," but that does not carry the matter any further. A bicycle is a "carriage" because it carries, and, therefore, it comes within the word "carriage." MELLOR, J., in giving judgment in that case, said (4 Q.B.D. 229):

"The expressions used are as wide as possible. It may be that bicycles were unknown at the time when the Act [was] passed, but the legislature clearly desired to prohibit the use of any sort of carriage in a manner dangerous to the life or limb of any passenger."

Applying that case, nothing can be more dangerous than a drunken man with a bicycle on a highway. He is dangerous whether he is riding the bicycle or pushing it. If he is pushing it, he has not proper control and can push it into persons or cause vehicles to swerve, quite apart from the danger to himself.

In Cannan v. Abingdon (Earl) (2), in which the question was whether or not a bicycle could be subjected to a toll in going over the bridge belonging to Lord Abingdon on the road between Oxford and Cheltenham, BIGHAM, J., said ([1900] 2 Q.B. 71):

A "The bicycle or tricycle is a thing which carries. It may carry a man, as a horse does, or a carriage does; it may carry luggage or goods as we know that tradesmen's tricycles do. It is, therefore, in my opinion, a carriage, and, being a carriage, it is made by the terms of the Act of Parliament liable to pay the toll."

In that case the words of a special Act, 7 Geo. 3, c. lxiii, by which the owner of the bridge was authorised to collect tolls, were:

B "For every coach . . . or other carriage whatsoever with four wheels the sum of fourpence and with less than four wheels the sum of twopence."

That was an Act allowing a toll to be imposed on a carriage other than those which had been enumerated by name, and it was held that a bicycle was a "carriage."

In Williams v. Ellis (3) the words of a local Turnpike Act, 3 Wm. 4, c. lv, which imposed the tolls, were:

C "For every horse, mule, or other beast drawing any coach, sociable, chariot, berlin, landau, vis-a-vis, barouche, phaeton, curricie . . . For every carriage of whatever description, and for whatever purpose, which should be drawn or impelled, or set or kept in motion by steam or any other power or agency . . ."

D The words "or any other power" had to be construed ejusdem generis with "kept in motion by steam or any other power," and, therefore, the court held that a bicycle was not caught by those particular words. To the same effect was the later case of Simpson v. Teignmouth & Shaldon Bridge Co. (4) where s. 18 of 5 Geo. 4, c. cxiv, after enumerating these various coaches, provided ". . . and for every other carriage hung on springs . . ." The court came to the conclusion that a bicycle did not come within any of the words in that section.

E In spite of the argument of counsel for the appellant, however, I am clearly of opinion that the words of s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, are wide enough to include a bicycle under the expression "carriage," whether it is a tradesman's bicycle or tricycle or the ordinary private bicycle, which was the case here. That being so, the appellant was lawfully arrested, and, therefore, he was in lawful custody at the police station.

DOUGLAS v. DOUGLAS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), July 13, 14, 25, 1950.]

Divorce—Connivance—Suspicion of adulterous association—Watching and eaves-dropping—Opportunity created for adultery—No intention to promote or encourage adultery—Motive only to obtain evidence.

The husband petitioned for dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery. Suspecting an adulterous association with the co-respondent he asked her about it, but she denied that the co-respondent had any hold over her. Not satisfied with this answer the husband arranged a speaking apparatus and spyhole so that he could hear conversation between his wife and the co-respondent when they were alone together in the kitchen so that he might ascertain what happened between them. What he saw and heard confirmed his suspicions, and he engaged inquiry agents and made an excuse to absent himself from the house so that the agents could watch. The agents saw the wife committing adultery during the husband's absence. There was no evidence to show that the husband had done anything to bring about the illicit association between his wife and the co-respondent, nor that he desired it.

HELD: (i) once a husband suspects that an adulterous association between his wife and another man has started he is not guilty of connivance simply because he watches for proof of adultery, or even creates an opportunity for it, for he is not consenting to the inception of adultery but is seeking for proof of its repetition. To obtain the proof he may even acquiesce in the continuance of the adultery, but that is not connivance, for in connivance it is essential that there should be a corrupt intention.

(ii) on the evidence the husband did not intend to encourage or promote an adulterous association by absenting himself on a false excuse, but was merely seeking proof of what already he rightly believed to exist, and, therefore, he was entitled to a decree.

APPEAL by a husband from the judgment of His Honour JUDGE WHITMEE, sitting as commissioner in divorce, dated Mar. 30, 1950, dismissing the husband's petition for divorce presented on the ground of the wife's adultery. The commissioner found adultery proved—and that finding was not contested in the Court of Appeal—but he came to the conclusion that the husband had connived at the wife's adultery. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Nield, K.C., and Hines for the appellant.

Havers, K.C., and C. J. A. Doughty for the respondent and co-respondent.

Curr. adv. vult.

July 25. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is a husband's petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent. After a first hearing the commissioner adjourned the case as the cross-examination for the wife, in his view, raised issues of connivance and condonation which ought to be pleaded. The pleadings were, therefore, amended. At the adjourned hearing the commissioner found that adultery had been committed and this finding was not challenged before us, though it was in issue at the trial. He felt, however, that he was bound, reluctantly as he said, to come to the conclusion that the husband had connived at that adultery. The plea of condonation was abandoned. He felt that on the facts the case was covered by a decision of this court in Manning v. Manning, Fellows v. Fellows (1), to which I will refer later.

Before setting out the facts I will state the principles of law as laid down by this court in the recent case of Churchman v. Churchman (2). The main issue in that appeal was whether the wording of s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, had altered the law by placing on the petitioner an increased burden of proving that he had not been guilty of connivance. It was suggested that the wording of the new Act had created a presumption of connivance. In the considered judgment of the court delivered by LORD MERRIMAN, P., this was expressly negatived. Connivance must be strictly proved and the presumption of law has always been, and remains, against connivance. The issue involved a consideration of earlier authorities and there are statements of the law which are relevant to the present issue. Thus LORD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 194):

" . . . it is of the essence of connivance that it precedes the event and generally speaking, the material event is the inception of the adultery, and not its repetition, although the facts may be such that connivance at the continuance of an adulterous association shows that the husband must be taken to have connived at it from the first."

The judgment later refers to the difficulty created by attempts to lay down general principles of wider application than were necessary for deciding the particular case, and then this passage follows (ibid., p. 195):

" In our opinion it is of the utmost importance to bear in mind that the issue is whether on the facts of the particular case the husband was or was not guilty of the corrupt intention of promoting or encouraging either the initiation or the continuance of the wife's adultery . . ."

There was some discussion before us as to the word "corrupt." It may be difficult to envisage an intention to encourage adultery which is not "corrupt." It certainly emphasises what is also stated to be "all important", namely, the husband's "state of mind."

I would like to add a word on the necessity of connivance being strictly proved. It is stated in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed., p. 131, that at the end of the case the court must be satisfied that there has been no connivance, but it need only be satisfied on a balance of probabilities and not beyond reasonable doubt. This seems to put a somewhat greater burden on the husband than is placed on him by Churchman v. Churchman (2). It implies, I think, that, if the balance of probabilities was in favour of connivance, that would be sufficient for the court to find connivance, but Churchman v. Churchman (2) assimilates connivance to matrimonial offences of which strict proof is required. It affects an important issue in the present appeal. In considering the issue of connivance, the inception of the adulterous association may be of great importance. If the balance of probabilities leads to the conclusion that the adultery began at or about a certain date, that date ought, I think, to be taken in considering the issue of connivance, although adultery at that time might not be sufficiently proved for the purpose of granting a decree.

I will turn to the facts. The parties were married in June, 1936. At all material dates the husband was the licensee of the Queen's Head Hotel, Nayland, in which he and his wife worked, he mostly in the bar and she in the kitchen. The commissioner in substance accepted the husband's evidence, which, he thought, was given with commendable frankness. In 1944 the co-respondent, Mr. Webb, who is a married man, for reasons which are not material began taking his meals at the Queen's Head. He became a friend of both husband and wife, and used to help from time to time in odd jobs. No suspicion of any kind arose as to the relationship of the wife and Mr. Webb for four years. In August, 1948, the husband noticed, he thought, a slight change in his wife's attitude. She seemed to side with the co-respondent against him. He spoke to her two or three times. She assured him that the co-respondent had no hold over her, and told him not to be silly. At the end of November or beginning of December he heard his wife say to the co-respondent: "Don't be a bloody fool, do you want to break my home up?" The husband spoke to his wife and she again assured him that the co-respondent had no hold over her. He remained suspicious. He was, he says, determined to find out the truth. He adjusted the speaking apparatus from bar to kitchen so that he could hear what was said in the kitchen. He also removed a bolt so that he could see into the kitchen. Accepting, as the commissioner did, the husband as an honest witness, there is no doubt in my mind that he would have been greatly satisfied if his observations had shown his suspicions to be without foundation. There is no suggestion that he had ceased to care for his wife. They had a daughter aged 11, and the wife helped in running the Queen's Head. He was greatly distressed as proofs of her clandestine association with the co-respondent led him to the conclusion that his married life was at an end. When adultery was finally proved, he said: "My world had gone to pieces," and he was in a most distressed state. Just before Christmas, 1948, he heard his wife and the co-respondent having high words. The co-respondent said that she was "only one of his wives." She said: "I am degraded. I have sunk as low as I can and you cannot deny it." Just after Christmas the husband heard his wife tell the co-respondent that she was late in her periods. The husband said that this proved to him beyond doubt that his marriage was finished. In so far as it is necessary on the issue of connivance I would hold that an adulterous association existed at this date between the wife and the co-respondent. The husband was asked why he did not forbid the co-respondent to come to the house. His answer was that if he had sent him away they would have met elsewhere. He was determined to get the evidence of what he believed was going on. He said that, if he had charged them before he had full evidence, he would have been ridiculed with cruel words. The husband continued to share a bed with his wife up to Feb. 12. About a week before Christmas he took his wife to the doctor and she said the doctor advised that there should be no sexual intercourse until she was better and that was over a month. The questions and answers are not quite clear, but I think the right inference is that there were no sexual relations after that date. It was on that occasion that his wife called him by the co-respondent's christian name, and he later heard an intimate conversation between his wife and the co-respondent on the subject of underclothes. He heard other intimate conversations from time to time which he did not wish to mention. He was upset and the commissioner intervened, so he was not pressed for details. On Jan. 31 he saw his wife sitting in an armchair and the co-respondent sitting on a chair by her side with his hand up her clothes. On the next day he heard the co-respondent promising her money and a fur coat. At about this date he instructed solicitors and through them inquiry agents.

The acts primarily relied on as constituting connivance arose on Feb. 11, but counsel for the wife also relied on events up to this date. The application of the law as laid down in Churchman v. Churchman (2) to particular facts may well raise difficult problems. In the present case, as it seems to me, the husband was not intending to encourage or promote an adulterous association but was seeking proof of what from Christmas he rightly believed to exist. In every case in which a husband who believes his wife is committing adultery has her watched, it can be said that, if he warned her she was going to be watched, no act of adultery would have taken place on that occasion. It would be absurd to suggest that this in itself amounted to connivance: see Mudge v. Mudge (3). The inquiry agents had been at the Queen's Head since about the end of January, though it is not clear if they had been there continuously. It was suggested by them that the husband should find some excuse to absent himself. This was done. The excuse was untrue. The agents watched and one of them saw the wife and the co-respondent having sexual intercourse. This evidence was accepted by the commissioner. The petition alleged adultery on Feb. 11, and on divers dates unknown to the husband prior thereto. The commissioner felt unable to find any adultery before Feb. 11. If there had been no issue of connivance, it may be that the strict proof required of adultery would not have been satisfied prior to Feb. 11. In considering connivance, however, regard must be paid to the husband's state of mind and it may lead to a conclusion as to the inception of the adultery on, at the best for the respondent, a balance of probabilities. On this basis the procedure adopted on Feb. 11 was, as I hold, a considerable time after the inception of the adulterous intercourse and cannot be relied on as connivance at what is "generally speaking the material event," namely, the inception. If it is suggested that it is connivance at its continuance, then does it show that the husband must be taken to have connived at it from the first? Everything, it seems to me, points in the opposite direction. I am satisfied the husband regarded this association as a disaster. He cannot be taken to have intended to encourage and promote it. His intention was to get evidence of what he believed existed, an association which meant that "his world had gone to pieces."

The commissioner gave a careful and clear judgment. With respect, I think he went wrong in considering the issue of connivance on the basis that no adultery had been committed before February 11. He was not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the "inception" was not earlier. He said: "It is equally probable that Feb. 11 was the first occasion." I think myself that the balance of probabilities was greatly in favour of adultery before Feb. 11. Then the commissioner felt himself bound by Manning v. Manning, Fellows v. Fellows (1) reluctantly to hold that the husband was guilty of connivance. In that appeal two petitions were involved, one by Mr. Manning on the ground of the adultery of his wife with Mr. Fellows. The other by Mrs. Fellows on the ground of the adultery of her husband with Mrs. Manning. There are, undoubtedly, points of similarity. There was a microphone used. Normal married life, including in that case intercourse, was continued after suspicions had been aroused and while steps were being taken to detect the adultery. The adultery, in that case the only adultery, relied on in the petition was on an occasion when Mr. Manning told his wife he would be away for the night. He then went to the garage to listen at the microphone and as a result of what he heard returned and found the parties in the act of adultery.

It is, I think, dangerous, particularly in this area where the state of mind of the husband is all important, to argue from the facts of one case in deciding another. In Manning v. Manning, Fellows v. Fellows (1), the trial judge clearly found that the two petitioners were acting in concert. He also found this ([1950] 1 All E.R. 604):

"I find as a fact that she [Mrs. Manning] did, as she says, request her husband to be allowed to drop the friendship with the Fellows. The fact that this request was refused confirms me in concluding that from a time certainly as early as August Mr. Manning and Mrs. Fellows, so far from attempting to stop the association between their spouses, not only acquiesced in its continuance, but did all they could to foster and encourage it, while at the same time taking pains to conceal from their spouses what they already knew and suspected."

HODSON, J., in the Court of Appeal, regarded the interview between Mr. and Mrs. Manning as affecting Mr. Manning only. I think the trial judge regarded it as a step in a joint plan. There seems to me to have been evidence in that case on which the judge could well find that from the outset the two persons hoped that the association would become adulterous, and, so far from regarding that as the end of the world in which they had hoped to live, were anxious that it should happen. The procedure adopted on the final occasion was a step in the carrying out of this intention formed some time earlier. Mrs. Manning asked her husband to protect her from a man who was, she felt, getting a hold over her. The present wife, when taxed, told her husband not to be silly as the co-respondent had no hold over her. I do not think Manning v. Manning, Fellows v. Fellows (1) is an authority which compels me to find connivance in this case. It does not appear from the report that Churchman v. Churchman (2) was cited. Although, I think, there was clearly evidence in that case on which the judge could find connivance, there is a passage in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J., ([1950] 1 All E.R. 602), which, taken out of its context, might be read as inconsistent with what was laid down in Churchman v. Churchman (2). I refer to the passage in which BUCKNILL, L.J. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 603), referred to the fact that Mr. Manning was acting on his solicitor's advice and to his desire to find out whether his wife was unfaithful as irrelevant and immaterial. They may well have been so in that case and generally, but if the petitioner's state of mind is important I can imagine circumstances in which they might be relevant. The commissioner in the present case would, I think, have regarded the fact that the husband was acting on his solicitor's advice as material but for the passage to which I have referred. In the next sentence BUCKNILL, L.J., said the question was whether the petitioner encouraged and promoted the adultery which took place on Oct. 2. It is clear from the rest of the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J., that that question had to be answered not merely by considering the fact that on that occasion the husband said he was going to be away for the night, but in the light of the whole previous history. These are difficult cases and I agree with what was said in Churchman v. Churchman (2) as to the danger of laying down general rules, but for the reasons I have given I do not think the husband here was guilty of connivance. The appeal, therefore, should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: The question in this case is whether a husband, who suspects his wife of adultery, is entitled to keep watch on her or to lay a trap for her. The answer depends on whether his conduct amounts to connivance. The principle on which connivance is founded is volenti non fit injuria. That was laid down by LORD STOWELL in Forster v. Forster (4) (1 Hag. Con. 146), and by SIR JOHN NICHOLL in Rogers v. Rogers (5) (3 Hag. Ecc. 58), and has never been doubted since. Now volenti is very different from scienti. It is not the knowledge of what may occur which bars a husband from complaining. It is his consent to it. A husband cannot complain of his wife's adultery if he has theretofore, by his words or conduct, consented to it taking place, but the consent, to be a bar, must be a consent to the inception of the adultery.

A LORD CHELMSFORD in Gipps v. Gipps and Hume (6), said (11 H.L. Cas. 28):

"It must be borne in mind that the offence of adultery is complete in a single instance of guilty connection with a married woman. It is the first act which constitutes the crime, and though the adulterous intercourse between the parties should continue for years, there is not a fresh adultery upon every repetition of the guilty acts, although all and each of them may furnish proof of the adultery itself."

In that passage LORD CHELMSFORD recognises the fact—for fact it is—that the first act of adultery marks a turning point in the relationship of the guilty pair. It means that they have swept aside all scruples and committed themselves beyond recall. Thereafter repetition becomes easy and, I fear, likely.

C The material event, therefore, as this court pointed out in Churchman v. Churchman (2) is the inception of the adultery and not its repetition. It follows that the consent of the husband which is to bar his claim must be a consent to the adultery before it starts.

When this is realised it becomes plain that, once a husband suspects that an adulterous intrigue has already started, he is not guilty of connivance simply because he watches for proof of it. He is not then consenting to the inception of adultery, but only seeking for proof of its repetition. In order to obtain the proof, he may even acquiesce in its continuance, but that is not connivance. In every case where a husband or his agents keeps watch on his wife, to see if she is keeping an illicit assignment, he can be said to acquiesce in her adultery, because he has only to warn her beforehand that she will be watched and she will abstain from keeping the appointment. Such acquiescence has never been held to be connivance. The reason is because in connivance it is essential that there should be a corrupt intention on his part. This was pointed out by

E LORD STOWELL in Hoar v. Hoar (7) and has been repeatedly affirmed since. Now, a man who sets watch on his wife, whom he suspects of adultery, cannot be said to have a corrupt intention. He is seeking to discover the offence, not to promote it or encourage it. Some people may think it discreditable of him to spy on her, but on balance it is more to the good of the community that he should be at liberty to find out her guilt by keeping watch than that she should escape with impunity. That was the rule of the civil law as appears from a passage from SANCHEZ DE MATRIMONIO (1654) (Lib. X, disp. 12, no. 52), which I will translate into English:

G "A man who suspects his wife of adultery is allowed to keep watch on her with suitable witnesses, so that he may give proof of her adultery: for that is not conniving at her sin, but discovering her guilt so that he can get his remedy. It is one thing to request, counsel or command evil to be done, that is not allowed. But is it quite another thing to permit, or not to interfere with the doing of evil. That is sometimes allowed as being the greater good."

H That passage was quoted with approval by LORD STOWELL in Timmings v. Timmings (8) (3 Hag. Ecc. 82), and by DR. LUSHINGTON in Phillips v. Phillips (9) (1844) 1 Rob. Ecc. 159), and I do not doubt that it is as valid in our law as it was in the civil law. In Mudge v. Mudge (3), where the parties were separated, HODSON, J., held that the husband who kept watch was not guilty of connivance, and in Harrison v. Harrison (10), recently before this court, where husband and wife were still sleeping in the same bed, no one suggested that his watching of her clandestine meetings amounted to connivance and we granted a decree.

This case goes one step further than watching, because the husband deliberately left the house so as to let the guilty pair believe they were alone, and then had them watched. By so doing he not merely acquiesced in the adultery. He created an opportunity for it. Does this added element make him guilty of connivance where mere watching would not? I think not. This court is not concerned with the ethics of the matter. The question is: Which is the greater evil—to allow the adultery to continue undetected and unproved, or to allow the husband to get his proof by creating an opportunity for it? My answer is that, if a husband honestly believes that adultery has already taken place, it is very necessary that his suspicions should either be confirmed or disproved. Merely asking his wife about it may not suffice. The circumstances may be such that the husband cannot be expected to accept the bare denial of the guilty pair. They often deny the truth. It is better that he should be able to get their adultery proved or disproved, even by creating an opportunity for it, rather than that the suspicion of it should continue to ruin his peace of mind and his home. It is altogether different if he throws them together before he believes that adultery has taken place. If he sees an association ripening into close friendship and then promotes and encourages it to turn into adultery, he is guilty of connivance. He then has a corrupt intention because he is not seeking to prove an existing offence, but is trying to provoke a new one. He is then truly an agent provocateur. So, also, if he, being already guilty himself, wants a divorce for his own reasons, and then throws his suspected wife into temptation so as to get proof for his own ends. That is also a corrupt intention, but when an innocent husband is only seeking to discover proof of an adulterous intrigue which he believes is already going on, the creation of an opportunity for it is not of itself connivance. In support of this view, perhaps, I may quote further from SANCHEZ DE MATRIMONIO (Lib. X, disp. 12, no. 52):

“Gamekeepers who absent themselves in order that poachers may come freely and take game are to be punished: but if they do so in order that the poachers may return and be caught, they should be excused. So also a husband cannot complain of adultery which his wife commits with his knowledge and approval; but that is not so when his dissimulation is not by way of consent but in order to gain proof of her adultery.”

If it be objected that this view involves an inquiry into the husband's belief, that is, into his state of mind, I say that is just as it should be. It is clear that in this case, if the commissioner had been satisfied that the wife had committed adultery before the fatal night, the husband would not be guilty of connivance, because he could not then be said to have consented to the inception of it. His guilt or innocence cannot depend, however, on the view which a court may ultimately take of the evidence before it, which may be different from that which the husband had before him. It must depend on the husband's state of mind at the time. That has always been laid down right from Phillips v. Phillips (9) to Churchman v. Churchman (2). And when considering his state of mind, it must be remembered that he is presumed to be innocent of connivance. He may reasonably believe that his wife is indulging in an adulterous intrigue on evidence which would be quite insufficient to establish it in a court of law. When there are reasonable grounds for his belief, his conduct in testing his belief is not evidence of connivance, because he must, in fairness, be given the credit of believing it and of seeking only for the necessary proof. If there are no reasonable grounds for his belief, a suspicion of connivance arises, because it may be inferred that he did not in fact believe it. If he then promotes and encourages an act of adultery, by throwing the pair together, he may be called on to explain it because at the end of the case the court must be satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that there was no connivance, Emanuel v. Emanuel (11).

A The case of Manning v. Manning, Fellows v. Fellows (1) is distinguishable. As HODSON, J., pointed out, that case, as pleaded and fought, concerned one act of adultery only, and that act was clearly promoted and encouraged by the petitioners. The court was not asked to consider whether the adultery had started earlier, or whether the petitioners honestly believed that it had, or what the effect in law would be of such a belief. So the points which we have been considering did not arise. The decision itself is not open to question because the connivance at the continuance of the adulterous association was so provocative that the petitioners must be taken to have connived at it from the first, an exceptional state of affairs which was envisaged in Churchman v. Churchman (2).

B Applying those principles in this case, the conduct of the husband may be divided into two parts. (i) After his suspicions were aroused, he watched and eavesdropped. That did not amount to connivance. He then heard and saw things which gave him reasonable grounds for believing that they were indulging in an adulterous intrigue. He lacked the proof necessary to establish it in a court of law, but nevertheless he had reasonable grounds for believing it. C He should, therefore, be given the credit of believing it and of seeking only for the necessary proof. (ii) In the course of his search, he created an opportunity for adultery, by purposely leaving the pair together alone. That does not in the circumstances give rise even to a suspicion of connivance. The appeal should, therefore, be allowed.

D BUCKNILL, L.J.: I agree that the appeal should be allowed and wish to add a few words on one point only. In the course of my judgment in Manning v. Manning, Fellows v. Fellows (1), I said in effect that the point that Mr. Manning was acting on the advice of his solicitors was irrelevant. I did not intend this statement to mean that such action was irrelevant to the question as to the state of Mr. Manning's mind on the subject of his wife's possible or E probable adultery with the co-respondent. I intended to say that if Mr. Manning deliberately encouraged and promoted his wife's adultery the fact that he did so on the advice of his solicitors did not, in my opinion, protect him against the charge of connivance. I also said in my judgment that the question whether the husband's only desire was to find out whether the wife was unfaithful was immaterial, and that the question was whether he had F encouraged and promoted the adultery proved to have taken place on the particular occasion charged. I did not intend my words to mean that I thought that the state of mind of the spouse charged with connivance is in all cases irrelevant. At the same time when one is considering the question of connivance in this case, the relevance of the state of the husband's mind on Feb. 11 when he deliberately went away from his house in order to leave the wife G and the co-respondent alone there, raises in my mind a question of some doubt and difficulty. Primarily I think that the court should consider the husband's conduct objectively, i.e., should consider what its natural and probable result would be with regard to encouraging and promoting the wife's adultery, rather than consider his intention. At the same time I cannot say that his intention was irrelevant to the question of connivance.

H The questions in this difficult case seem to me to be: (a) Was the adultery which was proved to have been committed on Feb. 11 the natural and probable result of the husband's conduct in leaving his wife and the co-respondent alone on that date? (b) Did the husband desire his said conduct to promote his wife's adultery? (c) Did his said conduct in fact encourage and promote adultery? As regards (a) I do not think it is proved that the adultery was the natural and probable consequence of the husband's absence. As regards (b) I think the evidence shows that he did not so desire it. As regards (c) I think the husband's conduct made the adultery more easy and therefore more likely. To this extent I must hold that his absence promoted the adultery. For these reasons in the particular circumstances of this case I do not think the husband connived at the wife's adultery on Feb. 11, the only date on which adultery is proved to have occurred.

Appeal allowed with £500 damages against co-respondent, no costs to wife in Court of Appeal or below. Co-respondent to pay husband's costs of both hearings. A

R. v. LOWER MUNSLOW JUSTICES. Ex parte PUDGE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Finnemore, JJ.), July 25, 26, 1950.] C

Justices—Bias—Application for possession of cottage—Clerk to justices having acted for vendor of cottage on sale to applicant several years previously—Advice to justices on evidence—Comment after decision of justices—Conclusion of justices that no case to answer—Decision announced during respondent's examination, and before cross-examination. D

The applicant, the owner of a farm, claimed possession of a cottage under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838. A week's notice had been given, and the issue was whether the tenancy in question was a weekly or a yearly one. The applicant called evidence to prove his case, and the tenant was giving evidence when the justices announced that the application would be dismissed as they thought the tenancy was a yearly tenancy. An application was made for an order of certiorari to quash this decision on the ground that the clerk to the justices had acted for the vendor when the estate on which was the cottage in question was sold to the applicant in 1946, that because of his personal knowledge of the subject-matter of the application for possession he was not fit to act as clerk during the adjudication, and that he gave or appeared to give information to the justices during the hearing. In an affidavit the chairman of the bench said that "the clerk said nothing during the hearing to the magistrates except that, in face of the receipts and the respondent's evidence, it did not appear to be a weekly tenancy. Immediately after I had given the decision of the court the clerk . . . said . . . that he acted for the vendor on the sale of the farm to the applicant and happened to know that at that time the respondent was a yearly tenant." It was further contended that the action of the justices in announcing their decision before the tenant had been cross-examined amounted to a denial of justice or a failure to demonstrate that justice was being done.

HELD: (i) the facts that the clerk to the justices had acted in his capacity as a solicitor for a previous owner of the property who was not a party to the litigation before the court and that he had personal knowledge of the matters before the court did not debar him from sitting as a clerk, and it was proper for him to advise the justices on the evidence which had been given. There was no impropriety in his saying, after the decision had been announced, that he knew the tenancy was a yearly tenancy at the time he acted for the vendor years before. H

(ii) the justices were entitled at any time after the applicant had closed his case to give a decision against him, just as they could have done immediately at the end of his case, and in all the circumstances there was no bias or denial of natural justice.

[AS TO THE INTEREST OF JUSTICES' CLERK AND THE BIAS OF JUSTICES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 21, pp. 541, 542, paras. 957, 958; and FOR A CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 33, pp. 292-301, Nos. 83-157, and Digest Supp.]

APPLICATION for an order of certiorari to bring before the court and quash a decision of justices for the Lower Munslow petty sessional division of Shropshire dismissing the applicant's summons for possession of a cottage under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

B C. N. Shawcross, K.C., and Conway Clifford for the applicant.
Ronald Davies for the tenant.
C. S. S. Burt for the justices.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : Counsel for the applicant has moved for a writ of certiorari, addressed to the justices of Shropshire sitting in the division of Lower Munslow, to bring up and quash an order made by them dismissing an application which the applicant made for possession of a cottage in the occupation of a Mrs. Bowen. Leave was obtained on an affidavit stating matters which, had they been true, would have constituted very grave misconduct on the part of the clerk to the justices. The statement was this:

D "The grounds of the application are as follows:—(1) The clerk of the said court [Mr. Malan] was (unknown to the said applicant) so related to the matters upon which the said adjudication or purported adjudication depended and had such personal knowledge of the same, that he was not fit to act as clerk, but nevertheless did so act and thereby caused, or created a suspicion that he caused, an improper interference with the course of justice. (2) During the course of the hearing preceding the said adjudication or purported adjudication the said clerk from his personal knowledge of the said matters, gave, or appeared to give, to the magistrates composing the said court information concerning the same, in such wise as to be partially audible and partially inaudible to persons then present. (3) The said court acted, or appeared to act, upon the information so given, or appearing to be so given, as aforesaid."

F So what is said is: "Here is a clerk who has been interested in this matter and he has been surreptitiously giving evidence in the case, in the sense that he has been informing the justices of matters within his own personal knowledge." Of course, if such a thing were done, it would be a matter of the gravest moment. It would certainly be a ground for certiorari, and it might be a ground for G putting forward strong recommendations to the bench that they had better get rid of their clerk.

But what are the facts we now know? The only possible connection which the clerk to the justices had with this matter was that in 1946 his firm were concerned as the solicitors for the vendors of the estate on which this cottage happened to be situate, on the sale of it to the applicant. During the negotiations requisitions on title were put in and answered, and it is not without some significance that the answer that was given to a requisition with regard to the tenancy of the cottage now in question was that it was held on a yearly tenancy. No objection to Mr. Malan sitting was taken by the applicant at the time, but it is now brought against him, in support of the charge that is made against him of being so connected with this matter that he was not fit to act as clerk, that he answered that requisition. It seems to me that, if we were to hold such a thing as that, it would be extending the doctrine of "bias" to the most H unreasonable extent. The only connection which this clerk to the justices, in his capacity as a solicitor, had had with the matter was that he had acted, not for any party to this litigation, but for a previous owner. Is it to be said that because a gentleman who is not only a practising solicitor but also holds the office of clerk to the justices acts for client A in some transaction which A may have with B, he is thereafter for all time prohibited from sitting as clerk to the justices in a case in which any question arises with regard to the subject-matter of the property he sold? I cannot believe that it would be right to hold any such thing, nor would it be right to say that because a clerk to justices may have some personal knowledge of matters which come before his bench he is thereby debarred from sitting as clerk. Everybody who has experience of these matters and has gone circuit knows that clerks to justices in the country are usually leading solicitors in the district. The clerk probably knows a great deal about everybody's affairs in the neighbourhood. He certainly knows a good deal about the defendants who appear before the justices occasionally—those we may call their “regular customers”—and it would be an astonishing doctrine to lay down, that because a justices' clerk knows something about the matter before the court and his knowledge has been acquired owing to a transaction he has had with some previous person connected with the subject-matter of the litigation he is thereby debarred from acting as clerk. Of course, if he communicates his knowledge to the justices and tells them facts which would mean that he was giving evidence behind the backs of the parties and not being subjected to cross-examination, he would be acting most improperly.

The chairman of the justices has made an affidavit in which he says:

“The clerk of the court said nothing during the hearing to the magistrates, except that, in face of the receipts and the respondent's evidence, it did not appear to be a weekly tenancy.”

That was a perfectly proper thing for the justices' clerk to say because the justices were entitled to rely on the advice of their clerk on such matters, and he was rightly advising them on the evidence that was given. Then the chairman says:

“Immediately after I had given the decision of the court, the clerk said to the magistrates that he acted for the vendor on the sale of the farm to the applicant, and happened to know that at that time the respondent was a yearly tenant.”

Is it contrary to natural justice, does it give an appearance that justice has not been done, that, when justices have given their decision and thereby are functus officio, their clerk says: “I think you are quite right in this case, because I happen to know that this was a yearly tenancy and not a weekly tenancy”? He had given no advice to the justices during the case, except on the evidence produced, and the fact that he made a casual remark at the end of the case neither showed bias, nor did it indicate that justice had not manifestly been done. The clerk to the justices has made an affidavit in the same terms, and the court accepts his affidavit and that of the chairman. No affidavit has been filed reiterating the charge that was made in the affidavit for leave, and we are satisfied that we have to decide this case on the basis that there is no suggestion whatever to be made against the conduct of the clerk during the hearing of the case. We are unable to say that, because the clerk in 1946 acted for the vendors of the estate on which this cottage was situate, that prevents him from acting as clerk in a case where proceedings are taken under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, by the new landlord for the ejectment of the tenant of the cottage. If the clerk had acted for Mrs. Bowen, the tenant, at any time, that would have been an entirely different matter, but that is not the fact, and, therefore, there is no ground for saying there was any impropriety or bias on the part of the clerk.

A The applicant further complains that the justices stopped the hearing of his application for possession while the tenant was giving evidence and before she was cross-examined and before the applicant's solicitor had an opportunity to address the justices. The chairman says that they stopped the case because, in view of the receipts for rent which had been put in (indicating at what intervals rent had been paid) they were unanimously of the opinion that it was not a weekly tenancy. Perhaps it would have been better if the justices had done this before the tenant had gone into the witness box, but how can it be said that what occurred amounted to a denial of natural justice?

I am of opinion that we should not grant certiorari in this case, and that the application should be dismissed.

B BYRNE, J. : The court is asked to say that the behaviour of the justices and their clerk amounted to a denial of justice or a failure to demonstrate that justice had been done. It is to be observed that, although originally there was a very grave charge made against the clerk, that charge has now been abandoned, and it is alleged that he took part in this failure to demonstrate that justice was being done by sharing in an adjudication in which he had at some time had some kind of interest. It is, therefore, important to see what
C interest it could possibly be said he had ever had in the matter. It turns out that he had acted for the vendors on the sale to the applicant of the farm on which this cottage was. It would be very difficult to think of any more remote connection with the matter than that. When the justices had arrived at their decision, the clerk informed the chairman that he had so acted, and that is also alleged as a ground on which we should say that justice was not done.
D I fail to see that that in any way is indicative of any denial of justice or indicative of a failure to demonstrate that justice was being done, because it was an observation made by the clerk to the chairman of the bench after the justices had given their decision. Thus, so far as the clerk is concerned, it appears to me that there is nothing in this matter at all.

E With regard to the justices, it is said that they should not have stopped the case after the tenant had given evidence-in-chief, but that they should have permitted the applicant's solicitor to cross-examine her and to make submissions to them. It is said that there again there was a failure to demonstrate that justice was being done. Is it right for justices, if at the close of the case for the applicant they think there is a case to answer, but, on reflection while the defendant is giving evidence, they come to the conclusion that they were wrong,
F to stop the case then, or are they obliged to wait till the defendant is cross-examined and addresses or submissions have been made to them? In my opinion, they are not called on to pursue that latter course. If they come to the conclusion that they have made a mistake in thinking there was a case to answer, there is no reason why they should permit the defendant to be subjected to cross-examination. On the affidavit of the chairman, it appears that that G is precisely what happened here. I agree with my Lord that this application for certiorari fails.

FINNEMORE, J. : I also agree. Originally, very serious allegations were made against the clerk. It was alleged that in the course of the case he imparted to the justices knowledge of his own which vitally affected the case. He was alleged to have told them that he himself knew that the tenancy was H a yearly tenancy when it was being alleged by the applicant that it was a weekly one and a week's notice only had been given. If he had done that, it is unnecessary to say that it would have been highly improper. In his affidavit the clerk says he did not tell the bench that. The chairman of the justices also says that he did not make any such communication to them and that allegation was not persisted in before this court. It is still said, however, that what is called natural justice was denied to the applicant and that justice did not manifestly appear to be done, because some three years before the clerk had acted on behalf of the vendors when this property was sold to the applicant. In the course of that sale naturally he knew something about this tenancy, and the court has seen in the documents in answer to requisitions on title the statement that this was a yearly tenancy. The clerk had no concern whatever with the matter after the sale had been completed. He never at any time had anything whatever to do with Mrs. Bowen, the tenant, nor, once the sale had been completed, had he anything whatever to do with the applicant. It is true that after the case had been decided, he told the justices that in fact he did know from his previous experience that this tenancy was a yearly one, as the justices had found on the evidence of the documents which were placed before them. I agree that that is a very long way from supporting a charge of bias or one of lack of natural justice or lack of appearance of justice, and, in my opinion, such a state of facts could not be held to disentitle a clerk from acting. The other matter alleged is that the justices, having heard the applicant, then heard the tenant, who gave evidence, and before she had completed her evidence and been cross-examined, the chairman said: "We dismiss this application. The court thinks the tenancy was not a weekly one but a yearly one." That was plainly a decision they could have made at the end of the case for the applicant. On the documents we have seen, though we are not concerned with the merits, it appears obvious that there was at least ground for the justices saying: "This weekly tenancy has not been proved; therefore, the application fails." If the applicant was dissatisfied with that decision in law, he would have been able, as my Lord has said, to ask for a Case to be stated. He did not do that. His advocate said: "This is a very extraordinary decision." When asked why, he said: "I have had no opportunity of cross-examining the said tenant concerning her said tenancy or any other matter, and I have not been invited or permitted to address the said court concerning the same." He does not seem to have persisted very much in that. He does not appear to have said he wanted to address the court, and it may well be that, had he done so, the result would have been the same. Speaking for myself, I think it is often wiser for the court to invite, or to allow, the party against whom the decision is being given to address the court, if he so wishes, but there is no bounden duty to do so that I can see. They had heard the opening, in which the applicant had set out the whole of his case. They had heard the evidence. That evidence, quite plainly, from what the chairman says, had not only failed to satisfy them that this was a weekly tenancy, but they were satisfied it was not. Therefore it followed that the notice given was an insufficient notice, and the application was bound to be refused. I, therefore, agree that there has been no denial of natural justice, as it is called, and no reason at all why the writ of certiorari should issue.

Application refused.

HOLLOWAY v. MOBBERLEY & PERRY, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.J.J.), July 19, 28, 1950.]

Workmen's Compensation—Industrial disease—Certificate of disablement given after July 5, 1948—Workman not insured against disease—National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946 (c. 62), s. 89 (1), proviso (a).

A A workman was employed for thirty years up to Oct. 11, 1946, as a hewer of coal. From that date until May, 1949, he was employed in the woodworking industry in respect of which employment he was insured as from the appointed day (July 5, 1948) under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946. On Aug. 29, 1949, a medical board certified him as totally incapacitated as from May 17, 1949, by pneumoconiosis which was due to his employment as a hewer. By s. 55 (1) of the Act of 1946, compensation for industrial disease developed on or after the appointed day is payable only if the disease is due to the nature of the employment in respect of which the workman is insured under the Act. By s. 89 (1) it is provided that workmen's compensation shall not be payable in respect of any employment on or after the appointed day, provided that "(a) the said enactments shall continue to apply to cases to which they would have applied if this Act had not been passed, being cases where a right to compensation arises or has arisen in respect of employment before the appointed day, except where in the case of [inter alia pneumoconiosis] the right does not arise before the appointed day and the workman, before it does arise, has been insured under this Act against that disease or injury." On the question whether the workman was entitled to workmen's compensation,

D HELD: although the right to compensation arose after the appointed day, the workman was not insured under the Act of 1946 against the disease from which he was suffering, and, therefore, he was not deprived of his right to claim workmen's compensation by the exception to the proviso to s. 89 (1) of that Act.

APPEAL by a workman from an order of His Honour JUDGE LANGMAN, made at Stourbridge County Court, and dated May 18, 1950, dismissing a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

G For the workman it was contended that, although the certificate of disablement was given after the appointed day under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, so that the right to compensation could be said to arise after that date, nevertheless, he was not insured under that Act against the disease in question, and, therefore, his claim was not excluded by s. 89 (1) (a) of the Act. Cur. adv. vult.

July 28. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J. (read by DENNING, L.J.): This is an appeal by a workman claiming compensation under the Coal Mining Industry (Pneumoconiosis) Compensation Scheme, 1943, made under s. 47 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, as extended by later Workmen's Compensation Acts. It is unnecessary to refer to s. 47 which gives, or the later Acts which extend, the power to make the scheme in question. The scheme applies to all workmen employed on or after July 1, 1943, in any operation underground in any coal-mine. The present workman was so employed. He was employed as a hewer for thirty years prior to Oct. 11, 1946. He was not after that date employed in any coal mine, but he was employed in the woodworking industry from October, 1946, to May, 1949. Since then he has done no work. On Aug. 29, 1949, a medical board certified him, or, as the employers would say, purported to certify him, in accordance with the Pneumoconiosis Scheme as totally incapacitated by pneumoconiosis from May 17, 1949. Although I shall refer later to some of the provisions of the scheme it is not disputed that, if the Workmen's Compensation Acts—including, of course, the schemes made under them—continued to apply to him, he is entitled to succeed. The National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, as from the appointed day, July 5, 1948, repealed the Workmen's Compensation Acts and substituted a new scheme for dealing with industrial injuries, the provisions of which are to be found in that Act. It provided, however, in s. 89 that the Workmen's Compensation Acts should continue to apply in certain cases, and the question is whether the workman's case is one to which they continue to apply. The learned county court judge decided that it was not, and from that decision the workman appeals.

The scheme follows the general lines on which industrial diseases were dealt with under the old code. It provides (para. 4) for certification by a medical board whether death or total or partial disablement is due to the industrial diseases covered by the scheme. Where the disease is due to employment in the industry, the workman or his dependents are entitled to claim compensation as if the disease were a personal injury by accident as provided by the Acts. By para. 5, if, as here, the workman has been employed in the industry for five years or more, the disease is deemed to be due to the employment unless the employer proves the contrary. By para. 6 the date of the injury is deemed to be the date on or from which the man is certified to be disabled. By para. 8 the compensation is recoverable from the employer who last employed the workman in the industry. Other employers, if any, who have employed the workman in the industry during the five years preceding the date of the injury are, subject to qualifications which do not matter, liable to make contributions to the last employer from whom the compensation was recoverable. I have set out these provisions because they assist in understanding the form of the provisions which have to be applied.

Section 89 (1) of the Act of 1946, on which this appeal turns, is as follows:

"Workmen's compensation shall not be payable in respect of any employment on or after the appointed day, and accordingly the enactments set out in sched. IX to this Act are hereby repealed as from that day to the extent mentioned in the third column of that schedule: Provided that—
(a) the said enactments shall continue to apply to cases to which they would have applied if this Act had not been passed, being cases where a right to compensation arises or has arisen in respect of employment before the appointed day, except where, in the case of a disease or injury prescribed for the purposes of Part IV of this Act, the right does not arise before the appointed day and the workman, before it does arise, has been insured under this Act against that disease or injury . . ."

Dealing first with the words before the proviso is reached, the workman was, on the appointed day, and up to May 15, 1949, employed in the woodworking industry. If he had sustained a personal injury in that industry after the appointed day the Workmen's Compensation Acts would have had no application. Under s. 1, of the Act of 1946, he could have claimed his benefits under that Act. I will now turn to the proviso. This proviso came before this court

A in Hales v. Bolton Leathers, Ltd. (1). The exact point argued there does not affect the present case. We held that the words down to the exception continue to apply the Workmen's Compensation Acts to cases where the right to compensation arises after the appointed day if it is in respect of employment before the appointed day. That case, like this, turned on the exception. It is not disputed that pneumoconiosis is a disease or injury prescribed for the purposes of Part IV of the Act. The exception provides that the Workmen's Compensation Acts shall not continue to apply even though the right to compensation is in respect of employment before the appointed day if two conditions are fulfilled, (i) the right does not arise before, that is, arises on or after the appointed day, and (ii) the workman has been insured under the Act of 1946 against that disease or injury.

B In the present case it seems to me plain that the workman's right to compensation arose in respect of employment before the appointed day. The employment to which the disease was due ceased in October, 1946. For reasons which we elaborated in Hales' case (1), "arises" means "arises at any time," so, unless taken out by the exception, the appeal must succeed. The first condition of the exception is fulfilled as the workman's right to compensation arose after the appointed day whether one takes the date of the certificate or the disablement. To see whether the second condition is fulfilled one has to turn to s. 55 (1) of the Act of 1946 which reads as follows:

D "Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, a person who is under this Act insured against personal injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment shall be insured also against any prescribed disease and against any prescribed personal injury not so caused, being a disease or injury due to the nature of that employment and developed on or after the appointed day."

E As I have said, the workman was insured in respect of his employment in the woodworking industry, but as his pneumoconiosis was not due to the nature of that employment he was not insured against pneumoconiosis under the Act of 1946. The second condition is not fulfilled, and under the opening words of the proviso to s. 89 (1) the Workmen's Compensation Acts continue to apply. This broadly was the argument as presented by counsel for the workman, and it seems to me plainly right unless we are constrained by authority to hold otherwise. If one asks oneself why it was necessary to have an exception, it was, I think, because an industrial disease is "in respect of employment" over a long period and complications would have arisen in the application of the opening words, for example, to a miner employed as such after the appointed day who developed pneumoconiosis, say, a year after that date.

F The authority relied on by the employers is a decision of this court, Harris v. Rotol, Ltd. (2). In that case the workman was certified on Aug. 17, 1949, under s. 43 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, as disabled by dermatitis as from Feb. 6, 1948—before the appointed day. It would seem clear that the right arose in respect of employment before the appointed day. The employers took a preliminary objection based on the repeal of the Workmen's Compensation Acts by the opening words of s. 89 (1). The employers sought to argue, in the first place, that the case was outside the opening words of the proviso. This seems to me clearly contrary to what was said in Hales' case (1). There was, however, scope for argument, and this seems to me to have been the only point argued, whether the first condition of the exception was fulfilled. In other words, as there is power to give a retrospective certificate of disablement, does the right to compensation arise when the certificate is signed or as from the certified date of disablement? The court held that, as s. 43 made the certificate a condition precedent, no right arose till it was given. The right to compensation, therefore, did not arise before the appointed day. It is a binding decision on this point, and if the workman in that case had been insured under the Act of 1946 against dermatitis, it would have defeated his claim, and the surgeon would have been functus officio. I can find no discussion on the question whether the workman was insured under the Act of 1946 against dermatitis. It may have been admitted or tacitly assumed that he was. It was, I think, unsatisfactory that the employers were allowed to take a preliminary objection, as, in deciding whether s. 89 (1) continues the application of the Workmen's Compensation Acts, the history of the workman and his employment on and after the appointed day is relevant. I cannot regard the case as deciding anything beyond the point which emerges in the judgment. For these reasons I think the appeal succeeds.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree so entirely with the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., that I would not add a word but for the difficulties presented by Harris v. Rotol, Ltd. (2). That case came before the court in a most unusual way. The claim was for compensation for incapacity which started in December, 1948. The employers took a preliminary objection. They said that the "workman's right to claim compensation did not arise before July 5, 1948", and "therefore" the employers are not liable to pay compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. That preliminary objection was upheld without any evidence being heard. So far as can be told from the record the incapacity in December, 1948, was a recurrence due to the nature of his employment from July 5, 1948, to December, 1948, against which he was insured by the State. The case was, therefore, on the face of it covered by Hales v. Bolton Leathers, Ltd. (1), that is, the workman was entitled to industrial insurance from the State, not to workmen's compensation from the employers. I do not think Harris v. Rotol, Ltd. (2) should be regarded as deciding any more than appears from the record. The only point that it decided was that the right to compensation under s. 43 of the Act of 1925 only arises when the certifying surgeon gives his certificate and not before. If, therefore, as was assumed, the workman was before December, 1948, insured by the State against the disease, the case came within the exception to s. 89 (1) (a).

The judgment of this court in Harris v. Rotol, Ltd. (2) does not recite the facts at all, no doubt because they were not proved. It is, however, instructive to consider the hypothetical set of facts which were stated to the court. On Feb. 6, 1948, the workman, who had theretofore been working with oil, had an attack of dermatitis. He did not, however, stop work. He had his hands bandaged and was put on light, dry work at slightly less wages than before. Later on he was appointed an inspector and was engaged on work which did not bring him into contact with oil. In December, 1948, he had a recurrence of dermatitis and was totally incapacitated. On Aug. 17, 1949, the certifying surgeon certified that he was suffering from dermatitis and that the date of his disablement was Feb. 6, 1948. If those facts had been proved two questions might have arisen for decision which were not, in fact, decided: First: Was the workman entitled to workmen's compensation from his employers for the period of partial incapacity which started on Feb. 6, 1948? The answer, I think, was plainly "Yes." Although the right to it did not arise until Aug. 17, 1949, when the certifying surgeon gave his certificate, nevertheless, the right arose "in respect of employment" before July 5, 1948. The case came, therefore, within the opening words of s. 89 (1) (a) of the Act of 1946. It did not come within the exception because, although the right did not arise before July 5, 1948, nevertheless, the workman was not insured against the disease, that is, the incapacity due to the disease, under the Act of 1946. Secondly: Was the recurrence in December, 1948, due to the nature of his employment from July 5, 1948, to December, 1948, or only to his employment before July 5, 1948? If it was, in fact, due to his work with oil prior to February, 1948, and his subsequent work had nothing to do with it, then the very point would have arisen which we have to decide to-day. The answer again is plain. Although the right did not arise until the certifying surgeon gave his certificate in August, 1949, nevertheless the right arose "in respect of employment" before July 5, 1948. The case would come within the opening words of s. 89 (1) (a). It would not come within the exception because, although the right did not arise before July 5, 1948, nevertheless the workman was not insured against the disease, that is, the incapacity due to the disease, under the Act of 1946.

- A The answers which I have given clearly carry out the intention of the Act of 1946 which was, as stated in s. 89 itself, that workmen's compensation should not be payable in respect of employment after July 5, 1948, but should continue to be payable in respect of employment before it. The date when the right arose does not matter so much as the employment in respect of which it arose. The employer must pay compensation for accidents and diseases due to employment before July 5, 1948. The State must pay industrial assurance for accidents and diseases due to employment after July 5, 1948. No rights of the workman are taken away by the Act of 1946. The certifying surgeons are not functus officio. They remain entitled to act after July 5, 1948, in respect of diseases due to employment before July 5, 1948. It is only when the workman has become insured against the incapacity due to the disease under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, that he loses his right to claim workmen's compensation from his employer and the certifying surgeons become functus officio. In one way or the other the man is entitled throughout, and the only question which arises in the transition period is: Who is to pay, the employer or the State? He cannot get both workmen's compensation and industrial assurance, as we decided in Hales v. Bolton Leathers, Ltd. (1), but he does not lose both, as we decide to-day. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal should be allowed.

EARL FITZWILLIAM'S WENTWORTH ESTATES CO. v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING AND ANOTHER.

G [KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Birkett, J.), July 11, 12, 31, 1950.]

Compulsory Purchase—Building land—Compulsory purchase by Central Land Board—Power of board to acquire land for disposal for permitted development—Planning permission granted by local authority to prospective lessee—Owner unwilling to sell at existing use value—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 43 (1).

H

The owners of a plot of land offered it to R., who wished to build a house on it, on a three hundred years' lease, at an annual rent of £20 10s., inclusive of the assignment of the benefit of the owners' claim for compensation for loss of development rights under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, R. to pay the development charge under the Act. Permission to build the house was granted to R. by the local authority. On a request by R. that a compulsory purchase order should be made for his benefit, because the owners did not propose to lease the land at the existing use value, the Central Land Board wrote to the owners asking them whether they would be prepared to adopt one of three methods of disposing of the land. The methods, which the board considered fair to buyers who wanted a house immediately, were: (i) to sell the land at existing use value, the buyer paying development charge; (ii) the seller to pay the development charge, and then to sell the land at a fair price, including the development charge; or (iii) the seller to pay the development charge, erect the house and then sell the house and land at a fair price, including the development charge. The owners refused to adopt any of these methods. The existing use value of the land was £35, but the owners would only agree to sell it at £462 (its probable value if it were developed), without paying development charge. The board resolved that, as they were unable to acquire the land by agreement on reasonable terms, an order be made to acquire the land compulsorily. An order to that effect was made, under s. 43 of the Act of 1947, on June 22, 1949, and was confirmed by the Minister of Town and County Planning on Dec. 3, 1949. On an application to the court by the owners for an order that the compulsory purchase order and the Minister's confirmation order be quashed, the owners contended (inter alia) that the order was made to punish them for their refusal to adopt one of the three methods suggested by the board, but the learned judge found that the evidence did not justify him in drawing that inference.

HELD: (i) if the board had exercised their compulsory powers under s. 43 (1) and s. 43 (2) of the Act of 1947 with the sole purpose of enforcing their policy that land should not be sold save at existing use prices, the compulsory purchase order would have been invalid, but it was reasonable to suppose that the decision of the board was determined by many other considerations.

(ii) the power given to the board by the second part of s. 43 (1), viz., to "acquire any land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted under Part III of this Act on terms, inclusive of any development charge payable under those provisions in respect of that development," was not limited by the earlier words of the sub-section, and so was not confined to cases bearing directly and solely on the ascertainment of development values under s. 61 or the assessment of development charges under s. 70, but was wide enough to allow the board to make the compulsory purchase order in the circumstances of the present case, and, therefore, the order was valid.

MOTION for an order that a compulsory purchase order, made by the Central Land Board on June 22, 1949, and a confirmation order, made by the Minister of Town and Country Planning on Dec. 3, 1949, be quashed.

The applicants were the owners of large estates in Sheffield which they had been developing for some years by leasing plots of land on building leases for a term of three hundred years. In August, 1948, they informed the prospective lessee of one of the plots of the terms on which they would grant a lease to him. The prospective lessee, who had obtained permission from the local authority to build a house on the land, wrote to the Central Land Board complaining that the applicants did not propose to lease the land at present use value, and asking if the board would make a compulsory purchase order for his benefit. The board drew the applicants' attention to three methods of disposing of land which they considered fair to buyers and asked the applicants if they were prepared to accept one of these methods. The applicants replied that they were not, and on June 22, 1949, the board made a compulsory purchase order in respect of the land. On Dec. 3, 1949, the order was confirmed by the Minister of Town and Country Planning. The applicants contended that the order was not within the powers conferred on the board by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 43 (1) and s. 43 (2), because its object was to make the applicants conform to the board's policy that land should not be sold at a price greater than its existing use value, and it was made as a reprisal for the applicants' refusal to conform to the methods of sale suggested to them. They also contended that the power conferred by the second part of s. 43 (1), viz., the power to acquire land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission had been granted under the Act, was limited by the power conferred by the first part of the sub-section, and, therefore, it was a power exercisable only in connection with the performance by the board of their functions under the Act (viz., the ascertainment of development values and the determination of development charges), and was not a separate and independent power. The respondents, the Minister of Town and Country Planning and the board, contended that the powers of the board had been properly exercised, that the power under the second part of s. 43 (1) was a separate and independent power enabling the board to do what they had done, and that, both respondents having acted in good faith, their decisions could not be impugned or inquired into. The respondents further contended that in the circumstances of the case the board were entitled to exercise their power of compulsory purchase, even if one of the considerations in their mind was to enforce their view as to the sale of the land at existing use value, and that, if the power in the second part of s. 43 (1) was not a separate and independent power, the order was not outside the functions of the board, one of which might reasonably be to see that land was not sold at a price greater than its existing use value in the circumstances of the case. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31. BIRKETT, J., read this judgment. This is a motion by the applicants, Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates Co., for an order that a compulsory purchase order, made by the Central Land Board on June 22, 1949, and a confirmation order, made by the Minister of Town and Country Planning on Dec. 3, 1949, be quashed on the grounds set out in the notice of motion.

The Acts of Parliament with which we are principally concerned are the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, and the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The Act of 1947 imposes, no doubt, considerable burdens on landowners and it has been the subject of acute controversy. The steps taken by landowners to ease or to shift the burdens, or to alter the views of the Central Land Board on what they may regard as a proper way in which the provisions of the Act should be carried out, are not matters on which I am called on to express any opinion on the merits. I am concerned only—and I desire to emphasise this—with the precise case before me and the special facts applicable to that case, and to determine whether the Central Land Board had the power to make the compulsory purchase order in this case under the provisions of the Act of 1947 without regard to merits on the one side or the other, and to determine whether the Central Land Board have exercised their powers properly.

The Act of 1946 dealt with procedure relating to the making and the confirmation of compulsory purchase orders. Schedule I, Part IV, para. 15, reads:

"(1) If any person aggrieved by a compulsory purchase order desires to question the validity thereof, or of any provision contained therein on the ground that the authorisation of a compulsory purchase thereby granted is not empowered to be granted under this Act or any such enactment as is mentioned in s. 1 (1) of this Act . . . he may, within six weeks from the date on which notice of the confirmation or making of the order or of the giving of the certificate is first published in accordance with the provisions of this schedule in that behalf, make an application to the High Court, and on any such application the court (a) may by interim order suspend the operation of the compulsory purchase order or any provision contained therein, or of the certificate, either generally or in so far as it affects any property of the applicant, until the final determination of the proceedings; (b) if satisfied that the authorisation granted by the compulsory purchase order is not empowered to be granted as aforesaid, or that the interests of the applicant have been substantially prejudiced by any requirement of this schedule or of any regulation made thereunder not having been complied with, may quash the compulsory purchase order or any provision contained therein, or the certificate, either generally or in so far as it affects any property of the applicant."

It is, however, the Act of 1947 that is the all-important statute which introduces far-reaching changes in the law of town and country planning. The Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, and the Town and Country Planning (Interim Development) Act, 1943, are wholly repealed as from July 1, 1948, and the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, is repealed save for the important sections of the Act which are preserved and amended in sched. XI to the Act of 1947. Planning the right use of land was a comparatively late development in social legislation, but successive Acts of Parliament have strengthened planning powers as growing experience has dictated. Immediately before the Act of 1947, speaking quite generally, the owner of land could not develop his land just as he liked. He was compelled to observe the planning restrictions in force, but, if the planning restrictions were relaxed or removed to permit development, the owner was under no liability to pay any charges for the removal or relaxation. The Act of 1947 made very great changes. It is a very comprehensive, a somewhat complicated and a rather difficult, statute, and as the years pass many important questions arising out of it will call for an answer.

The statute was first published in bill form on Jan. 7, 1947, and it received the Royal Assent on Aug. 6, 1947. It repealed existing planning schemes as from the appointed day, July 1, 1948. As a general rule, it required permission for all development. The most important change of all, perhaps, was what is sometimes called the acquisition of development rights by the State, and it is not unimportant to observe that in the description of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, these words occur, ". . . to secure the recovery for the benefit of the community of development charges in respect of certain new development . . ." For the carrying out of development for which planning permission is required, a development charge is payable to the Central Land Board. The local planning authority decide whether any particular form of development may be carried out and, subject to the powers of the Minister, it is the local planning authority who are concerned primarily with the policy of town and country planning. The Central Land Board, which from most points of view may be regarded as a new government department set up under the Act, would not appear generally to be concerned with policy of that kind so much as with fiscal matters. It collects the development charges and it administers the funds designed by the Act to alleviate causes of hardship, the War Damage Fund and the fund of £300 million reserved for compensation for loss of development value [see s. 58 (2)]. The Act of 1947 provided that the right to receive a payment out of the £300 million fund was transmissible by assignment or by operation of law as personal property [see s. 64 (2)]. That compensation would appear to be payable once and for all, and is not dependent on the time when the land is developed, nor is it related to any particular kind of development. The compensation is limited to £300 million and it is uncertain whether claimants will receive the full amount of their claim. Some claimants will, no doubt, receive preferential treatment, but it is quite impossible to-day to say what the ordinary claimant will ultimately get. The development charge is certain, the compensation is uncertain, and one cannot be set against the other in the ordinary way.

The facts in the present case are these. The applicants are the owners of large estates in Ecclesfield, in the city of Sheffield. They and their predecessors in title have been developing these estates for over thirty years by leasing plots of land for three hundred years on building leases. In August, 1948, Mr. G. N. Rodgers, through his architect, Mr. Arthur Lusby, approached the applicants' surveyors for a lease of a plot of land on which to build a house. He was told that he could have a lease for three hundred years at an annual rent of £20 10s., inclusive of the assignment of the benefit of the applicants' claim on the £300 million fund in respect of this plot, and that he, Mr. Rodgers, would have to pay the development charge. On Aug. 16, 1948, Mr. Rodgers obtained permission under Part III of the Act of 1947 to build a house on the plot of land. On Oct. 7, 1948, Mr. Lusby, for Mr. Rodgers, wrote to the Central Land Board a letter in which this paragraph appears:

"As the land agent does not propose to lease this land to my client at present use value, will you please make a compulsory purchase order or lease for the benefit of my client. I presume that I shall be informed of your present use value and have the opportunity of agreeing to the price before the purchase or lease is completed."

That was followed by a letter, dated Nov. 1, 1948, from the secretary of the Central Land Board to the applicants' surveyors:

"The Central Land Board understand that you are acting for a client who wishes to dispose of land at Whirlow Lane, Sheffield. The board have been informed that the price which your client is asking for the land is £20 10s. per annum ground rent (inclusive of the assignment of the right to claim a payment in respect of the development value of the land out of the £300 million set aside under the provisions of the Act). This price appears to approximate to the level of prices obtained for similar land in the neighbourhood before the Act came into operation. I inclose a document which sets out three methods which, in the view of the board, should be adopted by landowners. The board will be glad to know, as soon as possible, whether your client is prepared to adopt one of these alternatives, and, if so, which."

The affidavit of Sir William Robert Fraser, the deputy chairman and secretary of the Central Land Board, states:

"The principal reason which prompted the Central Land Board to publish the . . . document [inclosed with the letter of Nov. 1] was that, notwithstanding that the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, had come into full operation on July 1, 1948, the nature and effect of the provisions of Parts VI and VII of the Act did not appear sufficiently to be known to persons wishing to purchase land on which to erect a house for their own occupation, or even to some landowners offering plots for sale; with the result that plots of land were continuing to be bought and sold at prices which did not reflect the fact that the ownership of land no longer carried with it the right to develop the land, and that a liability to pay a substantial development charge would arise if development in fact took place. It appeared, moreover, to the board that it would be of assistance to both vendors and purchasers in deciding what was the fair price to be paid for land that the amount of development charge payable in respect of an intended development should be ascertained on the application of the vendor and, if desired, be paid by him even though the development would not be carried out by the vendor but by a purchaser. As provisos (a) and (b) to s. 70 (1) of the Act empower the board to refuse to make this facility available, it seemed the more desirable to make it clear that the board would, in fact, make it available in suitable cases."

The circular to which the deputy chairman and secretary, Sir William Robert Fraser, referred is called "House 1," and reads:

"Advice on buying and selling a site for building a house. The Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, has entirely changed the basis of sales of land required for building a house. This pamphlet suggests methods for negotiation between a seller of land, on which the building of a house is intended in the near future, and a purchaser of land who wants to build a house. (It does not necessarily apply to sites where there have been buildings before, e.g., war-damaged sites. In these cases advice can be obtained from any office of the Central Land Board). The Central Land Board wish to give advice to both buyers and sellers.

Advice to buyers. The following advice is offered to anyone who wants to buy (or take a lease of) a piece of land for a house: 1. Remember that building value now belongs to the State, and not to the seller. 2. Always ask first (and before the price is settled) whether the development charge is going to be paid to the Central Land Board by you or the seller. 3. Do not buy as part of the purchase price of the land the seller's claim on the £300 million fund. The right to a payment from the fund is not yet established and its amount cannot yet be known. The amount will in any case be related to the circumstances of the owner of the land on July 1, 1948, and not to those of any new buyer. A buyer of such a claim is, therefore, buying a risk at a 'certainty' price. 4. If the seller agrees to pay the development charge, ask him the amount which he has agreed with the Central Land Board. You can then safely pay building value for the land in the knowledge that you yourself will not be liable for any development charge, when the seller has paid it. 5. If you are to pay the development charge (and, unless the seller is willing to pay it, you will have to do so) you should never pay building value for the land. If you do, you will be charged the building value over again in your development charge. You should pay what is known as existing use value and no more. A rough guide to existing use value of land is its value to use it as it is actually being used (as, e.g., agricultural, allotment, or garden land) with a prohibition against erecting any building on it except for agriculture.

Advice to sellers. Three courses, which will be fair to buyers who want a house immediately, are open to sellers of land: A. To sell the land at existing use value, leaving the buyer to pay the development charge (Method A). B. The seller to pay (or agree with the board to pay) the development charge; to disclose the amount of this charge to the buyer; and then to sell the land at a fair price, including the development charge, direct to the person who wishes to erect the house. This method, after discussion and agreement with the board, can be used either for sale to a named buyer, or by public or other advertisement, or by auction (Method B.) C. The seller to pay the development charge; erect the house himself; and then sell the house and land at a fair price, including the development charge (Method C).

Owners of land with building value on July 1, 1948, have been given a right by the Act to make a claim before Mar. 31, 1949*, upon the fund of £300 million set aside to meet varying cases of hardship. No promise has been given that everyone will be paid the whole of the market value of his loss of building rights. Indeed, clear statements have been made to the contrary, and that some will receive the whole loss and that some will not. The decision will not be made (except in the cases of certain 'near-ripe' land) until 1952 or 1953, and then, by a scheme which will require affirmative approval by Parliament, payments will be made in 1953. A sale of land, therefore, at a price which includes building value is unfair to buyers for two reasons: (i) It passes on the claim to the purchaser at a definite amount, whereas the claim is as yet unestablished and the amount is unknown. (ii) It forces the purchaser to pay for building value twice over in two immediate payments (the purchase price and the development charge). This places an intolerable burden on persons who have been carefully selected for a building licence on their urgent need for a house. In normal cases, therefore, where an owner is not prepared to sell at a price related to Method A, B, or C, the Central Land Board will have to consider the various compulsory purchase powers in the Act. If sellers will sell, and purchasers will only buy, as advised in this pamphlet, land can be sold at a price which will not hinder or prevent houses being built."

On Nov. 5, 1948, the applicants' surveyors replied to the Central Land Board:

"In reply to your letter of Nov. 1, we wish to correct you in para. 1 [of the 'Advice to Buyers']. It is presumed that your informant wishes to acquire the land of our client. In regard to your final paragraph, we are instructed that our client is not disposed to adopt any of the alternatives set out in the document referred to."

On Nov. 15, 1948, the board wrote to the Sheffield City Council:

"The board have been approached by Mr. G. N. Rodgers, of 50, St. Michael's Road, Ecclesfield, in connection with land which he wishes to lease for the erection of a house in Whirlow Lane, Sheffield 11. The land forms part of Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates, for whom Messrs. Shepherd, Fowler & Marshall, 15, St. James' Row, Sheffield 1, are acting as agents, and was originally offered to Mr. Rodgers at a ground rent of £20 10s. per annum. This rent appears to reflect more than the existing use value of the land, and Mr. Rodgers has asked the board to assist him by the exercise of their powers under s. 43 of the Act. While the board have not given any undertaking that they will acquire the land, they have written to the owner, who states that he is not prepared to adopt any of the three alternative methods of disposal recommended by the board in the inclosed leaflet . . . The board would be glad to know whether planning permission has been or would be granted for the erection of a dwelling-house [on the plot] referred to above, and whether, in the opinion of the council, it is expedient in the public interest that these sites should be made immediately available for housing development. The board would be grateful for an early reply."

On Dec. 4, 1948, the town clerk wrote to the Central Land Board:

"With reference to your letter of Nov. 15, the points raised therein have now been considered by the city council who have expressed the opinion that it is in the public interest that the sites to which you refer should be made immediately available for housing development. Sewerage and water facilities are available in respect of each site and each is within a proposed residential zone, and planning permissions have been granted. I enclose for your information copy of the letter which the city engineer has sent to me on the matter."

* Extended to June 30, 1949, by Claims for Depreciation of Land Values (Period for Making Claims) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 2822).

The letter from the city engineer said:

"Whirlow Lane. Planning permission was granted by the council in August, 1948, to the erection of a dwelling-house and garage in Whirlow Lane for Mr. G. N. Rodgers . . . I have ascertained that sewerage and water facilities are available, in which case, and in view of the acute shortage of houses, I am of the opinion that the sites should be made available for housing development."

Thereupon the Central Land Board, on Dec. 23, 1948, wrote to the applicants' surveyors:

"With reference to your letters of Nov. 5 and 30, 1948, the board note that your clients are not prepared to adopt any of the approved methods described in the pamphlet 'House 1.' As far as the board are aware, the land is not the subject of a certificate under s. 80 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The board have notice that planning permission for the erection of houses on the above sites has been granted and that licences will be granted to the would-be purchasers. It appears, therefore, that the approved development may be hindered, if not prevented, unless the land is made available. The board have therefore requested the district valuer, as a matter of urgency, to negotiate with you for the immediate purchase of the land on the basis provided in s. 51 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. This basis the board considers to be the reasonable terms mentioned in s. 43 (2) of the Act."

On Dec. 30, 1948, heads of agreement were sent by the applicants' surveyors to Mr. Rodgers, the two material paragraphs being:

"Ground rent to be £20 10s. per annum payable half yearly on May 1 and Nov. 1 in each year . . . 10. The lessee to be responsible for any charges payable under or by virtue of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and shall be entitled to receive any sums payable from the compensation fund under the said Act in respect of this land."

On Jan. 7, 1949, the district valuer wrote to the applicants' surveyors:

"With reference to my letter of Dec. 31, I shall be obliged if you will let me have, at your early convenience, the information for which I asked. I have now been requested by the Central Land Board to negotiate with you for the acquisition of an area of about 1,670 square yards of land at Whirlow Lane, Sheffield. I shall, therefore, be obliged if you will supply the information for which I have asked in respect of the land at Dobercroft Road in relation to this site also."

On Jan. 10, 1949, Mr. Arthur Lusby, for Mr. Rodgers, wrote to the Central Land Board:

"My client has received heads of proposed agreement for the lease of the land for his house from the land agents, Messrs. Shepherd, Fowler & Marshall. Notwithstanding your communication to them of Nov. 1, asking them whether they were prepared to adopt one of the three methods recommended in the circular headed 'Advice to sellers,' they still demand a ground rent of £20 10s. per annum, my client to pay development charge and receive any benefits from the compensation fund. I shall be pleased therefore to know if you are proceeding with the compulsory purchase of the land. This should be settled at an early date so that the responsible person can put in the S.I. claim [i.e., on the £300 million fund]."

There was an interval while negotiations continued between the applicants and Mr. Rodgers and his agent, but on Mar. 3, 1949, the district valuer wrote again to the applicants' surveyors:

"With reference to my telephone conversation with you from which it was gathered that negotiations between yourselves and the would-be developer in this case are unlikely to result in a settlement, I shall be obliged if you will supply me at your earliest convenience with the information for which I asked in my letter of Jan. 7 in order that I may make my report in this case."

- A On Mar. 21, 1949, the applicants' surveyors wrote to the district valuer, giving the terms. One of the paragraphs in the letter was:

"We are prepared, therefore, to recommend sale at £462 subject to the purchaser erecting a house of not less size than 1,100 square feet internal area, exclusive of garage or outbuildings, to plans, etc., first approved by the vendors' agent."

- B The next stage was that there was a resolution by the board on May 13, 1949, which read:

"That it was desirable to acquire the land in Whirlow Lane, Sheffield (appendix 'A') for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which planning permission has been granted on terms inclusive of any development charge payable in respect of that development, and that, as the board were unable to acquire the said land by agreement on reasonable terms, an order be made to acquire the land compulsorily."

- C The order was made in these terms:

"Subject to the provisions of this order the board are, under s. 43 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, hereby authorised to purchase compulsorily for the purpose of disposing of it . . ."

- D Then there followed the words of the resolution.

On July 20, 1949, an objection was made on behalf of the applicants, the grounds of objection being:

- E "1. That the order is ultra vires, in that it has been made to secure an object which it is not within the board's powers to achieve, namely, that the estates company shall bear the loss, if any, resulting from the vesting of the development rights in the State by virtue of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and shall not be permitted to make it a condition of sale that the purchaser shall stand in their shoes. 2. That it is not expedient in the public interest that the board should acquire the land included in the order. 3. That the terms on which the estates company would be prepared to lease the land are reasonable. Our clients desire to have an opportunity of appearing before, and of being heard by, a person appointed by you for the purpose."

- F Accordingly, on Aug. 30, 1949, there was a hearing at Sheffield, presided over by Mr. Fitzgibbon, an inspector of the Ministry of Town and Country Planning, and on Dec. 3, 1949, the Minister of Town and Country Planning made the

- G confirming order:

"Whereas on June 22, 1949, the Central Land Board in pursuance of s. 43 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, made an order in accordance with the provisions of sched. I to the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, for the compulsory acquisition of certain land described in the schedule thereto, and have submitted the said order to the Minister of Town and Country Planning (hereinafter called 'the Minister') for confirmation; and whereas the Minister is satisfied that it is expedient in the public interest that the board should acquire the said land and that the board are unable to acquire the land by agreement on reasonable terms; and whereas the Minister has taken into consideration the objection made to the said order; and whereas the Minister is satisfied that the said order should be confirmed. Now therefore the Minister in pursuance of all the powers enabling him in that behalf hereby confirms the said order in the form set out in the schedule hereto."

The Minister himself made an affidavit which was read in this case, as also did Sir William Robert Fraser.

On that state of facts counsel for the applicants submitted that the order had been made in this case because the applicants refused to accept the board's policy, as laid down in "House 1," viz., that land should not be sold at a price greater than its existing use value, and that the order was made to make the applicants conform to the board's policy and as a reprisal for their refusal to conform. He further submitted that it was not within the powers conferred by s. 43 of the Act of 1947 for the board to make a compulsory order for this purpose. He contended that there was no express provision in the Act so empowering the board, that if Parliament had intended that the board should have this power for such a purpose it would have said so, and that, if Parliament had intended that land should not be sold at a price greater than its existing use value, it could have made it an offence so to do, as it had made certain specific things offences in s. 26 (4), s. 28 (6), s. 29 (5), s. 32 (3) and s. 74 (3).

In support of those submissions, counsel for the applicants cited Galloway v. London Corporation (1). The opening words of the headnote are (L.R. 1 H.L. 34):

"Where persons have special powers conferred on them by Parliament for effecting a particular purpose they cannot be allowed to exercise those powers for any purpose of a collateral kind. Therefore, a company authorised (making due compensation) to take compulsorily the lands of any person for a definite object may be restrained by injunction from any attempt to take them for another object."

"The case of the appellant, Mr. Galloway, rested on a principle well recognised, and founded on the soundest principles of justice. The principle is this, that when persons [are] embarking in great undertakings, for the accomplishment of which those engaged in them have received authority from the legislature to take compulsorily the lands of others, making to the latter proper compensation, the persons so authorised cannot be allowed to exercise the powers conferred on them for any collateral object; that is, for any purposes except those for which the legislature has invested them with extraordinary powers."

Counsel for the applicants contended that the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, has conferred certain compulsory purchase powers on the Central Land Board and it must be shown that, when the board exercised those powers, they did so for the purposes laid down by the Act, and not for any other collateral purpose. He also cited Sydney Municipal Council v. Campbell (2), the headnote to which reads ([1925] A.C. 338):

"The appellants had statutory power to acquire compulsorily land required for the purpose of making or extending streets, also land required for 'carrying out improvements in or remodelling any portion of the city.' In connection with the extension of a street, they resolved to acquire the respondents' land for the latter purpose. They had previously been restrained from acquiring the land for the extension, on the ground that it was not really required for that purpose, but that its purchase was desired because of its probable increase in value. No plan for improving or remodelling the area was considered or proposed, and evidence as to proceedings in the council showed that the appellants were endeavouring to give a new form to the transaction previously decided upon, rather than considering whether the respondents' land was required for improving or remodelling:—Held, that the evidence sustained the lower court's conclusion of fact that the appellants were exercising their powers for a purpose differing from those specified by the statute, and that they had rightly been restrained from acquiring the respondents' land."

DUFF, J., delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, said ([1925] A.C. 343):

- A "The legal principles governing the execution of such powers as that conferred by s. 16 [of the Sydney Corporation Amendment Act], in so far as presently relevant, are not at all in controversy. A body such as the Municipal Council of Sydney, authorised to take land compulsorily for specified purposes, will not be permitted to exercise its powers for different purposes, and if it attempts to do so, the courts will interfere. As LORD
- B LOREBURN said, in Marquess of Clanricarde v. Congested Districts Board for Ireland (3): 'Whether it does so or not is a question of fact.' Where the proceedings of the council are attacked upon this ground, the party impeaching those proceedings must, of course, prove that the council, though professing to exercise its powers for the statutory purpose, is in fact employing them in furtherance of some ulterior object."
- C The contention of counsel for the applicants was that, in the case now before me, the Central Land Board had used their powers to enforce a policy which they themselves had conceived, viz., of ensuring that land should not be sold at prices in excess of existing use values, and that such a course was not valid under the Act. He submitted, further, that to compel owners to lease or sell land on terms which the board considered fair and reasonable would be a serious
- D restriction on the common law right of the subject to contract freely and this common law right could be taken away only by express provisions, such as are contained, e.g., in the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, the Rent Restrictions Acts and the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, and not by implication. He further submitted that Parliament, having by s. 51 of the Act of 1947 ensured that all land required for public purposes could be acquired at its existing
- E use value, had left to private individuals the right to make their own contracts unfettered. In the present case, from the affidavit of Sir William Robert Fraser it would appear that the existing use value of this land was £35 only, but, with permission to develop, it might be worth as much as £462, a difference of £427.
- F Counsel for the applicants submitted that it was no part of the function of the Central Land Board to secure the building of houses by local authorities or private persons, but that was the duty of the Minister of Health and local authorities under the Housing Acts, 1936 and 1949, and any action of the applicants which, it might be thought, would hinder, or even prevent, the building of houses was not a concern of the Central Land Board and afforded no reason for implying any power in the Act of 1947 which was not there in express terms. The
- G power to acquire land, conferred on the Central Land Board by s. 43 (1) of the Act of 1947 "for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted," is not (he submitted) a separate and independent power, but a power which can be exercised only in connection with the performance by the board of their functions under the Act. The power conferred by the second part of s. 43 (1) is limited by the power conferred by the first part. If the power were intended to be separate and independent, the words
- H "in particular" would not have been inserted, as the statute would have made it plain. If it be an independent power, it would be more liberal than any such power of compulsory purchase hitherto conferred, and would enable the Central Land Board to acquire and dispose of land for the purpose of securing the proper planning of the area, a function expressly entrusted by the Act to local authorities under s. 38 and s. 39. Finally, the functions of the Central Land Board are confined to the assessment and collection of the development charge and matters relating thereto, and do not include the function to see that land is not sold at a price greater than its existing use value. If, in fact, Mr. Rodgers in this case did acquire the land in question on the applicants' terms, it would make no difference to the board so far as any of their functions are concerned.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the powers of the Central Land Board under s. 43 had been properly exercised and that, in any event, the power in the second part of s. 43 (1) was a separate and independent power enabling the board to do exactly what they had done in this case. That being so, the decision of the Central Land Board at the meeting on May 13, 1949, as recorded in para. 8 of the affidavit of Sir William Robert Fraser, and the decision of the Minister, as recorded in para. 8 of the affidavit of Mr. Lewis Silkin, could not be impugned and, indeed, could not be inquired into. It having been conceded that both deponents acted in complete good faith, the matter was concluded. The board and the Minister must decide and the courts could not inquire into it.

In support of that contention the learned Attorney-General cited Point of Ayr Collieries, Ltd. v. Lloyd-George (4), the headnote to which reads ([1943] 2 All E.R. 546):

"Control of the appellants' undertaking was taken by the Ministry of Fuel and Power by an order made under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 55 (4). The appellants contended that there were no adequate grounds upon which the Minister could find as he stated he had found, namely, that it was necessary to take control in the interests of the defence of the realm and the efficient prosecution of the war and for maintaining supplies and services essential to the community:—Held: there was no jurisdiction to interfere with what was an admittedly bona fide decision of the Minister within his delegated authority. The exercise of executive power under such a regulation cannot be questioned in the courts and can be questioned only in Parliament."

LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 547):

"If one thing is settled beyond the possibility of dispute, it is that, in construing regulations of this character expressed in this particular form of language, it is for the competent authority, whatever Ministry that may be, to decide as to whether or not a case for the exercise of the powers has arisen. It is for the competent authority to judge of the adequacy of the evidence before it. It is for the competent authority to judge of the credibility of that evidence. It is for the competent authority to judge whether or not it is desirable or necessary to make further investigations before taking action. It is for the competent authority to decide whether the situation requires an immediate step, or whether some delay may be allowed for further investigation and perhaps negotiation. All those matters are placed by Parliament in the hands of the Minister in the belief that the Minister will exercise his powers properly, and in the knowledge that, if he does not do so, he is liable to the criticism of Parliament. One thing is certain, and that is that those matters are not within the competence of this court. It is the competent authority that is selected by Parliament to come to the decision, and, if that decision is come to in good faith, this court has no power to interfere, provided, of course, that the action is one which is within the four corners of the authority delegated to the Minister."

I understood from counsel for the applicants that, if the Central Land Board had, in fact, power, which he denied, then it would not be competent for this court to inquire into the facts on which they had come to the conclusion that they ought to exercise it.

The learned Attorney-General submitted, further, that, even if one of the considerations in the mind of the board had been to enforce their view as to the sale of land at existing use value, nevertheless the board, having the power to "acquire . . . land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission had been granted under Part III of [the Act of 1947] on terms inclusive of any development charge payable" under the provisions of the said Act, and the board being unable to acquire the land by agreement on reasonable terms, they were entitled in the circumstances of this case to exercise the power. Alternatively, if the power in the second part of s. 43 (1) was not a separate and independent power, the compulsory purchase order made in this case was not outside the functions of the board, as one of the functions of the board might reasonably be taken to be to see that land was not sold at a price greater than its existing use value in all the circumstances of the case. He referred to the Town and Country Planning (Development Charge) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1189), which were made by the Minister with the consent of the Treasury under s. 70 (3) and s. 111 of the Act of 1947. Paragraph 2 is:

"Subject to the provisions of the Act and of any regulations made thereunder and for the time being in force, the general principles set out in the schedule to these regulations shall be followed by the board in determining under Part VII of the Act whether any, and if so what, development charge is to be paid thereunder in respect of any operations or use of land."

Paragraph 1 of the schedule reads:

"Development charge shall be determined so as to secure, so far as is practicable, that land can be freely and readily bought and sold or otherwise disposed of in the open market at a price neither greater nor less than its value for its existing use. This object is the governing principle by which the board are to be guided in determining development charge."

Counsel for the applicants expressly asked that I should make a decision on the facts relating to the making of the compulsory purchase order. He invited me to say that the reason why the board made the order in this case was because the applicants declined to adopt one of the three methods set out in the board's circular, and that the order was made to further the policy of the board that land should not be sold at a price greater than its existing use value and to punish the applicants for not conforming to their policy. The Attorney-General submitted that, if the board possessed the power to make the order, the exercise of the power was not rendered invalid because one of the reasons for making it had been the desire to enforce a particular policy. If they had the power, the exercise of it was a matter for the board and the Minister, and not for the court. Counsel for the applicants contended that the board had no power to make the order under the powers conferred on them by the Act of 1947.

Before proceeding further, I think that I ought to say that, if the issue in this case had been one of this comparative simplicity, whether the powers conferred on the Central Land Board were powers which enabled them to exercise and to enforce a policy that land should not be sold at a price greater than its existing use value, I should have held that the board had no such power. If it were conclusively shown, for example, that the board had exercised their compulsory powers under s. 43 with the sole purpose of enforcing the policy of ensuring that land should not be sold save at existing use prices, I should be of the opinion that their power of compulsory purchase under the statute could not be used for that purpose. But the issue is not quite so simple as that. It has to be remembered that the board have nowhere stated directly their reasons for making the order. The affidavit made by Sir William Robert Fraser recites the history and merely records that he was present when the board passed the resolution which I have cited. As counsel for the applicants pointed out several times, it is a matter of inference from the documents and the actions in this case. The chief elements appear to me to be the correspondence and the documents which I have read, and, in particular, the resolution of the board of May 13, 1949, the affidavit of Sir William Robert Fraser, the confirming order of Dec. 3, 1949, and the affidavit of the Minister, Mr. Lewis Silkin.

It seems tolerably clear that, if the applicants had been willing to adopt any one of the three methods set out in the board's circular, the order would never have been made, because the necessity for, or the desirability of, such an order being made would then not have arisen. This, of itself, does not, I think, necessarily lead to the inference that the order was made to enforce a policy or to punish the applicants. The applicants' refusal to adopt any of the three methods brought about the situation in which the order was made, but the whole of the facts of that situation must, I think, be considered before any inference can be drawn. For example, and just for example, the board may have taken the view that s. 43 gave them the power on the facts of this case to make the order in any event, and, if they were right in that view and they did possess the power, the precise motives with which they exercised it would not be material and would not be a matter for the court to inquire into, the good faith of the board and the Minister not being in question. They may have taken the view that, as, under the regulations of 1948, a governing principle in the assessment of development charges was to procure the sale of land at existing use prices, their functions under the Act were concerned with the sale of land at existing use prices and their compulsory powers under the Act were to comprehend that matter, however s. 43 (1) was construed.

The city council of Sheffield had expressed the view to the Central Land Board that the site in Whirlow Lane should be made immediately available for housing development in the public interest. Planning permission to build a house on the land had been given to Mr. Rodgers in 1948. Mr. Rodgers had asked the board to assist him by exercising their powers under s. 43 when it appeared that the applicants were asking a price which represented more than the existing use value. The view of the board was that the approved development might be hindered, if not prevented, unless the land was made available: see their letter of Dec. 23, 1948, to the applicants' surveyors. All these matters may, as I say by way of example, have been in the mind of the board. It seems reasonable to suppose that the board would never have issued their circular, "House 1," unless they had wished to see this advice carried out in practice, but I do not think that the whole of the evidence, considered dispassionately, would justify me in drawing the inference that the order was made to punish the applicants. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that in making the order one of the purposes was to enforce the view which the board held, viz., that it was desirable that land should be sold only at existing use value. To come to any other conclusion would be, I think, to ignore the true meaning of the correspondence. It is clear, I think, that the board viewed the applicants' terms in the proposed transaction with Mr. Rodgers with great disfavour, because they felt it to be in opposition to what they had expressed as being fair and reasonable in the new situation created by the Act of 1947. They had before them the express view of the Sheffield City Council that it was in the public interest that this site should be made immediately available for housing development, and the proposals of the applicants were likely to prevent or to impede this. Mr. Rodgers, to whom permission to build a house had been granted, was unwilling to accept the applicants' terms and had appealed to the board for assistance. They had themselves been unable to acquire the land in question on what they regarded as reasonable terms. They, therefore, exercised their compulsory powers, following the words in the latter part of s. 43 (1) of the Act of 1947, and, applying them to the exact facts of this case, to purchase the land compulsorily

"... for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted under Part III of this Act on terms inclusive of any development charge payable under those provisions in respect of that development."

I do not think that the evidence leads to the inevitable inference that the compulsory purchase order in this case was made solely to enforce the policy of the board, as laid down in the advice given in the circular, "House 1," but that it entered their consideration, as I have said, seems to admit of no doubt. In the absence, however, of any declaration of the board stating the precise reason for making the order, it would appear to be reasonable to suppose that the decision was determined by many considerations, of which this was one. Neither do I think that I should be justified on the evidence in drawing the inference that one of the considerations was to punish the applicants for their refusal to conform to the board's wishes.

It seems to me that the real question in this case is: What were the powers of the Central Land Board under s. 43 of the Act of 1947. Section 43 (1) is:

"The Central Land Board may, with the approval of the Minister, by agreement acquire land for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the following provisions of this Act, and in particular may so acquire any land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted under Part III of this Act on terms inclusive of any development charge payable under those provisions in respect of that development."

Those are the exact words of the resolution of the board, of the order and of the confirmation by the Minister. Section 43 (2) is:

"If the Minister is satisfied that it is expedient in the public interest that the board should acquire any land for any such purpose as aforesaid, and that the board are unable to acquire the land by agreement on reasonable terms, he may authorise the board to acquire the land compulsorily in accordance with the provisions of this section."

Section 43 (4) is:

"Any land acquired by the Central Land Board under the provisions of this section shall be disposed of by them in accordance with such directions as may be given to them in that behalf by the Minister, and until the land is so disposed of the board may manage it in accordance with such directions . . ."

Under the first part of s. 43 (1) and s. 43 (2), the board may be authorised by the Minister to acquire any land compulsorily "for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions" under the subsequent provisions of the Act, if the Minister is satisfied that it is expedient in the public interest. Of the subsequent provisions of the Act dealing with this matter, the most important appear to be s. 61, which deals with the ascertainment of development values, and s. 70, the determination of development charges. Under the first part of s. 43 (1) the board can exercise their compulsory powers in suitable cases to test the market prices, to assist them in ascertaining development values, in fixing development charges, and in collecting information necessary for these purposes. In view, however, of the second part of s. 43 (1), which is the part which has been followed by the order in this case. I cannot think that the powers of the board to make a compulsory purchase order are confined strictly to those matters.

Let me take a purely hypothetical case. In a particular neighbourhood there is a plot of land which happens to be the only plot available and suitable for the erection of a new building which some individual desires to erect for public purposes and in the public interest, such as a memorial hall, a library, or some institution of that kind. The landowner, recognising the strength of his position, holds out for a price which is utterly unreasonable. In these circumstances the individual appeals to the Central Land Board to assist him by the use of their compulsory powers under s. 43, for he himself cannot acquire suitable land at all or at a reasonable price. I think that the board would then have power, under s. 43, to exercise their compulsory powers to assist in the accomplishment of this particular development, notwithstanding that it should happen to be fully in accord with views which they had previously expressed as to the proper administration of the Act and of the desirable course to be taken.

Counsel for the applicants contended that the second part of s. 43 (1) must be read in conjunction with the first part of the sub-section, and that the power to acquire land, under the sub-section, was governed by the words "for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions" under the subsequent provisions of the Act, whereas the Attorney-General contended that the power contained in the second part of the sub-section was a separate and independent power. Counsel are unable to help me with any authorities on the use of the words "in particular" which appear in the sub-section. These words have not the same meaning as "for example" or "and also," and their use has created a considerable difficulty in my own mind. I suppose it is possible, reading English in its ordinary way, to read that part of the sub-section in this way: "acquire land for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the following provisions of this Act, and in particular may so acquire any land—and this is an example of what they may do." Counsel for the applicants suggests that the words, "in particular," are really particularising one of the things which the board may do in exercise of their functions—their functions being covered by the subsequent provisions of the Act—and that is to acquire and dispose of land, to assist them in their functions of ascertaining development values and determining development charges, and not otherwise. A B C

The Attorney-General contended that the power was not to be restricted in that way, but was a separate power to be exercised in particular cases, subject to the approval of the Minister. He contended that the particular purpose in the second part of the sub-section, which is introduced by the words "in particular," enlarged the general powers given under the first part of the sub-section, or, alternatively, he contended that the words, "in particular," meant that this was an instance of the general performance of the powers conferred on the Central Land Board. D

The matter is not free from doubt, but, having given to it the very best consideration that I can—and I confess freely that it has been a matter of considerable difficulty, because this was an uncharted field in a very difficult part of the law of town and country planning—I have come to the conclusion, as a matter of construction, that the inclusion of the words "in particular" in the second part of the sub-section was not intended to confine the Central Land Board in the exercise of their compulsory powers of purchase to cases which bore directly and solely on the ascertainment of development values or the determination of development charges, but their powers were wide enough to allow them to do what they have done in this case, i.e., to acquire the land of the applicants E F

"...for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted under Part III of this Act on terms inclusive of any development charge payable under those provisions in respect of that development." G

In these circumstances, holding, as I do, that the power so to act is conferred on the Central Land Board in the circumstances of this case, the Minister having stated in his confirming order that he "is satisfied that it is expedient in the public interest that the board should acquire the . . . land and that the board are unable to acquire the land by agreement on reasonable terms," I have come to the conclusion that the order was properly made and that it is not open to me to interfere with it. The motion must, therefore, be dismissed. H

R. v. SANDBACH JUSTICES. Ex parte SMITH.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Byrne, JJ.), July 18, 19, 26, 1950.]

Infant—Custody and maintenance—Application to justices by mother for order against father—Venue—Child living out of England—Power of justices to make order.

On the complaint of the mother of an infant Cheshire justices made an order under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, giving her the custody of the child and ordering the father to pay maintenance. The mother lived in Cheshire in the district where the order was made, the father lived in Oxfordshire, and the child lived with a relative of the mother in Northern Ireland.

HELD: (i) proceedings under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 to 1925, other than any taken in the High Court, must be brought in the area where the respondent lived, and, therefore, the Cheshire justices had no jurisdiction to make the order and an order for certiorari to quash it must be made.

(ii) although the justices had jurisdiction to make an order under the Acts when the child was living outside the jurisdiction of the English courts, such an order should only be made in most exceptional circumstances.

APPLICATION for an order of certiorari to remove to the High Court to be quashed an order for contribution to the maintenance of an infant made against the father of the infant by the justices for the petty sessional division of Sandbach, Cheshire, on Feb. 7, 1950. The ground for the application was that the justices had no jurisdiction to make an order under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, because the father was living in Oxfordshire, outside the Sandbach petty sessional area, and the child was living in Northern Ireland. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Blomefield for the applicant.

H. J. I. Summerfield for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 26. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. Counsel for the applicant moved for an order of certiorari to quash an order made by justices for the Sandbach petty sessional division of Cheshire whereby on the application of the respondent, the mother of an infant, they awarded her the legal custody and directed the applicant, the father, to pay £1 weekly for maintenance until the child attains the age of sixteen years. The ground on which leave to move for the order was given was that the petty sessional division in question was not a proper venue for the making of or hearing of the complaint and that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear it or to make the order.

It appears that when the complaint was heard the father was living in the village of Filkins, Oxfordshire, and the mother at Alsager, Cheshire, while the infant was living with the mother's aunt in Northern Ireland. Objection seems to have been taken at the court to the jurisdiction of the justices both on the ground that the child was living out of the jurisdiction and that the court in Cheshire was not a court to which jurisdiction had been given under the Act.

The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, s. 5, provides:

"The court may, upon the application of the mother . . . make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant and the right of access thereto of either parent, having regard to the welfare of the infant, and to the conduct of the parents, and to the wishes as well of the mother as of the father, and may alter, vary or discharge such order on the application of either parent . . ."

By s. 9 it is provided:

" . . . the expression 'the court' shall mean—in England the High Court or the county court of the district in which the respondent . . . may reside."

By s. 3 (2) of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925—which Act is to be treated as one with the Act of 1886—it is provided that where the court under s. 5 of the Act of 1886 gives the custody of the infant to the mother it may further order that the father shall pay to the mother towards the maintenance of the infant such weekly or other periodical sum as the court, having regard to the means of the father, may think reasonable. By s. 7:

"For the purposes of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, as amended by this Act, the expression 'the court' shall include a court of summary jurisdiction . . ."

The question, therefore, arises whether, when an application is made to justices for the purpose of obtaining the custody of an infant, the mother can apply to any court of summary jurisdiction or whether the application must be made to the court for the district in which the father resides. These proceedings are, by the statutory rules made under the Act, to be begun by complaint, and by s. 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, it is provided that where a complaint shall be made to any justice or justices upon which he or they have or shall have authority by law to make any order for the payment of money or otherwise it shall be lawful for such justice or justices to issue a summons stating shortly the matter of the complaint and requiring the person against whom it is directed to appear before them. So far as this section is concerned, it has to be borne in mind that the jurisdiction of a justice is purely local. There are, no doubt, certain statutory provisions with regard to offences committed outside or on the borders of counties or other jurisdictions, but, generally speaking, the matter of a complaint must be alleged to have arisen within the limits of the justices' local jurisdiction. In cases concerning the guardianship of infants, it is difficult, if not impossible, to say that the cause of complaint arose in any particular place. This, no doubt, is why the Act of 1886 expressly provides that the county court for the district in which the respondent resides is the court that shall have jurisdiction if application is not made to the High Court. Moreover, the general policy of the County Courts Acts, 1934, is that proceedings should be taken in the district in which the defendant resides. There is certainly nothing to bring this case within the jurisdiction of the Cheshire justices except the fact that the mother lives in Cheshire. The child is in the custody of someone in Northern Ireland and the father lives in Oxfordshire.

The statutes of 1886 and 1925 have to be read together, and it seems to us, therefore, that, as the effect of the statute of 1925 is to provide another inferior court as one of the courts to which application can be made, we ought to read s. 9 of the Act of 1886 as "the expression 'the court' shall mean in England the High Court of Justice, and the county court or court of summary jurisdiction acting in and for the district in which the respondent may reside." It would, indeed, be a strange state of affairs in which, if recourse is had to the county court, it must be the county court of the respondent's district, whereas, if resort is had to the justices, an application can be made to any bench in any part of England. In our opinion, the intention of the Act is that proceedings other than any taken in the High Court must be brought where the respondent lives and not where the applicant lives, and for these reasons the Cheshire justices had no jurisdiction to make the order.

The other point that was argued is, perhaps, of more general importance. It is whether or not the court can make an order relating to the custody of an infant at a time when the infant is outside the jurisdiction. This question not infrequently comes before the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division on applications for custody, and there, when custody is given, it is the common practice to insert in the order that the parent to whom custody is given is not to take the child out of the jurisdiction of the court without permission. In Harris v. Harris (1), LORD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 322):

"It is the rarest possible thing for a judge of this Division of the High Court to make a custody order in respect of a child who is out of the jurisdiction."

Counsel for the mother contended that the words of the President would imply that the court has jurisdiction to make the order but would rarely exercise it. He also referred us to a decision of the Court of Session in M'Lean v. Leftley (or M'Lean) (2). Undoubtedly, the court there decided that they had power to make the order as both the parents were domiciled in Scotland although the child was living in England outside their jurisdiction. In view of that case and of the expression of the learned President's opinion which I have quoted, we think we must take it that the court has jurisdiction to make the order though it would be very unusual to do so, and in many cases most undesirable, more especially for justices, to make such an order. It is a strong thing for a court of summary jurisdiction to make an order which the High Court makes only in most exceptional circumstances.

The reasons why this should not be done are many. In the present case, suppose the father had made the application and the custody had been committed to him. How could it be enforced? The child is living in Northern Ireland in the custody of a person who is not before the court. If that person refused to give up the child, we know of no means by which the English court could enforce its order. Habeas corpus proceedings would have to be brought in Northern Ireland. No doubt, if the mother took active steps to prevent the child being brought over, she could be dealt with under s. 34 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, but only if she still remained within the jurisdiction and so was amenable to the jurisdiction. Moreover, provisions are made by s. 5 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, for the altering, varying or discharging of such order, and, no doubt, the court might exercise such powers if it were satisfied that the parent to whom the custody had been entrusted was not fulfilling his or her duties as guardian properly. It is obvious that, if the child remains out of the jurisdiction, great difficulties in the way of the court exercising jurisdiction or being informed of matters relating to the conduct of the guardian would arise. Provision, also, is made for the court giving access to the parent who is deprived of the guardianship, and in this case, indeed, the justices have given the father access to the child once a week, which is purely illusory so long as the child remains in Northern Ireland. Such considerations as these show, we think, how very slow justices should be in making an order in respect of an infant who is not within the jurisdiction when it is asked to act. By jurisdiction I mean, of course, within the jurisdiction of the English courts. I am referring, not to the local jurisdiction of the justices, but to where the writ of habeas corpus will run. If the child is brought within the jurisdiction, no difficulty will arise. Certiorari can only be granted if a court acts without jurisdiction, and proceedings by way of certiorari cannot be used as a method of appeal. While, therefore, we cannot grant an order of certiorari on the ground that the child was out of the jurisdiction when the order was made, however much we may disapprove of an order being made in such circumstances, the order will go on the other ground, namely that the justices of Cheshire had no jurisdiction to make an order as the mother was not resident in the district for which they act.

DUCHESNE v. DUCHESNE.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Pearce, J.), July 19, 20, 31, 1950.]

Divorce—Maintenance—Assessment—Factors to be considered—Conduct of parties—Matters excluded from consideration—Not brought forward at trial—Inconsistency with decree—Matters calculated to produce different result at trial—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 190 (1).

The wife obtained a decree nisi of dissolution of the marriage on the ground of desertion. The husband did not put in an answer or defend the proceedings, but his solicitors wrote to the wife's solicitors during the pendency of the petition saying that it was the husband's intention on the wife's application for maintenance to put forward the conduct of the parties during their married life as affecting the proper proportion of his income which the court should order as provision for the wife. Affidavits were, accordingly, filed in the maintenance proceedings dealing with quarrels and unhappiness and the wife's lack of co-operation and refusal to be reconciled, on which matters the husband asked leave to cross-examine her. The registrar refused on the ground (inter alia) that the matters mentioned had not been put forward at the trial.

HELD: the correct principle in maintenance proceedings was that the husband was estopped from asserting matters inconsistent with the decree, and also, for reasons of public policy, he was prohibited from asserting matters known to him which would reasonably have been expected, if proved, to provide an effective answer to the petition or to produce a different result at the trial, e.g., mutual decrees instead of a decree to the petitioner or a discretionary decree instead of one as of right.

Lindsay v. Lindsay ([1934] P. 162) and Robinson v. Robinson ([1943] 1 All E.R. 251), applied.

Quere, whether the last prohibition extended to matters of which the husband was ignorant at the time of the trial, but which he might have known but for his own carelessness.

APPEAL by the husband from the decision of a registrar on a summons for maintenance under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (1). The facts appear in the judgment of PEARCE, J.

- D R. J. A. Temple for the husband.
- Loudoun for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

- July 31. PEARCE, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal from a registrar's order in maintenance proceedings refusing leave to a respondent husband to cross-examine his wife who has obtained against him a decree nisi on the ground of desertion. The husband did not put in an answer or defend the divorce proceedings. His solicitors merely wrote a letter to the wife's solicitors during the pendency of the petition saying that they observed that it contained a prayer for maintenance and that on that application in due course it was their client's intention to put forward conduct of the parties during the married life as affecting the proper proportion which the court should order as provision for the wife. In the maintenance proceedings, accordingly, the husband filed various affidavits dealing (not very specifically) with quarrels and unhappiness during the marriage, the wife's early lack of response to the husband's love, her lack of co-operation in the husband's economy and in his efforts to succeed in his profession, and her more recent lack of response to overtures for reconciliation. On the matters alleged in these affidavits he now asks that the parties should be cross-examined. The registrar refused the application on two grounds—first, that it was premature owing to discovery having been barely concluded, and, secondly, that since these matters had not been put forward at the trial the husband was not entitled to investigate or have oral evidence of the wife's conduct during the married life. The question of the conduct of the parties was limited in his view to evidence that had emerged at the trial. The second ground is the important question to be decided.
- H The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190, says that in assessing maintenance the court shall have regard to "the conduct of the parties." There is nothing in the Act defining or limiting these words. The judgment of the Court of Appeal in Wood v. Wood (1) puts the conduct of the parties first in the list of considerations that should affect the court: see also the observations of DENNING, L.J., in Trestain v. Trestain (2). In Dunbar (otherwise White) v. Dunbar (3) the wife had obtained a decree of nullity. In her subsequent application for maintenance the husband proved that she had gone to live with a man before the proceedings began, and, largely on that ground, the registrar refused her maintenance. The Court of Appeal confirmed the report. It is to be noted that the misconduct of the wife was not a matter that was relevant to or could have been raised in the nullity proceedings. In Chapple v. Chapple (4) a wife having obtained an undefended decree of nullity, the husband on the maintenance proceedings alleged that she had been guilty of delay, and that, therefore, she should not be entitled to a full share of maintenance since during that delay his financial position had improved. HILL, J., said (98 L.J.P. 97):

"Regard has to be had to the fortune of the wife, if any, to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties. In general the proceedings in court leading to a decree nisi in an undefended case can hardly be expected to provide sufficient evidence of the conduct of the parties, and therefore the registrar must receive further evidence before he can determine what is a proper sum to allot to a wife having regard to the conduct of the parties. Here there was not sufficient evidence, and I do not think the question of conduct was res judicata because the learned President held on decree nisi that the delay was not unreasonable. The President may have thought it reasonable or unreasonable but he made a decree nisi. The registrar, however, has to investigate the conduct of the parties."

In that case, the question of delay being apparent to the judge at the trial, there was no mischief in the husband failing to contest the nullity suit on the ground of delay and raising it in the subsequent proceedings.

In Restall v. Restall (5) a wife had obtained a decree of nullity on the ground of consanguinity, and the Court of Appeal held that in maintenance proceedings the moral conduct of the wife both before and after the ceremony of marriage could be investigated. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1930] P. 195):

"It is said that so to hold will be to cast a further burden on the court. I doubt this, because I think the registrar will be able to keep the matters in issue within reasonable limits. It is not in every case that the question of the imposition of a dum casta clause arises. I should deprecate this decision being taken as justifying a large number of petty or irrelevant acts between the parties being included in those which the court must consider; but when there is a petition for maintenance, and the term of the continuance of the maintenance has to be fixed, and also perhaps the question of the imposition of a dum casta clause arises, I think it is most important that the court should have before it the relevant evidence to enable it to investigate thoroughly the conduct of the parties. It is quite true that in the majority of cases the question before the court is simply one of the financial position of the parties; but there are certain cases in which it is necessary for the court to go outside that, and to make a full investigation into their general conduct."

LAWRENCE, L.J., said (ibid., p. 196);

"I agree. In exercising its discretion under s. 190, the court is to have regard to the conduct of the parties, and indeed in Wood v. Wood (1) LINDLEY, L.J., places the conduct of the parties first in order in his enumeration of the circumstances which have to be taken into account."

It is to be noted again that in that case the conduct of the wife was irrelevant to the issue of nullity and could not properly have been raised at the trial.

In Mould v. Mould (6) the husband allowed his wife's petition for divorce on the ground of adultery to go undefended. Subsequently, on the wife's petition for maintenance he wished to set up facts justifying him in leaving his wife, namely, her cruelty and undue intimacy with a man (not amounting to adultery). It was held that he could do so. BATESON, J., said ([1933] P. 81):

A "Counsel for the wife seeks to distinguish Restall v. Restall (5) not only on the ground that they were proceedings for nullity and not for divorce, but also, as he says, because all these matters which are now set up in this answer could have been pleaded in the divorce suit and might well have been a bar to the decree. He says that it is not right that the respondent should get the benefit of an undefended decree, and then be allowed to set up what would have been possibly a good defence to the petition. I agree with him to a very large extent that it is most inconvenient and very unsatisfactory that such should be the case, but it seems to me I am obliged to follow the decision in Restall v. Restall (5). Counsel says that as these matters [could]* have been raised by him on the divorce petition, the husband is estopped from setting them up now. I cannot see any estoppel. The matter has never been decided. He says it is estoppel by implied res judicata. The matter has never been investigated. It is quite true that if the husband had appeared he might well have gone into these matters. C How far these matters may be matters going to the question of amount or going to the question of a dum casta clause on a maintenance petition has not been decided, and I do not see how the husband can be estopped from raising them now. The other point counsel makes is that it is in the discretion of the registrar, and that I ought not to interfere with it. It may be that it is to a certain extent within the discretion of the registrar to strike out a pleading or not, but I think that that discretion must be exercised in accordance with the decisions that have been given; and much as I regret that this method of dealing with the case should be allowed, I think I am bound to allow it; although I think that it is most inconvenient and undesirable that a husband should be allowed to lie by, with all these charges, until the maintenance petition comes on to be heard. It leads, at any rate in my view, to something very like collusion, although it may not perhaps amount to it in this case. It means that the registrar will have to try what is practically a divorce case in going into all these matters, though no doubt the conduct of the husband in lying by like this may be a matter which will have to be considered when the whole case comes to be dealt with."

F The decision in Mould v. Mould (6) was questioned by SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in Lindsay v. Lindsay (7). In that case a wife had, by her petition for judicial separation on the ground of desertion, alleged that her child was a child of the marriage. The husband by his answer did not dispute this allegation. She subsequently filed a supplemental petition alleging adultery to which the husband filed no answer. A decree was pronounced dissolving the marriage and giving to the wife custody of the child. Thereafter in maintenance proceedings the husband sought to reduce the amount of maintenance by alleging that the child was not his and also by putting forward the conduct of the wife as a ground for reduction. It was held that he could not do so. SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1934] P. 166):

H "Now it is quite clearly laid down by the Court of Appeal in Restall v. Restall (5) that in exercising its discretion as to the amount of maintenance it is essential that the court should have before it all the relevant evidence of the conduct of the parties both before and after the marriage. It is obvious that evidence that the wife has given birth to another man's child during the marriage, is, of itself, relevant evidence of conduct, if the evidence is in the circumstances admissible. In Mould v. Mould (6) BATESON, J., held that the rule laid down in Restall v. Restall (5) extended to maintenance proceedings in a case of dissolution of marriage in which there had been no defence to the original petition, although the conduct in question might have afforded possible defences which would have been an answer to the original petition, if pleaded. Speaking for myself, I should desire to consider the matter further before holding that that result followed from the decision in Restall v. Restall (5). I would point out that that was a nullity suit based upon the consanguinity of the parties. It is manifest, therefore, that misconduct on the part of the petitioner would not of itself have afforded any answer; and in fact no question of estoppel arose in that case. In considering the doctrine of res judicata, the distinction is to be borne in mind between a case in which a party who has had an opportunity of proving a fact in support of his claim or defence, and has not chosen to rely on it, is afterwards precluded from putting that fact before any tribunal, and a case in which the very fact itself has been judicially determined. The principles relating to both these classes of case are fully dealt with in the judgment of LUSH, J., in Ord v. Ord (8). The present case is, indeed, one of the former class, inasmuch as the respondent deliberately abstained from putting in issue the paternity of the child in his answer to the wife's original petition, and made no answer to the supplemental petition. Although the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, do not deal in terms with the effect of the failure of a respondent to deny specific allegations in the petition, as is the case in Ord. 19, r. 13, r. 17 and r. 19, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, I think that it is plain that Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, r. 21 and r. 22 (a), coupled with the form of answer given in Appendix No. VI, have the same effect. The specimen form indicates that the matrimonial offence charged should be specifically denied; that any counter-charge should be pleaded, and there is this note: 'In like manner respondent is to state connivance, condonation or other matters relied on as a ground for dismissing the petition.' I have no doubt, as I was assured is the case, that the practice of this court is to treat as being admitted any material fact alleged in the petition which is not expressly stated in the answer to be denied or not to be admitted. As I have already said, if the matter depended solely on this branch of the doctrine of res judicata, I should have wished to consider further whether, as was held by BATESON, J., in Mould v. Mould (6), there is anything in the decision in Restall v. Restall (5) which obliges this court to receive on a maintenance petition evidence of facts which would have afforded a defence to the petition for divorce, but which the respondent spouse deliberately refrained from raising in answer to that petition. But, in my opinion, however the matter might stand on a mere failure by the respondent to raise the issue when he had the opportunity of doing so, this is essentially one of the class of cases in which, as between these parties, a fact 'directly in issue in the case has actually been decided by the court and appears from the judgment itself to be the ground on which it was based'; to use the words taken from SIR JAMES STEPHEN'S DIGEST OF EVIDENCE (10th ed., p. 53), which was quoted by LUSH, J., in Ord v. Ord (8), already referred to. I do not think that this is merely a case of a matter coming collaterally in question, or of a matter incidentally cognizable, or of a matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment: see Kingston's (Duchess) Case (9) and the passage from the judgment of KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., in Barrs v. Jackson (10), cited by LUSH, J., in Ord v. Ord (8)."

In Robinson v. Robinson (11) a wife had obtained a decree of divorce on her undefended petition alleging adultery, and subsequently the husband, in maintenance proceedings, sought to impugn her conduct by alleging that she had committed adultery. HENN COLLINS, J., held that he could not do so. He said ([1943] P. 44):

A "It has been contended on behalf of the wife that it is no longer open to the husband to raise the issue of her adultery because it is res judicata.
That phrase is used to include two separate states of things. One is where a judgment has been pronounced between parties and findings of fact are involved as a basis for that judgment. All the parties affected by the judgment are then precluded from disputing those facts, as facts, in any subsequent litigation between them. The other aspect of the term arises where a party seeks to set up facts which, if they had been set up in the first suit, would or might have affected the decision. That is not strictly raising any issue which has already been adjudicated, but it is convenient B to use the phrase res judicata as relating to that position. In the present case I have to consider both aspects. First, on the strict interpretation of res judicata, was the issue of the wife's adultery involved in the decree which was granted in the divorce? If it was, that issue would be concluded between the parties and could not be litigated again in these proceedings:
C Lindsay v. Lindsay (7). An allegation of the wife's adultery might, but not necessarily would, have afforded a conclusive answer to her petition.
She might still, although convicted of adultery, have obtained a decree because her adultery would only be a discretionary bar. The issue of adultery does not seem to me to be fundamental to the decree nor necessarily involved in it. I, therefore, do not think that the matter is res judicata D in the strict sense of the term. That, however, does not necessarily dispose of the case because there is the statutory direction in s. 190 (1) of the Act of 1925, that, in considering a question of maintenance and security, the court must have regard, among other things, to the conduct of the parties.
Mr. Fairweather, relying on Mould v. Mould (6), says that the conduct of the husband in not producing the evidence at the hearing of the suit does not affect the position under the sub-section. On the other hand, Mr.
E Harold Brown says that in the public interest a man ought not to be allowed to stand by and allow his wife to obtain a decree which she might not have been granted if the court had known certain facts, and then to set up those facts in opposition to an application for maintenance. This aspect of the matter raises the greater difficulty. I do not think that the question would have arisen but for a doubt which SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., F expressed in Lindsay v. Lindsay (7), where he said: 'In Mould v. Mould (6), BATESON, J., held that the rule laid down in Restall v. Restall (5) extended to maintenance proceedings in a case of dissolution of marriage in which there had been no defence to the original petition, although the conduct in question might have afforded possible defences which would have been an answer to the original petition, if pleaded. Speaking for myself, I G should desire to consider the matter further before holding that that result followed from the decision in Restall v. Restall (5).' Restall v. Restall (5) was a case in which the misconduct which was sought to be set up in maintenance proceedings would have had no bearing on the matters in issue between the parties, and, therefore, the learned President, if I may respectfully say so, very wisely declined to regard Restall v. Restall (5) as extending H to a case in which such misconduct was material to the issue, and I have to decide whether the doubt he expressed whether it extended even to a case where that misconduct might have been material to the issue is well founded. The view to which I have come is that, although proceedings under s. 190 (1) are separate proceedings from those for dissolution, a party ought not to be allowed to refrain from using at the hearing of a suit for divorce information which he had, or which, but for his carelessness, he might have had, and then, when his pocket begins to be affected, propose to prove that information and put the petitioner to the expense of a separate issue."

Counsel for the husband relies on Mould v. Mould (6) and argues that Robinson v. Robinson (11) was wrongly decided. He argues that the statute says in clear terms that the conduct of the parties is to be considered; that, if Robinson v. Robinson (11) was rightly decided, all serious consideration of conduct is excluded since there is no blameworthy conduct that might not have been "material to the issue" under a plea of conduct conducing; that he gave notice before the trial that a question of conduct would be raised on the argument; and that Chapple v. Chapple (4) was not cited to the learned judge in Robinson v. Robinson (11). He also argues that, unless his contentions are correct, the memorandum of appearance, Form 5 (RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed., p. 728) which, by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 7, must be served on respondents, is misleading to a respondent husband, since it leads him to believe that he can defend on maintenance without defending the petition, and does not warn him that he will not be allowed to raise in maintenance proceedings matters which might have been relevant to the divorce proceedings. He further relies on Direction 20 (RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed., p. 759):

"Where an issue of adultery (not determined in the suit itself) is raised upon a petition for maintenance, permanent alimony, or periodical payments, the direction of a judge should be taken as to how the several issues in the pleadings shall be determined. In order to avoid delay by first taking an appointment before a registrar, the matter may be brought before the judge by summons."

It is, I think, important to note that this direction was given on Mar. 28, 1934—a year after the decision in Mould v. Mould (6) and a month before the learned President considered and doubted that case in Lindsay v. Lindsay (7).

Counsel for the wife, on the other hand, relies on Robinson v. Robinson (11) and submits that Mould v. Mould (6) was wrongly decided. He contends that the only conduct which can be investigated by the registrar is: (i) conduct of which the husband did not know or could not reasonably have known at the trial; (ii) matters proved in evidence at the trial, e.g., in the petitioner's discretion statement; and, possibly, (iii) matters which must have been irrelevant at the trial. He relies on Dailey v. Dailey (otherwise Smith) (12), where the Court of Appeal referred back the case to the learned judge to consider facts shown on the transcript of the evidence at the trial without making any suggestion that he or the registrar should hear the evidence of the parties. Counsel for the wife in the present case argues that the husband is not entitled to make against his wife any allegations that are not so trivial that the court ought to disregard them as valueless, and that, therefore, he ought to be precluded from putting them forward. He suggests that the direction of 1934 refers only to adultery by the petitioner of which the respondent could not have known at the trial, a suggestion which makes the direction of extremely limited application. It cannot be intended to refer to adultery subsequent to the maintenance proceedings since in that case it would have said "on an application to vary" not "on a petition for maintenance." He agrees that on his contention the memorandum of appearance (Form 5) in its present form is misleading to respondents.

Either view in its extreme form may lead to practical inconvenience and injustice. If, as counsel for the husband argues, all questions of conduct are open to the husband on maintenance proceedings, it is possible for a husband to allow his wife to secure an undefended decree on the ground of desertion because he wishes to be free, and then, when it has been made absolute, to reduce or extinguish his financial liability by proving that the parting was consensual or even that it was the wife who deserted him. In my view, this offends both against the rule of estoppel and also against public policy since it is a fraud on the court. The fact that a husband, while not defending, writes pendente lite to say that he will raise certain matters in the maintenance proceedings does not affect the matter. In this case the letter was, admittedly, not read to the trial judge. If it had been read, the judge could not have dealt with it effectively except by referring it for investigation to the King's Proctor. Such a practice would be obviously undesirable. On the other hand, if a husband is to be estopped from raising anything that might have been material to the issue in the petition, and if those words are understood to mean that any blameworthy conduct of the wife is to be excluded from consideration (as counsel for the wife argues) unless it is so trivial as to be valueless, it would mean that a husband whose wife's conduct was bad but did not actually justify his leaving her would either have to turn an undefended into a defended suit by putting in an answer that to his knowledge would not succeed in order that a judge could deal with it at the trial from the point of view of maintenance, or he would have to allow her to obtain as much maintenance as would have been awarded to a loving and devoted wife.

I do not think that the authorities compel me to either view in its extreme form. In my view, the correct principles (and they are the principles to be drawn from the judgment of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in Lindsay v. Lindsay (7) and from that of HENN COLLINS, J., in Robinson v. Robinson (11) which was founded on it) are these. The husband is estopped in maintenance proceedings from asserting matters inconsistent with the decree. Further he is, for reasons of public policy, prohibited from asserting matters (of which he knew) which would reasonably have been expected, if proved, to provide an effective answer to the petition or to produce a different result at the trial (e.g., mutual decrees instead of a decree to the wife alone, or a discretionary decree instead of a decree as of right). I am not satisfied that this further prohibition extends to matters of which he was ignorant at the time of the trial, but which he might have known "but for his carelessness," to quote the words of HENN COLLINS, J. If and in so far as the judgment of HENN COLLINS, J., in Robinson v. Robinson (11) goes further than this I cannot agree with him. In that case the wife's adultery, if known to the court, would have produced a different result. The court would have granted a decree, not as of right to the wife, but under its discretionary power, and there might well have been mutual decrees.

I have ventured to put the matter in words slightly different from those in which it has previously been put, because I feel that in this case too narrow a view has been taken of the words in the judgments. In cases near the border line the registrar will, on clearly defined allegations and on a reasonable view, have to decide on which side of the line the allegations fall, bearing in mind both the importance, on the one hand, of not excluding a just consideration of conduct which the Act in terms requires and which the Court of Appeal has declared to be of primary importance, and the importance, on the other hand, of not allowing a husband to lie by in order to obtain a decree, and, when it has been made absolute, to raise matters which ought to have been before the court at the trial. There are cases where the earlier conduct of the wife has contributed to the final break-up of the marriage although such conduct would provide no effective answer to the petition and would not amount to conduct conducing. It is not just that such conduct should be put beyond the scope of criticism. The rights of a wife who has always been selfish and unloving ought not to be identical with those of a wife who has always been loving and unselfish. Where the husband's income leaves available for an injured wife only enough to supply the bare necessities of life, the difference may be negligible, but where the husband's means enable the wife's portion to be more generous I do not think that a bad wife should enjoy as much luxury as a good wife. I respectfully agree with LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in Restall v. Restall (5) that this does not justify "a large number of petty or irrelevant acts . . . being included in those which the court must consider" and that "the registrar will be able to keep the matters in issue within reasonable limits." Such limits will also probably be observed by the parties owing both to the fact that it is the respondent husband who will probably be paying the cost of the investigation and to the fact that he will realise that too tyrannical an investigation is likely to have an effect the reverse of that which he desires. Registrars have a wide knowledge of humanity and its frailties. They will not lightly condemn a wife merely because on the long and eventful journey of married life she has been found wanting in good temper or good judgment on isolated occasions retrospectively collected by an erring husband.

In this case the alleged conduct of the wife may affect the amount of maintenance. I do not say that it will, but it would certainly be wrong to say that it cannot. That conduct (with the exception of her lack of response to attempts at reconciliation) would not have been reasonably expected to provide an effective answer to the petition or to produce a different result, since it would not amount to reasonable cause for his leaving her. The allegations are, therefore, admissible, but they must be reduced to greater precision in an affidavit by the husband. As to her alleged lack of response to attempts at reconciliation, if it is intended thereby to say that a reasonable wife ought not to have acted as she did, and that, in consequence, there was no reconciliation and the marriage came to an end, that allegation is inconsistent with the decree. If it is merely intended to say that, though it was reasonable for her to act as she did, a more loving and forgiving wife could have prevented the breakdown of the marriage, it cannot, in my opinion, have any effect on maintenance. A wife should not be penalised for failing to show more love and forgiveness than it was reasonable to expect. That allegation is, therefore, not admissible. If, as I understand, the other allegations are denied by the wife, the proper course is for the parties to be cross-examined before the registrar: see the observations of the Court of Appeal in Bass v. Bass (13) where cross-examination was ordered in similar circumstances under r. 191 of the Divorce Rules, 1865, which was in the same terms as the present r. 52. It is suggested that this involves the trial of an issue. I do not agree. Subject to the direction of 1934 relating to questions of adultery, the correct procedure is a hearing before the registrar (with oral evidence where necessary) as envisaged by LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in the passage in Restall v. Restall (5) already cited. The question of the prematurity of this application (which was only a subsidiary point and could have been cured by adjournment of the summons) is not now of any importance. If the husband delivers within twenty-eight days a fresh affidavit more clearly defining his allegations, the wife can deal with them by affidavit, and unless she admits them examination and cross-examination of any witnesses will take place in accordance with r. 52.

DARLING v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND ANOTHER.

[DURHAM ASSIZES (MORRIS, J.), June 12, 13, 1950.]

Negligence—Work on land under statutory authority—Entry on land by contractors under contract with Ministry—Negligence of contractors—Liability of Ministry—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 50 (1).

A The plaintiff was the owner of a field on which a firm of contractors, in performance of a contract between them and the Ministry of Fuel and Power, acting in conjunction with the Minister of Works, entered to do work in connection with the making of boreholes or trial holes to see whether workable seams of coal lay under the land. The Minister of Works, as a competent authority under reg. 49 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, had authorised the entry of the contractors on the field under reg. 50 (1) of the regulations. Owing to the negligence of the contractors in leaving a heap of timber lying in the field, a horse belonging to the plaintiff, which was grazing there, was injured. In an action against the Ministries and the contractors for damages for negligence,

C HELD: the Ministries, having availed themselves of the power given in reg. 50 (1) to do work on the land, had a duty to the occupier of the land not to cause unnecessary danger or damage to him, and they could not escape from the responsibility of seeing that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor, and, therefore, both Ministries were liable to the plaintiff in damages.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

H The plaintiff's horse was injured by running into a pile of timber placed on the plaintiff's land by the second defendants, a firm of contractors under contract to the Ministry of Fuel and Power. The second defendants, pursuant to the contract, entered on the land by virtue of a notice given to the plaintiff by the Ministry of Works, who were acting in conjunction with the Ministry of Fuel and Power, under powers given them by reg. 50 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. For the Ministries it was contended that the work on the plaintiff's field was undertaken by the second defendants as independent contractors, and that, therefore, the Ministries were not liable for the negligence, if any, of the second defendants. Alternatively, the Ministries claimed to be entitled to be indemnified by the second defendants under the terms of the contract between them and the Ministry of Fuel and Power. The facts appear in the judgment.

Waller for the plaintiff.

Alastair Sharp for the Attorney-General.

J. Harvey Robson for the second defendants.

MORRIS, J.: The plaintiff, Mr. William Darling, is a farmer and dealer in hunters, at Sacriston, Durham. In 1947 the Ministry of Fuel and Power thought it desirable to prospect in the region of the plaintiff's house to see whether there were seams of coal that could, with advantage, be worked, and to have made boreholes and trial holes to test the quantity of coal that might be found. The procedure adopted was to employ the powers given by the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 49 (1) of which (as amended) provides that for the purposes of any regulation contained in Part IV of the regulations, the competent authorities should include the Minister of Works. Regulation 50 (1) (as amended) provides:

"Any person authorised by a competent authority to act under this regulation . . . may . . . for any of the purposes specified in sub-s. (1) of s. 1 of the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945, do any work on any land . . ."

In the present case, for purposes of administrative convenience, the Minister of Works acted in conjunction with the Minister of Fuel and Power, and on Mar. 3, 1948, a notice was served on the plaintiff, signed for and on behalf of the Minister of Works, informing the plaintiff that the power was being exercised of going on to the plaintiff's land to make boreholes or trial holes.

It was the practice of the Ministry of Fuel and Power, who were responsible for these boreholes and trial holes to see whether coal could be discovered, to employ firms of contractors to do the work for them, and the Ministry employed the second defendants to do the work that the Ministry desired to have done on the plaintiff's land. The plaintiff did not pay any special attention to the notice of Mar. 3, 1948, because he had had similar previous notices. It was, apparently, not the practice of the contractors who were to go on to the land of an occupier to make boreholes or trial holes to inform the occupier that they were proposing to proceed to start their work. The result was that when the second defendants went on the plaintiff's land they did not give him any intimation in advance of the day on which they were coming. One evening early in July, 1948, the plaintiff went for a walk on his land and found that operations were in progress in Field 212.

By cl. 8 of an agreement made between the Ministry of Fuel and Power and the second defendants on May 20, 1947, it was provided:

"The contractor shall be responsible for and make compensation for any injury (including injury resulting in death) or damage occasioned to any person whomsoever."

Condition 6 of the specification, headed "Safety Precautions," provides:

"The contractor will be responsible that at all times persons and animals are safeguarded from damage or injury arising from whatsoever cause in connection with the work."

The plaintiff knew nothing about that contract or its terms and he has only seen it in the course of this litigation. In Field 212 the plaintiff had a number of horses—some of them were young carthorses and some were hunters. Among the hunters was a black gelding which he had bought in 1947 for £225. He says that he has suffered serious loss because this gelding was lamed as a result of running into a pile of timber which was left in the field near where a borehole was being sunk. The horse was kept for some time in the hope of recovery, but eventually it was found that recovery was not taking place, and the plaintiff sold the horse at a considerable loss. He, therefore, claims that he has lost most of the value of the horse because of an act of negligence in leaving the timber unfenced and exposed near the trial borehole.

A The plaintiff brings his action against two defendants. The first defendant is the Attorney-General, who represents the Ministry of Fuel and Power and the Ministry of Works. The second defendants are the firm of contractors who were employed by the Ministry of Fuel and Power to go on the land and do the work. The plaintiff says he is entitled to recover against both defendants, and he claims that the loss which he has suffered resulted from negligence for which both defendants are responsible. Both defendants invite me to say that it has not been shown that the horse was injured by running into the timber. They B further say that, even if that is shown, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover as it has not been established that it was an act of negligence to leave the timber in the position in which it was on the ground. The Attorney-General further says that, in any event, the Ministries are not responsible, for the second defendants are independent contractors, and, if there is liability in anyone, it rests C with them alone. Alternatively, the Attorney-General says that, if it should be held that the Ministries are liable, they should be indemnified by the second defendants because of the contractual position between the Ministry of Fuel and Power and the second defendants. The second defendants do not dispute that, if the Ministries are liable, they must be indemnified by them (the second defendants).

D I am satisfied that there was a heap of loose timber at the north-west corner of the fence that had been put up round the trial borehole. When the second defendants went on Field 212, it was apparent to them that there were horses on the field, and, indeed, their attention was called to the matter by Mr. Rayner, the prospecting officer of the Ministry of Fuel and Power. When he went on Field 212 with the defendant's foreman, he not only pointed E out the site and measured the size of the trial borehole, which was to be six feet by four feet, but he told the foreman that a fence must be erected before night time because there were horses in the field. So, it was clearly within the knowledge of the representative of the Ministry and that of the sub-contractors that there were horses in the field in which operations were to take place. The work of the sub-contractors was due to finish each day between 4.30 and 5 p.m. F On the evening of July 7, 1948, a lorry-load of planking arrived just as work was finishing for the day. It would have taken about a quarter of an hour to do what, undoubtedly, would have been done had the timber arrived earlier, namely, to stack it within the fencing. As it was, it was left in the disarray in which it had been tumbled out of the lorry.

G The plaintiff says that after he went for the walk to which I have referred he saw the horses come from the south part of the field, which is at a lower level than that of the north part, and run in a bunch near the fence round the trial hole. He says that he saw the black gelding and a brown horse rather on the inside of the horses, i.e., on the side nearer to the fence around the trial hole, and that the horses on the outside jostled those on the inside so that the black gelding and the brown horse came suddenly on the pile of loose timber. The H two horses jumped on that timber and both fell down. They rolled over, but they were able to get up and continue galloping with the rest. The plaintiff says that next morning he found that the two horses that had fallen were both lame. The brown horse recovered, but the black gelding never did so, and he claims that the lameness resulted through running into the timber and falling over. After seeing and hearing the plaintiff I am satisfied that he has not invented this story and that his horses were injured on the evening of July 7 because they ran into the loose timber.

That being so, the question arises whether that was the result of negligence on the part of anyone. If it was, the further question arises: Who is responsible for that negligence? It has been strongly submitted by counsel for both defendants that they had a right to go on the land and that it could not have been a negligent or careless thing, in itself, merely to leave timber on the land near the fence. In the statement of claim the plaintiff pleaded that there was an act of trespass, but I think counsel for the Attorney-General is right when he submits that there was authority under reg. 50 (1) to enter on the land, and so it does not seem to me that the act of placing the timber somewhere near to the operations, can be said to amount to trespass on the land.

Was it an act of negligence? In my judgment, it was. I agree that it does not necessarily follow that because within a few hours of the putting of this loose timber on the land two horses were injured, it was a negligent act to have left the timber as it was, but it was all left in a tumbled heap, and, in my judgment, was in such a state as to constitute a peril to the horses. The fact that two horses did, within so short a time, come in contact with the timber lends confirmation to the view that it was a careless act to have left the timber where it was. That being so, in my judgment, there was a negligent act, and I now come to the question whether the Ministries are responsible. Counsel for the Attorney-General submits that the act of leaving that loose timber about should be regarded as a typical example of a collateral act of negligence, a kind of casual collateral act, for which only the second defendants as independent contractors are responsible. There have been many cases arising in regard to this subject, and it is not always easy to steer a definite course between one side and the other. I was referred, for example, to Penny v. Wimbledon Urban Council (1), and counsel for the plaintiff submitted that no difference in principle could be found between the reasoning in that case and the reasoning of his argument for the plaintiff in the present case. I was referred to other cases showing illustrations of merely casual acts of a contractor for which responsibility rests with him alone. In Padbury v. Holliday & Greenwood, Ltd. (2), for example, a tool, left on a ledge, was projected on to a pavement below through the negligence of some servant of the sub-contractor. In the present case, the Ministry of Fuel and Power were not performing a statutory duty, but they were availing themselves of powers given them by the Defence Regulations. When they chose to avail themselves of those powers, in my judgment, they owed a duty to the occupier of the land. I was referred by counsel for the plaintiff to a passage in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Fisher v. Ruislip-Northwood U.D.C. (2) where he said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 460):

"The duty of undertakers in respect of the safety of works executed under statutory powers has been considered on many occasions. Statutes conferring such powers do not as a rule in terms impose a duty on the undertakers to exercise care in the construction or maintenance of the works. No such duty was imposed by the Civil Defence Act, 1939, in respect of shelters constructed under its powers. Nevertheless, it is quite clearly established that undertakers entrusted with statutory powers are not in general entitled in exercising them to disregard the safety of others. The nature of the power must, of course, be examined before it can be said that a duty to take care exists, and, if so, how far the duty extends in any given circumstances. If the legislature authorises the construction of works which are in their nature likely to be a source of danger and which no precaution can render safe, it cannot be said that the undertakers must either refrain from constructing the works or be struck with liability for accidents which may happen to third persons; so to hold would make nonsense of the statute. If, on the other hand, the legislature authorises the construction and maintenance of a work which will be safe or dangerous to the public according as reasonable care is or is not taken in its construction or maintenance, as the case may be, the fact that no duty to take such care is expressly imposed by the statute cannot be relied on as showing that no such duty exists. It is not to be expected that the legislature will go out of its way to impose express obligations or restrictions in respect of matters which every reasonably minded citizen would take for granted."

A In my judgment, when the Ministry decided to avail themselves of the power given in reg. 50 (1), they had a duty to the occupier of the land not to cause unnecessary danger or damage to him. The duty is, of course, not an absolute one, but, in my judgment, they did owe a duty to take reasonable care towards the occupier of the land having regard to all the circumstances. The Ministry knew they were going to enter on Field 212, and they contemplated that the occupier who had horses on the field would continue to occupy the rest of the field. It was contemplated, therefore, that the operations of the Ministry of Fuel and Power would not be exclusive in occupancy of the field. In those circumstances, it seems to me only natural that there was a duty to take reasonable care towards the occupier of the field so as to avoid causing danger and so as to avoid causing damage to the occupier. I was referred, further, to the well-known passage in the speech of LORD BLACKBURN in Dalton v. Angus (3) C (6 App. Cas. 829):

D "Ever since Quarman v. Burnett (4) it has been considered settled law that one employing another is not liable for his collateral negligence unless the relation of master and servant existed between them. So that a person employing a contractor to do work is not liable for the negligence of that contractor or his servants. On the other hand, a person causing something to be done, the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from the responsibility attaching on him of seeing that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor."

E In my judgment, that principle is applicable in the present circumstances. When the Ministry availed themselves of the power given them, they owed a duty to the occupier of the nature which I have described, and, in my judgment, they do not absolve themselves from that duty which they owed to the occupier by employing an independent contractor.

F That being so, in my judgment, both defendants are liable. The plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of £309 5s. 0d. from both defendants, and the first defendant is entitled to be indemnified by the second defendants.

Judgment accordingly with costs.

BEST v. SAMUEL FOX AND CO., LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[LEEDS ASSIZES (Croom-Johnson, J.), July 6, 7, 20, 1950.]

Negligence Wife's loss of consortium—Injury to husband causing sexual incapacity —Tortfeasor's liability to wife.

Husband and Wife—Consortium—Right of consortium—Husband injured and losing sexual capacity owing to defendant's negligence—Defendant's liability to wife.

By reason of the negligence of the defendants the plaintiff's husband sustained physical injuries, one of the results of which was that he became incapable of sexual intercourse, and, in consequence, the plaintiff suffered in health. There was no evidence that the defendants knew that the plaintiff's husband was a married man. In an action by the plaintiff claiming damages from the defendants in respect of the interference with her right to her husband's consortium, HELD: (i) the novelty of the action was no bar to it provided that it was only a new instance of a principle known to the law and not new in principle.

Principle laid down by ASHHURST, J., in Pasley v. Freeman (1789) (3 Term. Rep. 63), applied.

(ii) on the analogy of the law relating to the enticement of a spouse the defendants were not liable for the plaintiff's loss of consortium or for interference with her right to such consortium because they were unaware that her husband was married, nor had they committed any deliberate act which was intended to interfere with her right.

Place v. Searle ([1932] 2 K.B. 497) and Newton v. Hardy (1933) (149 L.T. 165), applied.

(iii) although the violation of a legal right committed knowingly gave a cause of action, any interference by the defendants with the plaintiff's rights in relation to her husband was innocent and unintentional, and, therefore, was insufficient to support an action.

Lumley v. Gye (1853) (22 L.J.Q.B. 463), distinguished.

(iv) the defendants were under no duty to take care in relation to the plaintiff, and, therefore, were not liable for the consequences to her of their negligence.

ACTION for damages tried by CROOM-JOHNSON, J., without a jury.

On Mar. 23, 1946, the plaintiff's husband, in the course of his employment with the defendants, met with an accident and sustained severe personal injuries as a result of which he became incapable of sexual intercourse. On July 20, 1948, the husband recovered damages in an action against the defendants. By her original statement of claim the plaintiff in the present action pleaded that, as a result of the negligence of the defendants, she had been deprived of the consortium of her husband, but during the trial this was amended by leave to a plea that her consortium had been interfered with without justification. She alleged that she had been deprived of the opportunity of having further children and of normal marital relations, and had suffered in health, and she claimed damages.

Hinchcliffe, K.C., and N. J. Black for the plaintiff.

Shepherd, K.C., and Leslie for the defendants.

Shepherd, K.C., and Withers-Payne for the third party.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20. CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: This is an action by a married woman against her husband's former employers, in which she seeks to recover damages against them per quod consortium amisit, or because she has lost the comfort and the companionship of her husband.

The plaintiff is a young woman, now aged about twenty-four. Her husband, Rex Holroyd Best, is now aged about twenty-nine, and he was employed by the defendants as a steel erector. He was knocked off the track of an overhead travelling crane and sustained severe personal injuries, as a result of which, among other things, he lost the ability to perform his sexual functions. He brought an action against the defendants which was tried at the assizes here on July 20, 1948, and he recovered £4,288 15s., including special damages, with costs. On Jan. 12, 1949, Mrs. Best caused the writ in the present action to be issued.

The husband of the plaintiff, therefore, has become sterile. It is a form of impotence which leaves him with all the urge for sexual intercourse, but at the same time a complete inability to give himself any satisfaction or to give his wife any sexual gratification. The result is that she merely gets irritated. She suffers from headaches, irritability, periods of depression, and her dreadful situation is the source of considerable discord between her husband and herself.

To sum up the whole position so far as she is concerned, according to the agreed medical report she has the symptoms of an anxiety neurosis of moderate intensity. The result is that one of the most beautiful sides of the relationship between husband and wife, properly understood and properly appreciated by sensible people, is completely denied to this unhappy woman, and she says, in effect, that this is to deprive her of the right which she has—a right recognised by our law—to the comfort and the decent and proper enjoyment of the affection of her husband. A

The case is put in two ways. It is said, first, that she has been deprived of the privileges of matrimony, as I have already described, and that, somewhat by analogy to the cases relating to so-called enticement, her legal rights have been interfered with by the defendants, and she is entitled to be compensated. It is said, secondly, that, irrespective of anything else, she has, as it were, a vested right in the consortium of her husband and if anybody, however innocently, interferes with that vested right, she is entitled to maintain suit against him and to recover damages, much on the analogy, as I understand it, of a trespass to land. I have searched in vain through the papers in the original action which have been supplied me and the few that have been submitted to me in the present action, and I cannot find a scrap of evidence to suggest that the defendants knew that the plaintiff's husband was a married man. B C

It is admitted that a claim of this nature is completely novel. It has not, apparently, arisen before, and there is no case which indicates that anything of this sort has ever been canvassed before. That has been properly pressed on me at the Bar, but the law of England is a living law. It develops, and must develop, according to changes in the social life and social outlook. It has long since been pointed out that under our system of law the novelty of a claim is no answer to it. In Chapman v. Pickersgill (1) PRATT, C.J., in answer to an objection that the action was of a novel description, said (2 Wils. K.B. 146): "... so it was said in Ashby v. White (2). I wish never to hear this objection again." Some years later, perhaps, with great respect to that learned judge, I may be permitted to echo his sentiments. In the course of Ashby v. White (2) this question whether novelty can be an objection was a little further examined. In SMITH'S LEADING CASES, 13th ed., vol. 1, p. 280, the principle is stated in effect that where a legal right is infringed a court, if possible, will find a remedy for the wrong so suffered. Reference is there made to Russell v. Men of Devon (3), in which ASHHURST, J., said (2 Term. Rep.): D E

"It is a strong presumption that that which never has been done cannot by law be done at all. And it is admitted that no such action as the present has ever been brought, though the occasion must have frequently happened." F

The same judge is quoted as saying in Pasley v. Freeman (4) (3 Term. Rep. 63):

"Another argument which has been made use of is, that this is a new case, and that there is no precedent of such an action. Where cases are new in their principle, there I admit that it is necessary to have recourse to legislative interposition in order to remedy the grievance: but where the case is only new in the instance, and the only question is upon the application of a principle recognised in the law to such new case, it will be just as competent to courts of justice to apply the principle to any case which may arise two centuries hence as it was two centuries ago; if it were not, we ought to blot out of our law books one fourth part of the cases that are to be found in them." G H

I take that passage as my direction to myself on the correct approach to this topic. However attractive the last suggestion made by ASHHURST, J., may be to one who has authority cited to him daily about all sorts of topics, I must not allow that will of the wisp to lead me over the wrong moor. It seems to me that, applying that principle as I must, the question is whether the present case is new in principle or new in the instance, and that involves an examination of what the suggested principle is and the authorities which give rise to it.

The class of case which springs to mind is the now well-known action brought originally, according to the books, by a husband against another man for enticing away his wife. As long ago as 1745 in Winsmore v. Greenbank (5) it was held that an action lies by a husband against another man for enticing away his wife. That was an action on the case, and the basis of the decision is not clear from the decision itself. It was a question whether the damages which had been awarded (I think £3,000) were excessive, I gather, in principle. As I understand that the present case is intended to go to higher courts, I think it is desirable that I should trace the subsequent history of that cause of action which is the origin of the claim which I have to examine. Having come to the conclusion, as I must, being constrained by authority, that such an action lies, I shall consider the question whether the contrary action will lie by a wife against another woman or another person who entices away her husband.

Place v. Searle (6) was an action brought by a grocer's assistant at Cambridge to recover damages against a doctor of medicine, practising in the same city, for enticing away his wife. The action was tried at assizes with a jury before McCARDIE, J., who examined all the cases on the point. He came to the conclusion, after examining Winsmore v. Greenbank (5), that that case could only be recognised as good law when read subject to modern legislation and modern binding decisions which have established the freedom of wives at the present day, and he came to the conclusion that there was no evidence fit to be submitted to the jury and gave judgment for the defendant. He was, apparently, induced to take that view by examining a decision of DARLING, J., in Sanderson v. Hudson (7) in which the learned judge had, apparently, relied on the proposition that the defendant in such an action was not liable unless the wife's will had been overborne by the stronger will of the defendant. When Place v. Searle (6) came before the Court of Appeal the attention of the court was drawn to Gray v. Gee (8) in which DARLING, J., had examined the position afresh. The Court of Appeal considered the whole matter, and McCARDIE, J.'s ruling that there was no evidence fit to be submitted to the jury was reversed and the case was ordered to be set down for a new trial. In his judgment in the Court of Appeal, SCRUTTON, L.J., made observations on the right to consortium. It may well be that, as they stood, those observations were obiter dicta, but inasmuch as the whole matter has since been examined I had better read what he is reported to have said ([1932] 2 K.B. 512):

"It seems to be clear that at the present day a husband has a right to the consortium of his wife, and the wife to the consortium of her husband, and that each has a cause of action against a third party who, without justification, destroys that consortium . . . There being such a right it follows, and it has been so decided in numerous cases, that any person who, without justification, interferes with that right is liable to an action in tort."

I do not think GREER, L.J., said anything on that matter, but SLESSOR, L.J., puts it a little differently, and it is a very important difference. He said (ibid., 520):

"If the matter is considered as one of principle, this kind of action is founded upon a violation of a legal right, and so we have to inquire whether the defendant has done something which amounts to such a violation. The matter is put very clearly in Allen v. Flood (9) by LORD WATSON in these words ([1898] A.C. 107): 'He who wilfully induces another to do an unlawful act which, but for his persuasion, would or might never have been committed, is rightly held to be responsible for the wrong which he procured.' That, it appears to me, is the proper test to apply in asking the question in this case: did the defendant induce Mrs. Place to do an unlawful act which, but for his persuasion, she would or might not have committed?"

In Gray v. Gee (8) DARLING, J., having had an opportunity of considering the whole position, came to the conclusion that an action would lie by a married woman against another woman. McCARDIE, J., then discussed it also in a series of cases, known generally as Butterworth v. Butterworth and Englefield (10) where the learned judge was examining the basis of claims for damages for adultery, and he expressed the view that the action would not lie. In Newton v. Hardy (11), SWIFT, J., came to the conclusion that a married woman had a legal right to the consortium of her husband and could recover damages from any one who violated that right. I think it necessary that I should consider what the basis of that judgment was, because the learned judge decided that the action was unsuccessful where the plaintiff proved that the defendant had committed adultery with her husband but failed to prove that the defendant had induced him to cease from cohabiting and consorting with her. The learned judge, in the course of a very thorough judgment, says (149 L.T. 166):

"... if a wife can prove that her husband has been enticed, procured, persuaded to leave the consortium which is common between husband and wife, she is entitled to recover damages against the enticer. Had I not formed that opinion for myself, I should, sitting in this court, have held that it was the law of England ..."

He cites part of the passage which I have read from the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Place v. Searle (6), and continues (ibid.):

"Had I not arrived for myself, after the extremely full and able argument which has been put before me, at that same conclusion, I should have felt bound to follow the dictum of SCRUTTON, L.J., in that case. It is perfectly true that that was a case in which a husband was suing for the loss of consortium of his wife, and it is perfectly true that there are different arguments to be advanced according to whether it is a husband or a wife who is suing, but I cannot for myself think that now, as LORD CAMPBELL said in Lynch v. Knight (12), the right to sue for damaging the consortium is limited to the husband. It is a mutual right of husband and wife, and, if anybody breaks into it and violates it, then either of them, in my view, is entitled to sue for damages in respect of that wrong... My attention has been called to the precedent of a declaration before 1863 which is to be found in BULLEN AND LEAKE, 3rd ed. It is a declaration by a husband for enticing away his wife, and it states: 'C. B. was and is the wife of the plaintiff, and the defendant, well knowing the same, wrongfully enticed and procured the said C. B. unlawfully and without the consent and against the will of the plaintiff to depart and remain absent from the house and society of the plaintiff'."

As I read that judgment and from what I have cited in the other judgments, it looks as if, so far, the authorities indicate two things—(i) that the person sued must know that there is the relationship of husband and wife, and (ii) must have done some active act in the way of enticement (some wilful act) to deprive the person suing of the benefits and advantages of that consortium. SWIFT, J., continues (ibid., 167), quoting GREER, L.J., in Place v. Searle (6):

"'I agree that there is no room for dispute as to the law to be applied. It is accurately stated in the words quoted by SCRUTTON, L.J., from LUSH ON HUSBAND AND WIFE, although I should like to make one or two verbal alterations in the proposition there stated. At the foot of p. 3 of that work it is said that: "Corresponding to the husband's dominion over the person of his wife is the duty of the wife to reside and consort with her husband. This is a duty which she owes to him, and a person who tempts or entices her to violate this duty commits a wrong towards the husband for which he is entitled to recover damages; unless the person who harboured her acted from 'principles of humanity'." I think it would verbally be more accurate, if, instead of using the words "tempts or entices her," it were said "procures, entices, or persuades," and then, instead of the word "harboured," were substituted "procured, enticed, or persuaded" her, the statement then continuing as in the text."

The learned judge applied that and came to the conclusion that it was not proved in that particular case.

A That being so, in view of the way in which I regard the facts in this case, it seems to me that there is no evidence and no facts are agreed on which I could possibly come to the conclusion that the defendants, within the principle laid down in the enticement cases, have committed any intentional act or deliberate act which was intended to break up the consortium, and, so far as that branch of the subject goes, I have come to the conclusion that this action would fail.

B In advancing his second argument, counsel for the plaintiff did not shrink from putting it as a simple case of a trespass, as it were, on the right of the wife. He said the innocence of the intention of the defendants—and, as I gather, even the fact that they did not know that the injured man had a wife—makes no difference. The defendants have infringed the right which the plaintiff indubitably has. He says that, once it is shown that a right has been infringed, the innocence of the intention of the defendants does not matter. There certainly is nothing in any of the enticement cases which goes so far as that, and, accordingly, I have considered whether there is any assistance to be derived by examining and co-ordinating authorities on other branches of the law.

C First, what is the relationship between husband and wife? It certainly is not a contractual relationship, however people may talk about it in modern days.

D The parties may have some rights, the one against the other, but not on a contractual basis. Until certain modern legislation a wife could not maintain an action against her husband for failing to maintain her. Remedies were provided, as, for example, in the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, which were designed to meet that state of affairs. In Lumley v. Gye (13) the defendant had taken away from the plaintiff a singer with whom he had made a contract to sing in public. If it is right that the mere innocent infringement of a right enables the person whose right is infringed to bring an action, it is a little difficult to understand why it was considered necessary in Lumley v. Gye (13) to consider whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages. Lumley v. Gye (13) was expressly affirmed in Quinn v. Leatham (14) where that great master of the law, LORD MACNAGHTEN, examined Lumley v. Gye (13) to see whether it was rightly decided and he says ([1901] A.C. 510):

"I think it was ... In this case the question arises directly, and it is necessary to express an opinion on the point ... I have no hesitation in saying that I think the decision was right, not on the ground of malicious intention—that was not, I think, the gist of the action—but on the ground that a violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and that it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognised by law if there be no sufficient justification for the interference."

G In Lumley v. Gye (13) knowledge of the contractual relationship was proved, and, even if the present were a case of contractual relations, it seems to me that

H the plaintiff would have to prove at least knowledge of the contractual tie before her action could be maintained. As I have said, there is no evidence and there is no agreed statement that the defendants knew that the workman, to whom they owed a duty, was married. What is now said, apparently, involves the proposition that an innocent infringement of the plaintiff's right to consortium involves the defendants in a liability to pay her damages. In Lynch v. Knight (12) it was made quite clear that the remedy that was given in that case was so given because the act complained of was intentional. In Lumley v. Gye (13) also it seems to me that intent to interfere with the contractual relations was proved. It may be that it is an anomalous class of action. On the other hand, an action on the case lies for any malicious action: see COMYN'S DIGEST, Vol. 1, p. 221, on the type of case for this type of misfeasance.

I have examined one other matter to see whether it is any help for the plaintiff. It used to be thought to be a rule that when a person committed a tort he was only responsible to pay damages for the natural and probable consequences of his act. Since 1921, and as the law now stands, that has not been the rule. The Court of Appeal in Re Polemis and Furness, Withy & Co. (15) rejected it, and they there lay down the rule that, if a person is negligent, he is liable for the physical consequences, whether probable or not. Can it be said that if an employer, in breach of the duty which he has to a workman, causes injury to the workman, the workman can maintain an action for damages and the employer becomes liable for all the physical consequences, whether probable or not? If the workman had been maintaining the action, I should have said: "Yes," as the law stands. The Polemis case (15) binds me as a judge of first instance until it has been reviewed in the House of Lords, but I think that it lays down a rule which relates only to the measure of damage. I do not think that it is apt to make the wrongdoer liable for all conceivable consequences, including those suffered by a person to whom he owed no duty and of whom, as in this case, he had no knowledge. I think that that would be to make a new case, a case demanding legislation, within the limits of what I have read from the judgment of ASHHURST, J., in Pasley v. Freeman (4). I cannot see that the defendants' responsibility for negligence to the workman concerned can be extended to make them responsible to his wife when they had no intention, wilfully or knowingly or impliedly, of putting an end to or interfering with the consortium which the plaintiff says has been infringed.

In conclusion, I had better just mention one argument of counsel for the defendants. He said that an action of this nature is based on the destruction of the consortium and the result of that point being taken was an amendment to the statement of claim, which I gave leave to be made, so that instead of reading: "The defendants owed a duty to the plaintiff not to deprive her of the consortium" it now reads: "not to interfere, without justification, with her consortium with her husband." I do not think that is a good point. In this case, counsel says, the consortium still existed, the husband and wife were still living together. So they were, but I do not think, either in an enticement action or even if, in analogy with Lumley v. Gye (13), the plaintiff were entitled to maintain an action on the ground of some conscious interference, that it would be an answer to say: We did not interfere with the consortium completely. We only interfered with it partially." I rest on the observation of SCRUTTON, L.J., in the latter part of the passage which I read from his judgment in Place v. Searle (6) ([1932] 2 K.B. 513). If there is interference which comes within the principle which I have enunciated in this judgment, I do not think it makes any difference, except as to the quantum of damage, whether interference is partial or complete. I have come to the conclusion that this very interesting attempt to provide the plaintiff with a remedy in the form of damages for the loss which she has indirectly sustained by reason of the breach of duty which the defendants owed to her husband fails.

Judgment for the defendants with costs, and for the third party without costs.

A Plate—Silver plate—Cigarette case—Below statutory standard—Exposure to sale—Absence of hall-mark—Obligation to mark sub-standard goods—Liability of seller to penalty—Forfeiture of article—Stat. 8 & 9 Will. 3 c. 8, s. 8 (as amended by Plate Duty Act, 1719 (c. 11), s. 3)—Plate (Offences) Act, 1738 (c. 26), s. 1, s. 5.

A jeweller exposed to sale in his shop window twenty-one gold rings which were below the 9 carat standard, four which were above the 9 carat standard but below the 14 carat standard, one which was of the 14 carat standard, and one which was above the 18 carat standard but below the 22 carat standard. None of them bore the hall-mark of a British assay office. In addition he exposed to sale a silver cigarette case containing only 856 parts of fine silver in one thousand parts alloy, instead of the 925 parts of fine silver in one thousand parts alloy required by the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, s. 1, and not bearing the mark prescribed by s. 5 of that Act.

C HELD: (i) in view of the provisions of the Plate Offences Act, 1738, s. 1, the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798, s. 1, the Wedding Rings Act, 1855, s. 1, and the Gold Wares (Standard of Fineness) Order, 1932, art. 2, gold wedding rings were in the same position as other gold plate or manufacture of gold, with the result that they might be of any of the four standards permitted by law, namely, 22, 18, 14, and 9 carat, and must not be exposed to sale unless marked as provided by s. 5 of the Act of 1738, s. 2 of the Act of 1798, and art. 2 of the order of 1932.

D (ii) the twenty-one rings below the 9 carat standard were mere base metal and no offence had been committed by exposing them to sale unmarked, but in respect of the other rings the jeweller had committed offences under s. 6 of the Act of 1798.

E (iii) although, under the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, s. 1, a penalty of £10 was recoverable from the jeweller for having exposed to sale a silver cigarette case which was below the statutory standard of fineness, no penalty was recoverable from him for so exposing it when it was not marked as required by s. 5 of the Act, because only silver wares complying with the standard laid down by s. 1 were required by s. 5 to be marked.

F (iv) the cigarette case would be forfeited to the claimant under the statute 8 & 9 Will. 3 c. 8, s. 8, as amended by the Plate Duty Act, 1719, s. 3, which required all silver plate to be marked before being offered for sale, whether it were of the standards permitted by those sections or not.

(1) Buckley v. Alexander (unreported).

Action for penalties tried at Manchester Assizes.

The plaintiff, the assayer to the Guardians of the Standard of Wrought Plate within the city of Birmingham, claimed from the defendant, a jeweller carrying on business in Manchester, penalties for having exposed to sale gold rings which fell short of the legal standard of fineness and were not marked as required by law under the provisions of the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798, and the Gold Wares (Standard of Fineness) Order, 1932, and also for having exposed to sale a cigarette case which was of a fineness less than eleven ounces, two penny weight, of fine silver in every pound weight troy and not bearing the prescribed mark under the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, s. 1. He also claimed to have the cigarette case or its value forfeited on the ground that the defendant had exposed it to sale without its bearing the appropriate mark under the statute 8 & 9 Will. 3, s. 8, as amended by the Plate Duty Act, 1719, s. 3.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 3. PRITCHARD, J., read the following judgment. The Guardians of the Standard of Wrought Plate within the city of Birmingham are a statutory body which owed their original existence to the Plate Assay (Sheffield and Birmingham) Act, 1772, an Act which was repealed and replaced as regards the city of Birmingham by the Birmingham Assay Act, 1824. The plaintiff in this case is the assayer to those guardians. He sues to recover from the defendant, a jeweller carrying on business in Manchester, certain penalties and forfeitures to which the defendant is alleged to have become liable by having exposed to sale in his shop window twenty-seven gold wedding rings and a silver cigarette case all of which are alleged to fall short of the standard of fineness permitted by law, and none of which, it is alleged, bears the hall-mark which the law requires. The plaintiff, in the course of his evidence, produced twenty-seven rings and a silver cigarette case. The first question which I have to determine is whether the plaintiff has proved that those rings and that cigarette case were exposed to sale by the defendant.

[His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and found as a fact that the rings and cigarette case were exposed to sale in his shop window by the defendant, that they were wares assayed by a Dr. Watson, the senior assayer to the Royal Mint, in 1949, and that the rings were wedding rings, and he continued:] Having decided these disputed questions of fact in favour of the plaintiff, I now proceed to consider the evidence of Dr. Watson and its effect on this case in the light of the various Acts of Parliament referred to at the trial. It is convenient to consider these matters separately in so far as they relate respectively to the gold wedding rings and to the silver cigarette case and I will deal first with the gold wedding rings.

To understand Dr. Watson's evidence about the rings, it is necessary to say something first about the two words "alloy" and "carat." The word "alloy", if given its scientific meaning, means "a mixture of metals not being a mechanical mixture nor an amalgam," but the word has another meaning which—for the want of a better title—I may call its "legal" meaning, namely, "the allowed addition to gold or to silver of base metal." The meaning of the word "carat" is important and occasioned some confusion during the trial because the word is used in some of the material statutes in a context which both Dr. Watson and the plaintiff admitted they did not understand. Since the trial I have had opportunity to refer to various text-books, among them being DE CASTRO'S LAW AND PRACTICE OF HALL-MARKING GOLD AND SILVER WARES. On p. 143 of that book is to be found a useful glossary in which the author sets out on the subject of the word "carat" a quotation from Sir William Roberts-Austen's 1884 Cantor lectures. From this it appears that the carat system of weights on which the computation of the standard fineness of alloys of gold is based is historically obscure, but that the origin of the carat is Grecian. The ceratium was a small Greek weight. Its use came to us through Arabian alchemists or through the Roman mints, and it seems probable that the Greek keration and the Arab kyvat were applied to beans or seeds by native merchants, who made them serve provisionally as weights. If this view is correct the original conception connoted by the word "carat" is the conception of weight. This is not the conception connoted by the word as used by Dr. Watson and by the plaintiff. Both these witnesses told me that the sense in which they used the word was to imply "a twenty-fourth part" of a whole, and although, of course, a twenty-fourth part must have a weight, they used the word as meaning or implying, not weight, but proportion. According to them, pure, fine or unalloyed gold is denoted as 24 carat gold, which means that all twenty-four parts of a given whole would be gold. Twenty-four carat gold, however, is too soft a material from which to manufacture wares, and, therefore, by virtue of various statutes various wares from time to time have been permitted to be manufactured from lower standards which Dr. Watson describes as follows: (i) 22 carat gold, or twenty-two parts gold in twenty-four parts alloy, or 916.6 parts gold in one thousand parts alloy; (ii) 18 carat gold, or eighteen parts gold in twenty-four parts alloy, or 750 parts gold in one thousand parts alloy; (iii) 14 carat gold, or fourteen parts gold in twenty-four parts alloy, or 585 parts gold in one thousand parts alloy; and (iv) 9 carat gold, or nine parts gold in twenty-four parts alloy, or 375 parts gold in one thousand parts alloy. From the legal point of view material below the 9 carat standard is properly described as base metal. Applying his conceptions of these standards to the rings which he assayed in 1949, the result of Dr. Watson's evidence (which was not disputed and which I accept) is as follows: twenty-one rings were below the 9 carat standard; four rings were above the 9 carat standard but below the 14 carat standard; one ring was of the 14 carat standard; and one ring was above the 18 carat standard but below the 22 carat standard. Dr. Watson said further—agreeing with the witness Mr. Dorey—that none of those twenty-seven rings bore the hall-mark of a British assay office.

Such was the evidence on which the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to recover from the defendant the penalties which are imposed by the law on a person who exposes to sale gold wedding rings which (a) fall short of the legal standard of fineness and (b) are not marked as required by law. Therefore, it is now necessary to turn to the various statutes which lay down the required standard of fineness and demand that wares should be appropriately marked. There are three material statutes dealing with the permitted standards for industrial gold alloys, the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798, and the Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1854. The Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, is entitled and its material sections for the purposes of this case are s. 1, s. 5, s. 6 and s. 22.

Section 1 forbids any gold plate or manufacture to be made, sold, or exposed to sale after May 28, 1739, if it is less in fineness than 22 carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy, and imposes for every offence against this prohibition a penalty of £10 or imprisonment for six months in default of payment. Section 5 deals with the marking of such 22 carat gold wares and provides that from the said date no gold plate or manufacture made after that date shall be sold or exposed to sale unless it (being of the said standard) is marked as provided in the section. For the purposes of this case it will suffice if I refer to this mark as "the 22 carat mark." The section imposed the same penalty for offences against it as that imposed by s. 1. Section 6 contains a list of wares which are excepted from the requirements of s. 5. The list includes rings. At this time, therefore, gold rings, although they could not lawfully be made less in fineness than the 22 carat standard, could lawfully be sold or exposed to sale without the 22 carat mark. Section 22 provides that the penalties imposed by the Act shall and may be recovered, with full costs of suit, by action in His Majesty's Court of Record at Westminster, and provides that one half of such penalties shall go to the Crown and the other half to the person who shall sue for them.

The Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798, is entitled

and its material sections for the purposes of this case are s. 1, s. 2, s. 4 and s. 6. Section 4 preserved the legality of making, selling, and exposing to sale gold wares of the 22 carat standard, but s. 1 made it lawful after Oct. 1, 1798, to make, sell, and expose to sale or export gold plate or manufacture of the standard of 18 carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy. Section 2 provided a new mark for the newly permitted 18 carat standard. It will suffice if I call this mark "the 18 carat mark." The section then provided that after Oct. 1, 1798, gold plate or manufacture made after that date of the newly permitted 18 carat standard must not be sold or exposed to sale until it had been marked with the 18 carat mark instead of with the 22 carat mark, and for every offence against this provision a penalty of £10 is made recoverable. Section 6, which at first sight seems to resemble very closely s. 2, is, I think, different and is aimed at a different evil. In 1798 there must have been in existence a number of 22 carat marks which had been in use since 1738. The object of s. 2 was to ensure that the new 18 carat marks should be used for the newly permitted 18 carat wares. It was conceivable that a trader might inadvertently offer for sale a piece of gold plate of the newly permitted 18 carat standard marked with the 22 carat mark. In any event—whether he acted inadvertently or intentionally—the degree to which a buyer could be deceived in such circumstances was measurable by the difference of four carats in fineness. To check this evil the legislature imposed a penalty of £10, but there were still the traders who were prepared to offer for sale gold wares of less fineness than either of the then permitted standards and to sell as gold that which was legally mere base metal, possibly avoiding the consequences of making false pretences by failing to have any mark at all on the wares they were offering for sale. It was this evil, with its far greater opportunities for fraud, which, I think, the legislature had in mind when, by s. 6, it imposed a penalty of £50 on any person who, after Oct. 1, 1798, made or sold or exposed to sale or export any gold plate or manufacture not being duly marked either with the 22 carat mark or with the 18 carat mark, those being in 1798 the only two standards permitted by the law. Such then was the statutory position at the end of the eighteenth century.

The Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1854, by s. 1, enables the Crown by Orders in Council from time to time to order that gold plate or manufacture may be wrought of any standard, not being less than one third part in the whole of fine gold, to be declared in any such order, and also to approve thereby of the instrument with which gold plate and manufacture shall be marked or stamped, setting forth in figures the actual fineness thereof, according to the standard so declared. By s. 4 it is provided that the statutes then in force relating to standards of gold wares or to the marks for denoting the same and all the provisions, prohibitions, penalties and forfeitures enacted thereby shall continue in force and be construed with and as forming part of that Act, save only that in the interpretation thereof all standards authorised by the Crown in pursuance of that Act shall be deemed and taken to be lawful standards. In pursuance of this Act, and four months after it came into force, an Order in Council dated Dec. 11, 1854, declared that from and after that date gold plate and manufacture might be wrought of three new standards, namely, 15, 12, and 9 carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy. The order also specified three several dies or instruments with which gold plate and manufactures of the three new standards should be marked or stamped. The order of 1854 subsisted for seventy-eight years and then, in 1932, it was revoked by the Gold Wares (Standard of Fineness) Order of that year (S.R. & O., 1932, No. 654) which provides, in language not previously employed in the Acts to which I have referred, that gold plate and manufacture may, after Aug. 15, 1932, be wrought of either (i) the standard of 585 parts of fine gold in every one thousand parts by weight (called the standard of 14 carats) or (ii) the standard of 375 parts of fine gold in every one thousand parts by weight (called the standard of 9 carats). The order specifies the marks by which gold wares of these two standards shall be marked, which I will call respectively the 14 and the 9 carat marks. Therefore, to-day there are four statutory standards for industrial gold alloys in force in England which authorised assay offices will mark with appropriate hall-marks when fashioned into wares, namely: (1) the 22 carat standard created by the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738; (2) the 18 carat standard created by the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798; (3) the 14 carat standard; and (4) the 9 carat standard, these last two being created by the Gold Wares (Standard of Fineness) Order, 1932, made under and by virtue of the Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1854.

In so far as the plaintiff's claim alleges that the wedding rings were less in fineness than a standard permitted by law, the allegation is to be found in para. 10 of the statement of claim where the words used are "less in fineness than nine carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy." In using these words the pleader (who was not the junior counsel who appeared for the plaintiff at the trial) seems to have overlooked the revocation of the order of 1854 and to have added to his allegation that the rings were less in fineness than the 9 carat standard the words "in every pound weight troy," which do not appear in the order of 1932, but which do appear in the Act of 1738, the Act of 1798, and the order of 1854. It was in this context that, as I have said, Dr. Watson and the plaintiff confessed they did not understand the word "carat." In view of their evidence counsel for the plaintiff candidly admitted that he felt a difficulty in proving the allegation as pleaded, and, ultimately he withdrew the claim for penalties in so far as it was based on the allegation that the rings were not of one of the permitted standards of fineness. In these circumstances I need not consider further this part of the case, and I pass from it with the comment that in view of the evidence of Dr. Watson and the plaintiff it seems possible that between 1854 and 1932 there has been a change in the methods used and the terminology employed by those who carry on the profession of assayers of gold, which has been reflected in the order of 1932 and, for the sake of uniformity and simplicity, the language used to describe the standards of 22 and 18 carat might well be amended.

The other allegation in connection with the rings which is made in the statement of claim is that they were not marked with one of the marks by law required to denote one of the standards of fine gold, and on this ground the plaintiff claims in respect of each ring so found not to have been marked the penalty of £50 imposed by s. 6 of the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798. This claim involves consideration of the question whether the four statutory standards for industrial gold alloys to which I have already referred and the complementary statutory requirements that wares made in accordance with such standards should be appropriately marked have been made to apply to wedding rings. By s. 6 of the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, rings (including wedding rings) were excepted from the provisions of s. 5 of that Act, and this excepting of wedding rings from the necessity of being marked was not altered by the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798. Thus, at the end of the eighteenth century, although, like other gold wares, wedding rings had to be of either the 22 or the 18 carat standard, unlike other gold wares of those standards, wedding rings of those standards could lawfully be offered for sale although unmarked. When the Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1854, permitted the lowering by Orders in Council of the permitted standards for the making of gold wares, it applied the existing law to gold wares which might be made of the newly permitted standards, but it left untouched the existing exemption of wedding rings from being marked. That this was so is made clear beyond doubt by the preamble to an Act passed in the following year called the Wedding Rings Act, 1855. From this preamble it appears that, although, according to the existing law, wedding rings were not liable to be assayed and marked, nevertheless in practice gold wedding rings had been assayed and marked, and it was, therefore, expedient that such rings should be made liable to the provisions of the statutes then in force relating to the assaying and marking of gold plate. The Act then proceeded by s. 1 to do what was said to be expedient and removed gold wedding rings from the exception which had been created by and maintained since the passing of s. 6 of the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738. A

Counsel for the defendant, reading the Wedding Rings Act, 1855, from the nineteenth volume of THE COMPLETE STATUTES OF ENGLAND (1st ed., 1930) argued that that Act had exempted gold wedding rings from the operation of the Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1854, because the Act of 1855 is entitled (inter alia) B

“an Act for excepting gold wedding rings from the operation of the Act of the last Session relating to the standard of gold and silver wares . . .”

He submitted that in these circumstances the state of the law to-day is that it is not lawful to make gold wedding rings below the 18 carat standard, and that, therefore, any gold wedding rings below that standard cannot come within the statutory provisions relating to the marking of gold plate. This argument, which, if successful, would cause consternation to many donors and recipients of the gold nuptial emblem, is, in my judgment, without foundation. Counsel overlooked the fact, I think, that the COMPLETE STATUTES OF ENGLAND are in a sense incomplete. The volumes published under this title do not reproduce sections which have been repealed. In the case of the Wedding Rings Act, 1855, only the first section is printed in the volume to which I have referred. Reference to the Act in the STATUTES AT LARGE shows that the only part of the Act of 1854 from which gold wedding rings were excepted by the Act of 1855 was s. 3 of the Act of 1854 relating to the duty levied on gold plate with which subject this case is not concerned. The thus immaterial exception was effected by s. 2 of the Act of 1855, which in its turn was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1875. I, therefore, reject counsel's submission, and I hold that, as a result of the various statutes and Orders in Council to which I have referred, gold wedding rings are now in no different position from other gold plate or manufacture of gold; that they may lawfully be made of any of the four standards permitted by law (namely, the standards of 22, 18, 14 and 9 carats); and that, if so made, they must not be offered for sale unless appropriately marked as provided respectively by the relevant statute or order. In my judgment, there can be no real doubt about this, but, if authority is needed, I think that what I have decided is consistent with the charge to the jury which was given by MANISTY, J., in Buckley v. Alexander (1) tried at Birmingham Assizes on Mar. 26 and 27, 1889, the report of which in the BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST has been made available for me by the courtesy of the proprietors of that newspaper. C D E F G

The result of my findings, therefore, is as follows. The defendant offered for sale twenty-seven rings. Of those rings twenty-one were below the 9 carat standard. In respect of those twenty-one rings no offence against any statute with which this case is concerned was committed by reason of their having been offered for sale unmarked. They were legally mere base metal. Of the remaining six rings one was above the standard of 18 carat, but below the 22 carat standard, and ought not to have been offered for sale unless marked accordingly in compliance with the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798; one was of the 14 carat standard and four were above the 9 carat standard but below the 14 carat standard, and these five ought not to have been offered for sale unless marked accordingly in compliance with the Gold Wares (Standard of Fineness) Order, 1932, made by virtue of the Gold and Silver Wares Act, 1854. None of these H six rings bore any hall-mark, and, therefore, in respect of each of them the plaintiff has established his claim to recover the penalty of £50 imposed by s. 6 of the Gold Plate (Standard) Act, 1798. I have already mentioned the circumstances in which the plaintiff withdrew his claim for penalties based on the standard of fineness of the rings, and it follows that the sum to which the plaintiff is entitled in respect of the rings is the sum of £300.

A I now turn to consider the claims which the plaintiff makes in respect of the silver cigarette case. According to the provisions of s. 1 of the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, it is an offence to expose to sale any silver plate or manufacture, made after May 28, 1739, if it is less in fineness than eleven ounces, two penny weight of fine silver in every pound weight troy. Dr. Watson, who did not experience the difficulty with regard to the language used to denote the standard of fineness of silver wares which he experienced in the case of gold wares, said that this
B statutory standard was equivalent to a standard represented by 925 parts of fine silver in one thousand parts alloy. He found that the silver cigarette case exposed to sale by the defendant contained only 856 parts of fine silver in one thousand parts alloy. It was, therefore, below the statutory standard, and, having offered it to sale, the defendant becomes liable to forfeit £10, the penalty fixed
C by s. 1 of the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738. The plaintiff also claims in respect of the cigarette case a further sum of £10 as the penalty which he says is due under s. 5 of the same Act, because the defendant exposed the article to sale when it did not bear the mark prescribed by that section. In my judgment, this claim is misconceived. The silver wares which by s. 5 are required to be marked before
D being exposed to sale are silver wares which comply with the standard laid down by s. 1. This cigarette case did not comply with that standard, and in these circumstances s. 5 does not apply to it because s. 5 applies only in terms to silver wares "being of the standard of eleven ounces, two penny-weight of fine silver pound troy." The plaintiff's claim for £10 under s. 5, therefore, must fail.

Finally the plaintiff claims the forfeiture of the cigarette case itself or its value on the ground that it was offered for sale by the defendant without having been assayed and marked as required by law. The plaintiff bases this claim upon s. 8
E of an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1696 entitled

"An Act for Encouraging the bringing in wrought plate to be coined," as amended by s. 3 of the Plate Duty Act, 1719. I have considered these two sections, and, in my judgment, they differ from s. 5 of the Plate (Offences) Act, 1738, in this respect. Whereas that section only required to be marked

F before being exposed to sale plate which was in accordance with the standards of gold and silver wares permitted by that Act, the two sections which I am now considering required all silver plate to be marked before being offered for sale, whether it was of the standards permitted by those sections or not. In these circumstances, the cigarette case in question having been offered for sale unmarked, the plaintiff has established his claim to its forfeiture. No argument
G was addressed to me on this part of the case and no evidence was given as to the value of the cigarette case, and, accordingly, I order that that article itself be forfeited to the plaintiff. In addition, and for the reasons which I have given, there must be judgment in favour of the plaintiff for £310.

Judgment for the plaintiff for £310 and the forfeiture of the cigarette case, with costs.

Ecclesiastical Law—Ornaments—Candlesticks—Legality of six candlesticks on the Holy Table or retable.

On the east wall of a church, which was built in 1874, was a reredos of mosaic work, having as its central figure a representation of Our Lord on the cross. Immediately in front of the reredos was a retable on which were a small cross, standing on a pedestal, in the centre and six candlesticks, three on each side of the cross. The candlesticks were in that position from 1886 until June 6, 1945, when the church was partly destroyed by fire, and the reredos, cross and candlesticks were damaged beyond repair. In January, 1950, the incumbent and churchwardens lodged a petition for a faculty to authorise, inter alia, a crucifix and six candlesticks on the retable. The petition was supported by the parochial church council, and the designs of the candlesticks had been approved by the diocesan advisory committee. The chancellor granted a faculty authorising the introduction of all the articles prayed for, except four of the six candlesticks. On appeal, HELD: (i) although the use of two altar lights must be regarded as the traditional and recognised use in the Church of England, the use of more than two lights on or behind the Holy Table was not necessarily illegal, and it was within the discretion of a diocesan chancellor, in a proper case, to allow more than two lights, though this discretion ought to be exercised with great care.

(ii) in the present case, six candlesticks had been used on the retable for sixty years and it was merely sought to replace them; on the evidence there was no danger of a ceremonial use being made of them; and in those and the other circumstances of the case they would be allowed.

APPEAL by the Reverend C. W. Nye, the incumbent, and Mr. W. H. Phillips and Mr. F. J. Darby, the churchwardens, of St. Saviour's Church, Walthamstow, from a decision of Chelmsford Consistory Court, dated May 9, 1950, that not more than two candlesticks might lawfully be on the Holy Table, and that the use of six candlesticks, either on the Holy Table or on a retable, was unlawful.

The appeal was unopposed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 22. SIR PHILIP WILBRAHAM BAKER-WILBRAHAM, read the following judgment. This is an appeal from a judgment of the Chancellor of Chelmsford (LINTON THORP, K.C.) deciding the legality of placing more than two candlesticks on or behind the Holy Table.

St. Saviour's Church, Walthamstow was consecrated in 1874. At the east end was a reredos of mosaic work, having as its central figure a representation of Our Lord on the cross. Immediately in front of the reredos was a retable, on which were a small cross standing on a central pedestal and six brass candlesticks, three on either side of the cross. The candlesticks were in that position from the year 1886 onwards. In 1945 there occurred a fire, which rendered most of the church unfit for use. The reredos, cross and candlesticks were damaged beyond repair. After the fire the vicar and his parishioners set to work to restore the church, as nearly as might be, to its original condition. In January, 1950, the vicar and churchwardens lodged a petition for a comprehensive faculty to authorise (a) an altar table, (b) a crucifix and six candlesticks, (c) a communion rail, (d) a sedilia, (e) clergy and choir stalls, and (f) a pulpit. The petition was supported by the parochial church council with one objector (whose objection was, I understand, only to the cost of the scheme) and all the work proposed was approved by the diocesan advisory committee.

The petition was heard by the learned chancellor on Mar. 28, 1950, and he gave judgment on May 9, authorising the introduction of all the articles prayed for except four of the six candlesticks. He allowed the crucifix on the ground that the mosaic representing the crucifixion had been damaged beyond repair, and that the crucifix would “represent so far as possible today some continuity in the appearance of the church.”

He did not feel able to apply the same principle to the six candlesticks. After a review of the authorities he felt compelled to hold that the use of more than two lights on the Holy Table or on a retable is unlawful, and that, accordingly, a faculty to place six candlesticks on the retable must be refused.

On the hearing of the appeal it was argued that unless the candlesticks were used ceremonially they were merely articles of church furniture like flower vases or banners, and that it was the use to which an ornament was put which rendered it lawful or unlawful.

Before I come to the authorities, there are two matters to which I ought to draw attention. First, in the course of his judgment the learned chancellor referred to the presence in this church of certain other articles, including two statues of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and pictures representing the stations of the cross, in respect of which no faculty could then be produced. He pointed out that reservation of the sacrament was practised in the side chapel, that a sanctus bell was used at the time of the consecration, and that on Fridays in Lent a short service with an address was held at each of the fourteen stations of the cross. He was careful to make it clear that he did not express directly, or by implication, either approval or disapproval of these ornaments or the use thereof. Those issues were not before the court. Nevertheless, he conceded that the evidence as to the stations of the cross, the sanctus bell, the statues of the Virgin Mary, and the services on Fridays in Lent had led him to apprehend with some anxiety the possibility of a ceremonial use being made of the candlesticks.

Since the hearing in the court below, three faculties have been discovered and produced, viz. (a) a faculty granted in 1926 for the renovation of the side chapel, which included the placing of an aumbry in the south wall thereof: this was said to be “for the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament for the sick”; (b) a faculty granted in 1934 to beautify the side chapel which was then referred to as the Lady Chapel—by erecting oak screens and otherwise; (c) a faculty granted in 1940 authorising the erection of a small statue of the Madonna and Child in the Lady Chapel. Although these faculties do not cover all the matters mentioned in the learned chancellor's judgment, they do, at any rate, show that some attention has been paid to legal requirements. Secondly, on the hearing of the appeal new evidence was produced in the shape of an affidavit by the Rev. Harold Riley, secretary of the Church Union, who had, in view of the conflicting decisions, been collecting as complete information as possible as to the number of parish churches in the province of Canterbury which, in fact, have more than two candles on or behind their principal Holy Tables. For this purpose he had sent a questionnaire to a priest in every rural deanery in the province. The replies from the diocese of Chelmsford covered twenty-seven of the twenty-nine rural deaneries in that diocese. They dealt with 287 parish churches, and stated that in eighty-eight of those churches there were more than two candles on or behind the principal Holy Table. Taking the province of Canterbury as a whole, replies had been received concerning 3,913 churches, and of these 1,013 were stated to have more than two candles on or behind the principal Holy Table. The value of evidence of this kind is doubtless open to question, since a practice is not necessarily legal because it is widespread. Nevertheless, I do not think that this evidence can be completely disregarded.

Coming now to the authorities, I think I need not deal in detail with the earlier ritual cases of the nineteenth century, since they were concerned, not so much with the number of altar lights permissible (although I think it may be assumed that the number referred to was generally two), as with the legality of having any altar lights at all. Before Read v. Lincoln (Bp.) (1) it seems to have been established as settled law that the mere use of lighted candles on the Holy Table, when not needed for the purpose of giving light, was unlawful. Since Read v. Lincoln (Bp.) (1) the whole situation has been altered, not so much by the actual decision in that case (which in itself was hardly conclusive) as by the extremely full and learned judgment of the Archbishop of Canterbury (ARCH-BISHOP BENSON) ([1891] P. 19), and the judgment of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in the Privy Council ([1892] A.C. 652), advising that the appeal should be dismissed. Since that time it has become the common practice to allow two lighted candles on or behind the Holy Table, provided that they are not used ceremonially, and the mere fact that they are kept lighted during the service of Holy Communion is not regarded as a ceremonial use.

The question of the number of lights allowable is a different one, on which the authorities are not conclusive. In St. Andrew's, Haverstock-Hill (2) the Chancellor of London, in 1909, dismissed a petition for the removal of four out of six candlesticks which had been placed in the church without a faculty and granted a confirmatory faculty for the use of all six. This was a strong decision, but the reasons which led DR. TRISTRAM, K.C., to make it are not obvious from his judgment as reported. More important is Capel St. Mary, Suffolk (Rector and Churchwardens) v. Packard (3) which was decided in this court by my predecessor, SIR LEWIS DIBDIN. There a faculty was issued for the removal of four out of six candlesticks on a retable. It was argued before me that the point was not really decided since counsel for the appellants did not press for the retention of all six, and the case, therefore, went by default. The reasons why this line was taken are not clearly apparent, and St. Andrew's, Haverstock-Hill (2) does not seem to have been referred to. It is clear, however, that in the Capel St. Mary case (3) there had been much ceremonial use of lighted candles which could not be justified. I am unable to treat this case as a clear decision that the use of six candles is necessarily illegal in all cases.

The Capel St. Mary case (3) was followed in 1932 by Re St. Saviour's, Hampstead (4), in which the vicar of the parish had introduced without faculty six candlesticks on a retable behind the Holy Table. The Chancellor of London (F. H. L. ERRINGTON) confirmed the placing of two candlesticks on the retable, and added ([1932] P. 141):

"... I will not require the removal of the other four from the church provided I have a satisfactory undertaking by Mr. Luxmoore-Ball [the incumbent], as to their use."

Whether any such undertaking was given, and, if so, what was its nature, I do not know. Finally, in Re Holy Trinity, Woolwich (5), the Chancellor of Southwark (E. GARTH MOORE) granted a faculty for six candlesticks, in place of two which were to be removed, subject to the direction that, until further order, not more than two of the lights should be on the altar at the same time. He added ([1949] P. 373):

- A "The petitioners should in due time approach the bishop and discuss the number with him. I am prepared to leave the decision as to the number of lights at any given moment to the directions of the Ordinary."

In coming to this decision the Chancellor of Southwark felt himself free to express his own view in the light of modern scholastic research. He was not bound by Re St. Saviour's, Hampstead (4), which was decided in another diocese, and he

- B did not feel himself bound by the Capel St. Mary case (3), because there no argument had been put forward in favour of retaining six candles.

In the present case, the learned chancellor in the court below found it impossible to reconcile the decision of CHANCELLOR ERRINGTON in Re St. Saviour's, Hampstead (4) with that of CHANCELLOR GARTH MOORE in Re Holy Trinity, Woolwich (5). I am not sure that the gulf between these two decisions is quite

- C as wide as he supposed, but certainly there is a discrepancy.

The question which I have to decide is simply one of legality, and, unfortunately, I have not had the advantage of hearing argument on both sides of the question. After careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that, although the use of two altar lights must be regarded as the traditional and recognised use in the Church of England, I cannot hold that the use of more than two is necessarily illegal. The two lights are there according to the injunctions of Edward VI

"... for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world..."

I have not been able to discover that the use of more than two lights on or behind the Holy Table has any other significance. They are lit on the more important occasions to give greater dignity to the service. On this point I questioned the vicar. He had been incumbent of St. Saviour's, Walthamstow, from December, 1942. Six candlesticks were then on a retable behind the altar, and remained so until the fire in 1945. They were used at the sung eucharist, being lit before and extinguished after the service. They were also used at choral evensong, but then they were extinguished after the third collect. If six new candlesticks were now authorised, they would be used in exactly the same way. He attached no special significance to six lights (instead of two) except that they emphasised the more important services, and gave an additional dignity to them. I cannot think, therefore, that there is any danger of misuse of the six candlesticks in the present case. That being so, I think they ought to be allowed. For the circumstances of the case are special. Six candlesticks have been used in this church, if not from the time of its consecration, at any rate from 1886 until the fire in 1945, a period of nearly sixty years. Had it been possible to save the old six candlesticks from the fire, they would doubtless have been replaced without question. I cannot see that the fact that these are new and different candlesticks makes any great difference. For all practical purposes the result is mere replacement. The petition is unopposed. It has the support of the parochial church council, and the designs have been approved by the diocesan advisory committee. In these circumstances I think the faculty should be amended so as to include all six candlesticks.

- F

- G

I should be sorry if this decision were construed as encouraging the use of more than two lights on or behind the Holy Table. As I have already indicated, I think the use of two lights is the recognised use in English churches, and it seems to date back to very early days. All that my decision involves is that it is within the discretion of a diocesan chancellor, in any proper case, to allow more than two, but this is a discretion which ought to be exercised with great care. As LORD PENZANCE said in Peek v. Trower (6) (7 P.D. 27):

- H

"All presumption is to be made in favour of things as they stand."

This is especially so where there is opposition, or any evidence of dissatisfaction. If I may borrow the words of ARCHBISHOP BENSON in Read v. Lincoln (Bp.) (1) ([1891] P. 88):

"... where that is the case, even in a small degree, charity and good sense ought not to be violated."

Faculty amended so as to include six candlesticks.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Humphreys, Morris and Sellers, JJ.), August 22, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Vagrancy—"Known character"—Evidence—Previous conviction—Accused discharged conditionally on previous conviction—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (c. 83), s. 4—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (c. 112), s. 15—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 12 (1).

When arrested for an offence under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, as amended by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, s. 15, and the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 7, on the ground that, being a suspected person, he was loitering with intent to commit a felony, the appellant was found to be in possession of an imitation firearm and was charged on indictment with an offence under the Firearms Act, 1937, s. 23 (2). At the magistrate's court a detective constable gave evidence that on Dec. 21, 1949, he was present in court when the appellant was conditionally discharged for twelve months, and that a certificate of conviction, which was exhibited, related to the appellant on that occasion. The certificate stated that on Dec. 13, 1949, the appellant was convicted on his own confession of having been found in possession of housebreaking implements. At the trial the certificate was put in as evidence after the detective constable's deposition had been read. It was contended by the appellant that, under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 12 (1), evidence of the previous conviction was inadmissible.

HELD: under s. 12 (1) of the Act of 1948 the conviction of Dec. 13, 1949, was not to be regarded for the purpose of another case as a conviction, and, therefore, the certificate of conviction should not have been accepted in evidence, but evidence would have been admissible by a witness who had heard the appellant confess in court to the charge of having been found in possession of housebreaking implements or had heard him convicted of that offence and conditionally discharged.

APPEAL against conviction.

A The appellant was convicted at the County of London Sessions on an indictment charging him with an offence under the Firearms Act, 1937, s. 23 (2), in that he was in possession of an imitation firearm when arrested for an offence under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, as amended by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, s. 15, and the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 7. The deposition of a witness stating that he was in court on a previous occasion when the appellant was conditionally discharged was read at the trial and the certificate relating to that conviction was put in as evidence. The appellant contended inter alia that, under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 12 (1), that evidence was inadmissible. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by B HUMPHREYS, J.

Craymer for the appellant.

Durand for the Crown.

C HUMPHREYS, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was charged on an indictment with a composite offence which is created by the Firearms Act, 1937, s. 23 (2), a sub-section which provides an additional penalty where a person, who has committed an offence under inter alia such of the provisions of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, as are referred to in, and amended by, the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, s. 15, and the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 7, is found, when arrested for that offence, to be in possession of a firearm or imitation firearm, unless he shows that he had it in his possession for a lawful object. There is no question that the appellant was found in possession of an imitation firearm when he was arrested on a charge, under s. 4 of the Act of 1824 (as amended), that he, being a suspected person, was loitering with intent to commit a felony. At quarter sessions the deposition of a detective constable, who had been bound over conditionally to attend the trial, was read. The evidence which he had given at the police court was as follows:

E "On Dec. 21, 1949, I was present at the County of London Sessions when Harris was conditionally discharged for twelve months. I produce the certificate of conviction. The defendant Harris in this case is the man to whom the certificate relates."

F The document was then put in. It showed that on Dec. 13, 1949, the appellant was in due form of law on his own confession convicted on an indictment against him for that he, in November, 1949, was found having in his possession, without lawful excuse, certain implements of housebreaking. The appellant was convicted by the jury and sentenced, and the first point which is taken on this appeal is that the Criminal Justice Act, 194 , s. 12, prohibited any reference to that previous conviction.

G Section 12 (1) provides:

H "Subject as hereinafter provided, a conviction of an offence for which an order is made under this Part of this Act placing the offender on probation or discharging him absolutely or conditionally shall be deemed not to be a conviction for any purpose other than the purposes of the proceedings in which the order is made and of any subsequent proceedings which may be taken against the offender under the foregoing provisions of this Act . . ."

The effect of the sub-section is that, if the offender commits a further offence during the next twelve months, he may be brought up and sent to prison, or otherwise dealt with, for the earlier offence, but the conviction shall be deemed not to be a conviction for any other purpose. In the opinion of the court, the intention of the legislature was to provide that this method of dealing with persons who have been convicted, viz., either putting them on probation, discharging them absolutely, or ordering that they be conditionally discharged, should not have the effect of a previous conviction for the purpose of other Acts which render a person, who is convicted of an offence under one of them, subject to certain disabilities if he has already been convicted of an offence. The matter is, I think, very well put in MORRISON AND HUGHES ON THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948, p. 35, where, in a note to s. 12, it is said:

“ The section absolves the offender from legal consequences which otherwise would flow from a conviction.”

That is exactly what it does do.

In the present case the offence was under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4, which was amended by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, s. 15 (headed “ Amendment of criminal law in certain cases ”). Section 15 of the Act of 1871 provides that:

“ . . . in proving the intent to commit a felony it shall not be necessary to show that the person suspected was guilty of any particular act or acts tending to show his purpose or intent, and he may be convicted if from the circumstances of the case, and from his known character as proved to the justice of the peace or court before whom or which he is brought, it appears to such justice or court that his intent was to commit a felony . . . ”

That section obviously renders admissible in such a case that which would otherwise, according to the common law of England, be inadmissible, viz., evidence of the previous bad character of the accused person although he has not himself put his character in issue. No possible objection, in our view, could have been taken to the procedure adopted in this case if the detective constable, whose deposition I have read, had been present at the trial and had given evidence to the following effect: “ I was present at the court on the day named when the accused was there. I heard him confess to a charge of having been found in possession of certain implements of housebreaking, and he was then discharged subject to the condition that he commit no offence during the period of twelve months thereafter.” That would have been, not merely proof of a previous conviction, but proof of the appellant’s “ known character ” in that he was a person who had admitted in a court of justice that he had committed a certain offence. What was done was merely to produce a document which purported to be a record of a conviction in regard to the appellant, and no other evidence was given in regard to the matter. In any future case we think that courts—whether courts of summary jurisdiction or courts trying a case on indictment with a jury—should be careful to see that evidence is given, not that the accused has been previously convicted, because the conviction itself is not to be regarded for the purpose of any other case as a conviction, but that he was seen doing this, that, or the other, which showed that he is a person of bad character. Among the matters which could be proved would be the fact that on a particular day he admitted that he was, or was found by a jury to be, a person who had committed a criminal offence.

[HIS LORDSHIP added that the learned deputy chairman, in telling the jury that they were entitled to consider the appellant’s “ known character as proved ” under s. 15 of the Act of 1871, said that the appellant had been bound over previously for being a suspected person loitering with intent to commit a felony, and there was no evidence of that before the jury, although there was no question about it being accurate. To tell the jury that the appellant had been convicted of an offence when there was no evidence before them that he had was such a serious matter that it was impossible to uphold the conviction.]

Conviction quashed.

Food and Drugs—Samples—Delivery of sample to consignor—Consignor's name, but no address, appearing on container—Consignor's address known to sampling officer—Validity—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 70 (2).

A Seven churns of milk were sent by a farmer to the place of delivery under a contract of sale. Six of the churns bore a label with his name only, but the seventh bore a label with his name and address. A sampling officer took samples from all seven churns, divided each sample into three parts, and sent one part in each case to the farmer. The results of the analysis showed that each of the samples analysed contained added water. On the question whether, under s. 70 (2) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, in six of the seven cases the sampling officer should have retained the parts of the samples delivered to the farmer, since in those cases the farmer's address did not appear on the containers,

C HELD: the requirement in s. 70 (2) that the sampling officer should retain the part of the sample to be sent to the consignor unless the consignor's name and address appeared on the container containing the article sampled did not preclude the sampling officer from sending the sample to the consignor in cases where the consignor's name and address were known, although the address did not appear on the container, and, therefore, the sampling had been carried out in accordance with the terms of s. 70 (2).

CASE STATED by Norfolk justices.

E At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Beccles seven informations were preferred by the appellant, a sampling officer of the East Suffolk County Council, under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 24 (1) (c), charging the respondent, a farmer, with having unlawfully sold milk to which an addition of water had been made. At the hearing before the justices on May 12, 1950, it was found that the respondent delivered seven churns of milk to the dairy of the Beccles Working Men's Co-operative Association under a contract between himself and the Milk Marketing Board. One label bearing only the respondent's name was attached to each of six of the churns, and a label bearing his name and address was affixed to the seventh. The appellant took samples from each of the churns on its arrival at the dairy, divided each sample into three parts, and sent one part in each case to the respondent, submitting another part to the public analyst, and retaining the third part. It was contended for the respondent that the part of the sample sent to him should, in the six cases, have been retained by the sampling officer in accordance with s. 70 (2) of the Act of 1938, because the respondent's address did not appear on the labels attached to the churns. The justices convicted the respondent on the information relating to the seventh churn, but dismissed the informations in respect of the other six on the ground that s. 70 (2) of the Act of 1938 required both the name and the address of the consignor to appear on the container if the first part of the sample was not to be retained by the sampling officer.

H Boreham for the appellant.
The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Suffolk raising yet another question under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, with regard to sampling. The respondent, a farmer, sent to a depot, which was the place of delivery of his milk, seven churns, six of which bore a label with his name only while the seventh bore his name and the name of the village in which he lived. The sampling officer, knowing who the respondent was and, I suppose, having no doubt where the milk came from, having taken samples from each of the churns, sent a one-third part of each of the samples to the respondent, a fair thing to do if he was going to bring charges against the respondent that the analysis showed added water, as it did. At the hearing of seven informations against the respondent charging him with unlawfully selling to the Milk Marketing Board milk to which water had been added, objection was taken by the respondent that the sampling had been improperly done, because the sampling officer should not have sent to the respondent samples from the six churns the labels on which did not bear the respondent's address. The respondent was convicted on the information in regard to the seventh sample, i.e., from the churn which bore a label with his address on it, but not on the informations in regard to the other six samples.

The Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 70 (2), provides:

"A person taking a sample of any food while it is in transit or at the place of delivery to the purchaser, consignee or consumer shall, if he intends to submit it to be analysed by a public analyst, deal with it in the manner provided by the preceding sub-section, except that he shall retain the first-mentioned part of the sample unless the name and address of the consignor appear on the container containing the article sampled, in which case he shall forward that part of the sample to the consignor by registered post or otherwise, together with a notice informing that person that he intends to have part of the sample analysed by the public analyst."

That seems to me to be merely a provision that, if the sampling officer takes a sample of milk and there is no indication where the milk comes from, he may retain not only the part of the sample which he ordinarily keeps himself and produces in court, but also the part which he would otherwise send to the consignor. If the consignor's address is not on the container, he may not know to whom to send the sample. I do not think that s. 70 (2) means that, if the sampling officer knows who the consignor is, he does anything wrong by sending the sample to him, or that the sampling is thereby invalidated. In my opinion, that would be an absurd result.

I can see the difficulty which the justices felt. They felt difficulty over the word "shall" in s. 70 (2), but it seems to me clear that the sampling officer can retain for as long as he likes the part of the sample which is intended for the consignor, and then, when he knows who the consignor is, he can send it to him. In this case, the sampling officer took the sample and retained it in his possession until he caused it to be delivered to the respondent, and, although he might not have been under an obligation to deliver it as the respondent's address was not on the label on the churn, the fact that he did deliver it does not, in my opinion, invalidate the sample. Therefore, the case must go back to the justices with an intimation that the sampling was carried out in accordance with the statute and they must hear the rest of the case.

BYRNE, J.: I agree. It appears to me that the sampling officer did something which he was not obliged to do, but it was not something which he was not permitted to do.

ORMEROD, J.: I agree.

MIDLAND COUNTIES MOTOR FINANCE CO., LTD. v. SLADE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Cohen and Denning, L.J.J.), October 4, 1950.]

Guarantee—Hire-purchase agreement—Indemnity against loss sustained through breach by hirer—Term that guarantor should be informed if payment of instalment more than thirty days overdue—Agreement to give time to hirer—When payment “overdue.”

A A motor-car dealer, having found a purchaser who wished to acquire a car on hire-purchase terms, sold the car to a finance company who entered into a hire-purchase agreement with the purchaser. The agreement provided for the payment of a deposit and twelve monthly instalments falling due on the last day of every month. As part of the transaction the dealer entered into a contract of guarantee with the finance company for the due performance of the hire-purchase agreement. It was a term of the guarantee that it should not be avoided, released or affected by the company giving time to the purchaser, but this term was qualified by two provisos, under the second of which the finance company undertook to inform the guarantor when any payment or instalments should be more than thirty days overdue. The customer failed to pay the instalment due on Oct. 31, and on Nov. 17 the finance company, in consideration of the payment of the additional sum of £1 15s., agreed to give the customer until Nov. 30 to pay the instalment due on Oct. 31. The instalment was not paid on Nov. 30 or at all, and on Dec. 28 the finance company informed the guarantor and called on him to fulfil his guarantee. The guarantor disclaimed liability on the ground that he had not been informed when the instalment was thirty days overdue.

D HELD: the instalment was thirty days overdue on Nov. 30, which was thirty days after the due date of payment fixed by the original agreement, and not thirty days after the date fixed by the agreement to give time, and, therefore, as the guarantor had not been informed of that fact within a reasonable time after Nov. 30, he was released from liability under the guarantee.

E Per DENNING, L.J.: Between Nov. 17 and 30 the debt was debitum in praesenti solvendum in futuro.

G APPEAL by the defendant from a decision of HILBERY, J., dated Apr. 18, 1950, whereby he held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover under the contract of guarantee since, under the agreement of Nov. 17 by which they gave time to the principal debtor, the instalment in question was not due until Nov. 30, and, therefore, not overdue until thirty days thereafter. The facts appear fully in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

G. N. Black for the defendant.

Drabble for the plaintiffs.

H SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the defendant from a decision of HILBERY, J. The plaintiffs, who are a company who finance hire-purchase transactions, sued the defendant on a contract of guarantee, and the learned judge held that they were entitled to recover.

The defendant, the guarantor, was a dealer in motor-cars. A Mr. Hughes was anxious to purchase a motor-car from the defendant, and desired to obtain the car under a hire-purchase agreement. This agreement, which was between Mr.

Hughes and the plaintiffs, was dated July 31, 1948, and provided for the payment of a sum down and twelve instalments of £21 12s., the first of which became due on Aug. 31 and the succeeding instalments on the last days of the succeeding months. Contemporaneously with that agreement the defendant entered into the agreement of guarantee with the plaintiffs. Under the latter agreement the defendant guaranteed

“ the due and punctual fulfilment and performance by the said William John Hughes of the whole of the terms and provisions of the said agreement and to indemnify the company [the plaintiffs] against any loss damage or expenses they may sustain through any breach thereof by the hirer by my [the defendant's] taking over the said motor vehicle and paying to the company therefor the amount outstanding on their books in respect thereof or otherwise at the option of the company And I [the defendant] agree that this guarantee shall not in anywise be avoided released or affected by reason of any breach or breaches (wilful or otherwise) of the said agreement committed (with or without my knowledge or consent) by the company nor by the company giving time to the hirer or granting him any other indulgence or by the company or the hirer making any variation in the said agreement Provided that no such variation shall make me liable for a greater maximum sum under this guarantee than that for which I am liable as the said agreement now stands Also provided that the company shall inform me when any payment or instalments shall be more than thirty days overdue. Property in the vehicle not to pass from the company until paid for in full.”

The first two instalments were paid. The third instalment, due on Oct. 31, was not paid on that date and was never paid. On Nov. 17 there was an agreement between the plaintiffs and the hire-purchaser extending the time for payment for one month in consideration of Mr. Hughes paying a sum of £1 15s. The parties construed the extension of one month as meaning that Mr. Hughes had till Nov. 30 to pay the instalment due on Oct. 31, not that he had till Dec. 17. Mr. Hughes did not pay on Nov. 30, and on Dec. 13 the plaintiffs wrote expressing surprise that they had not received the money. On Dec. 20 Mr. Hughes wrote back regretting that he had not paid and saying that he could not manage to pay more than £6 a month, which he did not suppose would be satisfactory to the plaintiffs. On Dec. 28 the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant as follows:

“ We have received a communication from Mr. Hughes to the effect that he finds it impossible to meet his obligations to us under the agreement in respect of the above vehicle, and it would appear there is no alternative but for him to return it. We have informed Mr. Hughes that he must deliver the vehicle to your good self, in good condition and running order, and no doubt you will kindly advise us immediately the vehicle is in your possession. For your information, there is a total balance of £216 outstanding.”

That letter, of course, is based on the term of the guarantee under which the company have an option, if the hire-purchaser defaults, to get the guarantor to take over the motor vehicle and pay to the company the amount outstanding. Clearly the letter is based on the view that the amount outstanding means not such instalments as have at that date become due, but the total amount which is then due and the amounts which would have become due and payable, if the contract had continued in operation. On the view I take it is unnecessary to decide which construction is correct.

The defendant contends that the plaintiffs could not call on him to take over the motor-car under the provisions of the guarantee since the last words of the agreement of guarantee following “ Also provided ” were not complied with. It is argued that those words make it a condition of an extension of time that if a period exceeding thirty days elapses from the date when the instalment was originally due under the contract, the guarantor must be informed within a reasonable time. The defendant contends that the instalment due on Oct. 31 was thirty days overdue on Nov. 30; he was not informed of this until Dec. 28; and, therefore, the plaintiffs failed to perform this term of the contract and it followed that they could not rely on the agreement that the giving of time should not have its normal effect in law and the defendant was not liable under his guarantee. The whole question turns on the construction of the last words of the agreement of guarantee. The plaintiffs contend that the thirty days referred to in this proviso operate in the circumstances which arose here as from Nov. 30 when, under the agreement to give time, the October instalment became due, and, therefore, it was not overdue until thirty days from the time when, under the agreement as varied, it could have been paid. Counsel for the plaintiffs points out that, having regard to the agreement to give time, nothing was due and, therefore, a fortiori nothing overdue on Nov. 30. That is the view which commended itself to the learned judge. He thought that there was an inconsistency between the earlier provisions in the guarantee allowing the plaintiffs to give time without prejudice to their rights against the guarantor and the provision that they should give him notice as contended for by the defendant.

This is one of those cases in which parties have used words which are not easy to apply to the circumstances which have arisen. Counsel for the plaintiffs emphasises the word "overdue"—"when any payment or instalments shall be more than thirty days overdue." It cannot, he submits, be overdue when the parties have agreed that, although it became due in the past, it shall be as a right not claimable or due until a future date. I have come to a different conclusion from that of the learned judge. I think the clue to the construction of these words is to be found in the fact that they are a second proviso to the agreement that the giving of time did not avoid the guarantee. Omitting certain words, I will read the latter part of the agreement to bring out what seems to me to be the structure of it:

"... I [the defendant] agree that this guarantee shall not ... be ... affected ... by the company ... giving time to the hirer or granting him any other indulgence ... Provided that no such variation shall make me liable for a greater maximum sum under this guarantee than that for which I am liable as the said agreement now stands Also provided that the company shall inform me when any payment or instalments shall be more than thirty days overdue."

That provision, appearing as a second proviso, must be construed as either limiting or conditioning the agreement which has gone before as to giving time or other indulgences, and so on. It does not seem to me that real effect is given to its place in the agreement on the construction put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs. On that construction time could be given and extended without the knowledge of the defendant who would only know when thirty days elapsed without payment beyond the extended time. That is a construction which seems to me to be unnatural, having regard to the position of these words as a second proviso. On the other hand, the construction put forward by the defendant seems to me the natural construction, having regard to the place of the proviso in the agreement, and also I think it is what one would expect. It, in effect, provides that the plaintiffs can enlarge the time, but if they enlarge it for a period longer than thirty days beyond the original date in the original agreement, then they must inform the defendant. As pointed out by COHEN, L.J., in the course of the argument, one of the words used is "instalments"—payment by instalments. The word "instalments" is not actually used in the hire-purchase agreement, but it plainly refers to the August, September and monthly rentals, and I think that the August rental would be overdue for thirty days on Sept. 30 even though in the meantime an arrangement had been come to for the giving of time. As was said during the argument, it is not a matter which is susceptible of great elaboration. The arguments on both sides require serious consideration, but, for the reasons I have given, I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was wrong. That being so, I think it is plain that the claim cannot succeed. I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the second judgment."

DENNING, L.J.: It often happens that when a man gives a guarantee, he gains nothing out of it for himself. Not so here. This guarantee was given by a seller who was very much interested in seeing that the sale went through so as to obtain his own profit, but that does not affect the situation. The hire-purchase finance companies have gained great benefits from the courts holding that these documents operate according to the letter, and they must take them with the corresponding disadvantages. The plaintiffs bought the car and paid for it, and if they are now to make the seller liable, it is only on his guarantee of the performance by the hirer under the hire-purchase agreement, and they must take that guarantee subject to all the rules of law applicable to it.

The defendant guaranteed the due and punctual payment by the hirer of the instalments of £21 12s. a month, but subsequently the plaintiffs made a binding agreement to give time to the hirer. All we know about it is that the instalment due on Oct. 31 was unpaid, and there is an entry in the company's books on Nov. 18, 1948, whereby, in consideration of the sum of £1 15s. then paid by the hirer, they granted one month's extension. That is plain evidence of a binding agreement to give time, and prima facie the defendant was released by reason of it. How do the plaintiffs seek to avoid that result? They say there was an express term whereby they were allowed to give time and the guarantee was not to be avoided by it. I agree, but that was subject to a proviso. The proviso was that the plaintiffs should inform the defendant when any payment or instalment was more than thirty days overdue. Was this proviso fulfilled? In my judgment, this debt became due and payable on Oct. 31, 1948, and it was overdue from that date onwards. By the agreement of Nov. 17, 1948, the plaintiffs agreed that they would not exercise their remedies if the instalment was paid a month in arrear, but that did not affect the existence of the debt or the date when it became due. It was simply an agreement to give time. Its effect was that the debt remained due, but not enforceable. Between Nov. 17 and 30 it was debitum in praesenti solvendum in futuro. At the end of November, 1948, it was thirty days overdue, and in order to satisfy the proviso, the plaintiffs ought within a reasonable time thereafter to have told the defendant so, but they did not inform him for another twenty-eight days. The proviso, therefore, was not fulfilled and the plaintiffs have not performed the condition under which alone they could avoid the common law release. It seems to me that the proviso means that the plaintiffs must inform the defendant when any instalments under the original agreement, as originally made, are more than thirty days overdue, whereas the plaintiffs' argument involves that they need only give the information in respect of instalments under that agreement as varied by any subsequent agreement. The words are not clear enough to warrant such an unlikely intention. In my opinion, therefore, the condition contained in the proviso was not fulfilled and the plaintiffs cannot avoid the result of their binding agreement to give time. The surety is, therefore, released.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I confess that I have changed my mind more than once in the course of the argument, but I am now satisfied that the appeal should succeed. The observation of SCRUTTON, L.J., in McKenna v. City Life Assurance Co. (1) ([1919] 2 K.B. 496), seems to me to show that the expressions "due" and "overdue" are each capable of two meanings and that in a certain context money may be due before it becomes payable. That being so, we have to consider what "overdue" means in the last proviso to the agreement of guarantee. The proviso is intended to qualify the relaxation by the defendant of his rights and to afford him some protection. If we accept the contention of counsel for the defendant that an instalment of rent is overdue if it is not paid on the date originally fixed even though the creditor extends the time for payment, the proviso will ensure that no extension will be made for more than thirty days without the surety being aware of that fact, whereas, if we accept the construction of counsel for the plaintiffs, they can extend the time indefinitely without any communication with the defendant, who may well think that the instalments are being regularly paid. It is true that the defendant may not be able to establish any claim at law as a result of receiving the information that an instalment is overdue, but the receipt of the information may well enable him to prevent undue procrastination. I, therefore, prefer the construction of counsel for the defendant, which seems to me to give business efficacy to the document, to that of counsel for the plaintiffs, which, I think, would render the protection purported to be given by the second proviso practically illusory. I would add that, if I were still in doubt, the maxim that an instrument should be construed contra proferentem would lead me to the same conclusion. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

BARKER v. LEVINSON.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Ormerod, JJ.), October 4, 1950.]

Master and Servant—Liability of master—Criminal act of servant—Scope of employment—Rent collector employed by estate agent—Authorisation by master to determine suitability of tenant—Requirement of premium as condition of grant of tenancy, contrary to Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 2 (1).

The respondent, who managed a block of flats on behalf of the owners, authorised P., whom he employed as a rent collector, to let one of the flats to Mrs. S. if he was satisfied regarding her suitability as a tenant. P. required of Mrs. S. a premium of £100 as a condition of the grant of the tenancy, contrary to the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 2 (1). The respondent was charged with a breach of s. 2 (1), in that, by his agent P., he had required the premium, but there was no evidence that he authorised P. to negotiate the terms of the tenancy.

HELD: in requiring and accepting the premium P. was not acting within the general scope of his employment, the authority delegated to him by the respondent being limited to satisfying himself that Mrs. S. was a satisfactory tenant and then to letting the flat to her, and, therefore, the respondent was not liable for P.'s criminal act in breach of the absolute prohibition imposed by s. 2 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949.

CASE STATED by Middlesex justices.

The respondent was the agent of the owners of a block of flats and had authority to let the flats. In October, 1949, he authorised Harry Purkis, whom he employed as a rent collector, to let one of the flats to Mrs. Irene May Smith if he, Purkis, was satisfied that she would be a satisfactory tenant. Purkis required and received from Mrs. Smith a premium of £100 as a condition of granting to her the tenancy. On May 4, 1950, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Uxbridge, the respondent was charged on an information preferred by the appellant on behalf of the Ruislip-Northwood Urban District Council with requiring, through his agent, Purkis, a premium of Mrs. Smith as a condition of the grant of a tenancy, contrary to the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 2 (1). The justices held that it was not proved to their satisfaction that the respondent authorised Purkis to require the premium or that he knew that Purkis had required or accepted it, and they dismissed the information on the ground that the criminal act of Purkis was not within the scope of his authority from the respondent either expressly or by implication. The appellant appealed.

E. J. P. Cussen for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Middlesex, before whom the respondent, Benjamin Levinson, was summoned on an information which charged him with requiring a premium of £100 as a condition of the grant to one Mrs. Smith of the tenancy of certain premises at Pinner, contrary to the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 2. Section 2 (1) provides:

“A person shall not, as a condition of the grant, renewal or continuance of a tenancy to which this section applies, require the payment of any premium in addition to the rent.”

There is no doubt that that is an absolute prohibition against a person requiring any premium in addition to the rent. The justices found that the respondent was the agent of a company which owned a block of flats and that he had authority to undertake the care of and conduct the letting of the flats. He had in his employment, as a rent collector, one Purkis, and he authorised Purkis to let the premises in question, No. 10, Valley Close, to Mrs. Smith if Purkis was satisfied that she would make a satisfactory tenant. That is the extent of the authority which the justices find was given to Purkis. He had merely to satisfy himself that Mrs. Smith was a satisfactory tenant and he was then to let the premises to her, and there is no finding that he was authorised or entitled to negotiate the terms of the tenancy. The justices then found:

“As a condition of the grant to the said Mrs. Irene May Smith of the tenancy of No. 10, Valley Close, the said Harry Purkis required of and received from her a premium of £100. It was not proved to our satisfaction that the respondent authorised the said Harry Purkis to require or accept a premium or that the respondent knew that the said Harry Purkis had required or accepted a premium or that the respondent received the premium or any part thereof.”

It was contended that, as Purkis was the servant of the respondent, the respondent became liable for the criminal act which Purkis committed. So far as the findings in this case go, however, Purkis may have put the £100 in his pocket. He may have taken it as a bribe from Mrs. Smith, saying: “If you like to give me £100, I will tell my principal that you are a satisfactory tenant and let you in.” If the master were responsible in such a case, it would be a very serious matter, because it would mean that an estate agent who was managing property could never safely trust one of his servants to do any act with regard to letting the premises, but would have to do everything himself in case the servant should take a bribe from a prospective tenant.

The principle underlying the cases which deal with the criminal responsibility of a master for the act of his servant can be stated in this way. The master is responsible for a criminal act of the servant if the act is done within the general scope of the servant's employment. In other words, if a master chooses to delegate the conduct of his business to a servant, then, if the servant, in the course of conducting the business, does an act which is absolutely prohibited, the master is liable, which is really only another way of saying that the act done must be within the general scope of the servant's employment. In Linnett v. Metropolitan Police Comr. (1), the question was whether one of two joint licensees of licensed premises could be criminally responsible for acts committed by the other joint licensee, the acts being connected with misconduct on the licensed premises. In giving judgment I said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 383):

"In this case, no relationship of master and servant exists between the two licensees, but they were joint licensees, and if one licensee chooses to say to his co-licensee: 'We both hold licences, we are both keepers of the house, but I am not going to take any part whatever in the management, I leave it entirely to you,' he is putting that other one into his shoes and he must then take responsibility for the acts which his co-licensee, who is placed there by him to exercise his own powers and duties, does, and he must take responsibility for what is done. That seems to me to be the principle which underlies all these cases."

If, in the case now before us, the respondent had put Purkis into the position of being a general agent in respect of the flats and had left the management to him, and Purkis had done an illegal act, it may be that the respondent would have been liable. The Case Stated, however, shows no such finding by the justices. Purkis had no authority to negotiate the terms. He had no authority to take a premium, and what he did was an illegal act which his master had in no way, either expressly or impliedly, authorised him to do, and which, moreover, the master had no means of preventing. I can find nothing in the facts found in the Case to show that what Purkis did was within the general scope of his authority.

In Collman v. Mills (2) the respondent was the licensed occupier of a slaughterhouse. He had ordered his foreman not to slaughter one beast in front of the other, but, during the absence of the respondent, the foreman did so. In that case the servant was doing that which he was left to do, viz., to slaughter beasts in the course of the business, and, therefore, the respondent was held liable for the act of his servant. For the reasons which I have stated, I think that the justices applied their minds to the right principles in the case and came to a right decision, and, therefore, the appeal will be dismissed.

BYRNE, J.: I agree. It is plain that the authority which Purkis had was of a very limited character, and, therefore, this case does not fall within that line of cases which indicates that the principle is that the master is vicariously responsible if the servant commits an offence in the general scope of his employment. The servant in this case was not acting within the general scope of his employment, and for those reasons I entirely agree with LORD GODDARD, C.J.

ORMEROD, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re WEBB. SANDOM v. WEBB.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), October 4, 5, 1950.]

Easement—Implied reservation—Lease—Display of advertisements on outer wall of demised premises.

By a written agreement dated Feb. 10, 1939, the landlord granted to the tenant "all the premises on the first and second floors above 405, Footscray Road, New Eltham" for a term of three years from Mar. 6, 1939. The tenant was not under any obligation to repair the outside of the premises. On the expiration of the term, the tenant remained in possession, and on Aug. 11, 1949, the landlord demised to the tenant "all that the first and second floors of the building situate in and being No. 405, Footscray Road . . ." for a term of twenty-one years from Mar. 25, 1949. The tenant covenanted to repair the inside of the premises, but was under no obligation to repair the outside, and the lease contained no covenant by the landlord to repair the outside of the premises. At the date of the inception of the tenancy in 1939, and at all times since, there were two large advertisements painted on an outside wall of the demised premises, one of the landlord's business, which was carried on on the ground floor, and one of B.'s matches. The tenant claimed that the landlord was not entitled to have the two advertisements so displayed.

HELD: the outer walls were included in the demise to the tenant, but in the circumstances there was to be implied in the lease an easement to display the two advertisements which were in existence at the date of the lease, and to repair and generally to maintain them.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the question whether, on the true construction of a lease and in the events which had happened, the landlord was entitled to use without the consent of the tenant for the purpose of advertising the outer walls, or any and if so what portion or portions of the outer walls, of the property demised by the lease.

Mulligan for the tenant.

Richmount for the landlord.

DANCKWERTS, J.: This is an originating summons in which the tenant under a lease asks for the construction of the terms of the lease, the defendant being the landlord. On Feb. 10, 1939, or Mar. 10, 1939 (both dates appear on the document) an agreement was entered into between the landlord and the tenant for a tenancy of the premises about which the dispute arises. The premises are described in this agreement as "all the premises on the first and second floors above 405, Footscray Road, New Eltham," the tenancy was to be for three years from Mar. 6, 1939, the rent was to be £65 a year, the tenant was to keep the interior of the demised premises in good condition and essential repair other than repair of a structural nature, and he was to leave the premises in good and substantial repair. There was, therefore, no obligation thrown on him to repair the outside of the premises. There was a provision for continuing the tenancy for a further period of three years by giving the appropriate notice, and, whether or not notice was given, the tenant did remain in possession of the premises after the expiration of that first period of three years. On Aug. 11, 1949, a lease was entered into between the parties whereby the premises were demised to the tenant for the period of twenty-one years from Mar. 25, 1949, the rent being increased to £104 a year. The premises in the lease are described as

"all that the first and second floors of the building situate in and being No. 405, Footscray Road, New Eltham, in the metropolitan borough of Woolwich, in the county of London, diagonally opposite the approach to New Eltham railway station."

There was a covenant by the tenant to repair the inside of the premises, but no obligation to repair the outside. There were certain covenants by the landlord, but not a covenant to repair the outside of the premises, though there was a covenant by him to pay

"all costs charges and expenses incurred by the lessee in abating a nuisance and executing all such works as may be necessary for abating a nuisance in obedience to a notice served by a local authority," and a covenant to perform the obligations affecting the demised premises which were contained in the superior lease. There was the usual covenant for quiet enjoyment.

The description of the premises, "all that the first and second floors of the building situate in and being No. 405, Footscray Road, New Eltham," plainly, in the absence of any provision to the contrary, includes the whole of those floors including the outside walls. That is obvious without authority, but counsel for the tenant referred me to Hope Bros., Ltd. v. Cowan (1), where that construction was given to "the demise of a floor or a room or an office bounded in part by an outside wall" notwithstanding that the landlords had covenanted to keep in repair the external parts of the demised premises and to permit the lessees to affix their trade signs, to be approved by the landlords, on the outside wall. That was, in fact, a stronger case, because there were provisions to the effect that the landlords should retain dominion over the outside wall, and, in my view, therefore, it is clear that prima facie the tenant in the present case obtained a tenancy of the outside walls, as well as one of the interior, of the first and second floors of this building. Counsel for the landlord attempted to argue that that prima facie meaning should be restricted in the circumstances of this case, but I do not think the argument can succeed.

It was said by a great authority, LORD WENSLEYDALE, in Waterpark (Lord) v. Fennell (2) (7 H.L. Cas. 684):

"The construction of a deed is always for the court; but, in order to apply its provisions, evidence is in every case admissible of all material facts existing at the time of the execution of the deed, so as to place the court in the situation of the grantor. In deeds, as well as wills, the state of the subject at the time of execution may always be inquired into . . ."

Therefore, I am entitled to look into the circumstances which existed at the date of the lease. There is evidence that at the date of the lease, and, indeed, at the date when the tenancy began in 1939, there was on the outside wall of the first floor demised to the tenant a large advertisement painted in these terms: "Webb's for Meat, Grocery and Provisions," and giving a telephone number. That refers to the landlord's business, which he conducted on the ground floor. There was also an advertisement contained in a frame attached to the outer wall of the first floor advertising Brymay Safety Matches, for which, no doubt, some payments was at all material times obtained by the landlord from the persons whose products were advertised. The tenant is a ladies' hairdresser, and there are two advertisements of his business: "John Sandom, Hair Stylist," on the same outer wall as the other two advertisements.

The presence of the advertisements of Webb's business and Brymay Safety Matches is the subject of the present proceedings. It is contended on behalf of the tenant that, as the outer walls are included in his tenancy—and I have held that to be correct—the landlord has no right to have these advertisements on the outside wall, and the tenant may in other proceedings be entitled to damages or to an injunction or some other relief. It seems to me that, as I have ruled against the landlord on the question of the demise of the property, the point remains whether there is to be implied in his favour some reservation of the right to have these advertisements retained on the wall. I do not know whether counsel for the landlord intended to put his client's case any higher than a right to retain the advertisements which existed at the date when the lease was entered into, but, if he did, in my view, such a claim must fail. It seems to me that the right must be implied, if at all, from the situation as it existed at the date when the lease was entered into. It is contended that there is an implied reservation in favour of the landlord, the grantor, and, while there is no great difficulty—in fact the implication is supported by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 62—in implying a right or easement of this kind in favour of the grantee, it is very difficult to imply reservations in favour of a grantor, whether a landlord or vendor. Generally speaking, such rights have been implied in favour of the vendor, as, indeed, counsel for the landlord admitted, only in the case of easements of necessity when it is impossible to obtain access to the grantor's other property unless such a right is implied in his favour.

The present claim cannot be described as a right of necessity, but, in my view, the landlord may have some right to have the advertisements remain. The nearest case to the present appears to be Simpson v. Weber (3). In that case, according to the headnote (133 L.T. 46), two adjoining houses, originally belonging to one person subsequently became vested in the plaintiff and defendant respectively. For some years before the severance of ownership, a creeper had been growing in what was now the defendant's garden with its foliage spreading along the wall of the plaintiff's house. Also, again before the severance of ownership, the post of a gate leading from what was now the defendant's garden had been fastened by plugs and nails into the plaintiff's wall. The growth of the creeper had from time to time reached the plaintiff's gutter and he had been obliged to cut it back. The plaintiff brought an action for trespass in respect of the two above-mentioned acts, and the county court judge found both acts to be trespasses. On appeal, it was held by the Divisional Court that both the growth of the creeper on the plaintiff's wall and the fastening of the gate to the plaintiff's wall would amount to trespasses unless they could be justified by the existence of an easement, the implied reservation of an easement in a grant of property depended on the common intention of the parties and there was no evidence that it was not the intention of the parties to the conveyance that creeper and gatepost should remain, and, therefore, an easement in each case was impliedly reserved. There was, however, it was further held, a duty on the part of the grantee to use care that the grantor's property was not unduly interfered with; the defendant in allowing the creeper to obstruct the plaintiff's gutter had failed to use necessary care; and as to this part of the case the award as to damages must stand. SALTER, J., said (133 L.T. 47):

"Was the county court judge right in holding that the defendant had no legal right of support against the plaintiff's wall either for the creeper or the gatepost? The case raises the question of the implied reservation of easements in grants of property. I do not think it necessary to refer to more than four cases. These are: Wheeldon v. Burrows (4), Jones v. Pritchard (5), Pwllbach Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Woodman (6), and Schwann v. Cotton (7). All these cases lay down a general rule, which ought to guide me here. I have to ask, what was the intention of the parties in the present case as to whether the creeper was to remain and grow against the plaintiff's wall, and as to whether the gatepost was to remain fastened to it. I doubt whether the finding of the county court judge does not involve some question of fact; but, upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion, in the case of an easement so obvious as this, that there was no evidence that it was not the intention of the parties that the creeper and gatepost should stay. The basis of easements is always the same—namely the common intention of the parties, and this is most clearly expressed in the cases of an easement of necessity and continuing easements . . ."

It may be said that this case goes further in favour of an implied reservation than any other case which, so far as I know, appears in the books, and, perhaps, with respect to the learned judge, one may say that he put the matter rather in the reverse way to that in which it has generally been put. I think the proper view is, not that there should be no evidence that it was not the intention, but that one should be able to find that there was an intention that the post and creeper (or, in an appropriate case, an advertisement) should remain in their or its original position. However that may be, that authority does not appear to have been adversely criticised in any subsequent case, though I doubt whether it was cited in cases where it might have been the subject of some discussion.

In Liddiard v. Waldron (8), which is usually referred to on the subject of reservation of easement in favour of the grantor, it was said, according to the headnote ([1934] 1 K.B. 435):

"A grantor cannot ordinarily reserve an easement otherwise than by express words for the benefit of land which he retains."

Therefore, it was held that the right of way which was contended for as an easement by reservation to be implied was not sustainable. On the other hand, the Court of Appeal there did recognise that there were exceptions to the rule that an easement will not be implied in favour of the grantor as laid down in Wheeldon v. Burrows (4), and GREER, L.J., said ([1934] 1 K.B. 447):

"The courts have been faced with the question whether or not in some cases there are exceptional circumstances which justify departure from that rule."

Then he refers to Thomas v. Owen (9) as being an exceptional case. It does seem to me that there may be exceptional circumstances in which it is only common sense to imply some reservation, and that such an implication should be made in the circumstances of the present case. When I see from the photograph which is before me that when the parties entered into their transaction there was an enormous advertisement painted on the wall advertising Webb's for meat, grocery and provisions, and a very large advertisement advertising Brymay Safety Matches, which had been there at least since 1939, and when no evidence is given that anything was said by either of the parties about the removal of those advertisements, it appears to me to be common sense to imply an intention on the part of the parties that they should remain. Therefore, I am prepared to hold that there was in favour of the landlord implied in this lease an easement until the termination of the lease to keep those two advertisements in the position in which they were, and, by necessary implication, a right to repair them, paint them, and do whatever may be necessary from time to time to preserve them as effective advertisements. I do not, however, think there is any evidence which would justify me in going beyond that, or which would justify the landlord in, for instance, letting out other parts of the wall for advertisements or in removing the Brymay advertisement or his own advertisement and substituting advertisements for somebody else's goods. The only right which can be implied in favour of the landlord is limited to those two advertisements which existed at the date of the lease, and I so hold.

Order accordingly. The tenant to pay the landlord's costs as between party and party.

NEWMAN v. LIPMAN.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Ormerod, JJ.), October 6, 1950.]

Street Trading—Street photographer—London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947 (c. xlvi), s. 17 (2).

The respondent, who had no street trading licence, photographed a person who was passing in a street, and received from her a sum of money as a deposit in respect of the price for the completed photograph which was not delivered in the street but was subsequently sent by post.

HELD: the provisions of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947, s. 17 (1), prohibiting street trading without a licence were meant to deal with the case of a person who was offering goods which were actually in the street, and did not apply where an agreement was made by two persons in the street relating to goods which were not then physically present, and, therefore, the respondent was Not Guilty of the offence of street trading from a stationary position in the street without a licence, contrary to s. 17 (2).

[FOR THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) ACT, 1947, s. 15, s. 17, s. 29 (1) (a), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, pp. 1332, 1334, 1343.]

Case referred to:

(1) McIvor v. Robertson (unreported).

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

On May 18, 1950, at Bow Street magistrate's court, an information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent that he did engage in street trading from a stationary position as a street photographer. For the appellant it was contended that the activity of a street photographer constituted street trading within the meaning of s. 29 (1) (a) of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947, as defined by s. 15 (1) and s. 17 (2) of that Act. The respondent contended that he was not occupying the stationary position contemplated by s. 17 (2) of the Act, and was not selling or exposing or offering for sale any article or thing within the terms of the said section.

Arthian Davies, K.C., and Sebag Shaw for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

Wingate-Saul appeared as amicus curiae.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the magistrate sitting at Bow Street magistrate's court before whom the respondent was charged "that he on Apr. 8, 1950, did engage in street trading from a stationary position, contrary to s. 29 of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947." That Act provides for the regulation of street trading, which, in s. 15, is defined in these words:

A " 'Street trading' means the selling or exposing or offering for sale of any article or thing in a street."

Section 17 provides:

B "(1) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act it shall be unlawful for any person—(a) to engage in street trading in or from a stationary position in any street within a borough; or (b) to engage in street trading in any designated street whether or not in or from a stationary position; unless that person is authorised to do so by a street trading licence. (2) For the purposes of this Part of this Act a person shall be deemed to engage in street trading on any occasion on which he sells or exposes or offers for sale any article or thing in a street whether or not he regularly carries on the business of street trading and a person shall be deemed to engage in street trading in or from a stationary position in a street if while he is engaged in street trading he or any article or thing exposed or offered for sale by him or any receptacle used by him in connection with the street trading occupies a stationary position in the street."

D This case relates to the activities of street photographers, of whom the respondent is one. No doubt many people regard them as pests and would like to see them removed from the streets, and there may or may not be other statutes which enable that to be done, but the question we have to decide is whether the section which I have read is drafted in such a way as to enable proceedings to be taken against these people who stop one in the street, take what is generally called a snapshot, and then offer to deliver a copy the next day. E The magistrate has found

F "that the respondent on the said day photographed a woman passing in the said street and received from her a sum of money and gave to her a receipt or voucher therefor; that when the respondent photographed the said woman and again when he received the said sum of money from her he was in a stationary position in the said street; that the money so received by the respondent was by way of deposit for and on account of the price of the completed photograph."

The magistrate also found that this was not street trading within the meaning of the definition in the Act

G "in so far as he was not occupying the 'stationary position' contemplated by s. 17 (2) of the said Act and was not selling or exposing or offering for sale any article or thing within the term of the said section."

H Counsel for the appellant has submitted here that if a photographer takes a photograph and offers to supply a copy of the photograph he is selling an article or thing. That may be right. We have not considered the question, sometimes raised in cases under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, whether the contract is for the delivery of the chattel or whether it is to be considered as one for work and labour. I am assuming for this purpose that there is a contract for the delivery of a chattel, namely, a photograph. Counsel for the appellant relied very strongly on McIvor v. Robertson (1), a decision of the Court of Justiciary in Scotland, where on a by-law in very similar terms made by Glasgow Corporation the court upheld the conviction of a man of street trading in the same circumstances as these, that is to say, taking a photograph of a person and telling him that the finished article would be delivered the next day. Counsel for the appellant pressed that case in aid, because, he said, it shows that there is an offering for sale here within the meaning of s. 17 (2).

On full consideration of this matter I have come to the conclusion that the magistrate was right. Looking at the whole scope of this Act I think that it is meant to deal with the case of a man who is offering goods which are actually in the street, and not to apply to a contract or agreement made by two people in the street who are not at the time dealing with goods there physically present. If the definition of "street trading" is read in this way: "'Street trading' means the selling or exposing or offering any article or thing in the street for sale" the matter becomes reasonably clear. This is an enactment to prevent obstruction, and the whole scheme of the Act shows that it is aimed at the "barrow boys," costermongers, hawkers, or other persons who offer for sale goods which are actually in the street. That becomes more clear by looking at s. 17 (2) which I have read. It seems to me that, though a person or the goods must be stationary, the Act contemplates the sale of goods which are in the street and not a contract which may be entered into in the street, because the consequences might be very far reaching in the latter case. There are various markets in London in which a great deal of business is done in the street. The Stock Exchange is one. It may be that this Act would not apply to the Stock Exchange, because stocks and shares are not articles or things which are subject to the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, but many commodities dealt with in Mincing Lane and elsewhere are goods within the ambit of that Act and I cannot believe that it is intended by the Act of 1947 that, if two business men are standing on the pavement and one agrees to sell the other a hundred tons of corn, or something of that sort, and then they pass on, they are committing an offence. That, however, would be the result if we supported the argument put forward by the appellant. It is all very well to say that no one would think of prosecuting in those circumstances, but when there are two possible constructions to be put on an Act it is right to prefer that which would not lead to anomalies that would follow from the other construction.

It is true that we are differing from the opinion expressed by the court in Scotland, and it is, no doubt, desirable that when an Act applies on both sides of the border the construction placed on it by the courts should be uniform. We are taking a different view from that which the judges of the Court of Justiciary took, but we cannot help that. We have to put on this Act, which we are regarding as a whole, the construction which we think is right, and, in my opinion, I think the magistrate came to a right construction in holding that it dealt with the exposing or offering for sale of goods which were in the street and not merely entering into a contract to sell goods, although that contract might be entered into in the street when two people are standing still. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed.

BYRNE, J.: I am of the same opinion.

ORMEROD, J.: I agree.

PILBURY v. BRAZIER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Ormerod, JJ.),
October 4, 1950.]

Street Traffic—Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Permitting vehicle to be used on road without policy of insurance being in force—Disqualification for holding licence—"Special reason" for refraining from disqualification—Insurers willing to admit liability—Taxi-cab under repair—Insurance cover suspended during overhaul—Renewed user through oversight—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (2).

The respondent, the owner of a fleet of taxi-cabs, held a policy of insurance against third party risks under which notice had to be given to the insurers saying which cars were at risk and which were not. On Jan. 6, 1950, one of the vehicles was taken out of service for repair and notice was given to the insurers that it was off risk. On Mar. 12, 1950, it was taken back into service, but, by an oversight of the respondent's manager, the insurers were not notified of the reinstatement of the vehicle, and for some days it was used without there being in force in relation to its user a policy of insurance in respect of third party risks. On Mar. 21, 1950, the respondent produced to the police a letter from the insurers which stated that the underwriters at Lloyds, who held the risk, would have accepted liability under the policy if an accident had occurred on or after Mar. 12. On the prosecution of the respondent for an offence under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1),

HELD: where authorised insurers stated that in the circumstances of the case they would have regarded themselves as liable and would have been willing to meet any claim, the mischief which the Act was designed to prevent did not arise, and, therefore, in the present case there existed special reasons within s. 35 (2) of the Act for not disqualifying the respondent for holding a licence.

CASE STATED by Essex Justices.

On May 4, 1950, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Romford, an information was preferred by the appellant, a police officer, against the respondent for unlawfully permitting the use of a motor vehicle on a road without there being in force in relation to its user a policy of third party insurance, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1). The respondent pleaded Guilty and was ordered to pay a fine of £10, but he was not disqualified for holding a licence under s. 35 (2), the justices being of the opinion that, in view of the size of his business, the respondent, who owned thirty-eight taxi-cabs, had to delegate to his manager certain duties, that he acted reasonably in delegating the insurance of these vehicles to the manager, that he had no reason to think that the manager would not carry out his instructions, that he was not aware, nor had he any reason to suspect, that the vehicle was not properly insured, and that the underwriters would have treated the vehicle as covered by insurance had a claim arisen, with the result that they held that there were special reasons why they should not disqualify the respondent for holding a driving licence. On this point the appellant appealed.

A. M. S. Neave for the appellant.

I. H. Jacob for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This case raises the vexed question what is or what is not a special reason for refraining from disqualifying a motorist who is driving an uninsured car. There is no question whatever—and this court has constantly said so in no uncertain terms—that, ordinarily speaking, driving an uninsured car is a serious offence. It is seldom an answer to say that it was only driven a little way. Not long ago we had a case where a car was driven for some two hundred yards by somebody who ought not to have driven it because he had no policy of insurance, and in that short distance the driver injured two people and broke a plate glass window. There are, however, cases in which it is found that on a technical and strict construction of the policy the underwriters would not be liable, but that they would regard themselves as liable if an accident happened. The most familiar instance is where a man has forgotten to renew his driving licence. Then, technically, he is not insured, though his policy may have several months to run, but no respectable insurance company would ever take that point if an accident happened in such circumstances, or if the renewal of the policy was out of time for a week, or something of that sort. Only insurers approved by the Ministry of Transport can grant insurances under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and, if one of the approved insurance companies states that in the circumstances of the case they would have regarded themselves as liable and would have been willing to meet any claim made, it is obvious that the mischief which the Act was designed to prevent does not arise. In those circumstances it cannot be said that there does not exist a special reason for the justices not to order disqualification.

In this case the respondent was a taxi-cab proprietor who had a number of hire cars or taxi-cabs. I do not think the fact that he left it to his manager to see to the insurance of the cabs would have been any excuse if there had been an accident. There was an open cover in the respondent's policy under which notice had to be given saying which cars were at risk and which were not. This particular cab had been taken out of service and off risk, and then it had been put back into service without the insurance company being informed of that fact. The insurance company have stated that, if there had been an accident, they would have regarded themselves as liable, and in those circumstances there was ample ground for the justices to hold that there was a special reason for not ordering disqualification. The only thing on which I differ from them is that, in my view, it was not necessary to impose a fine of £10. They did impose such a fine, and, no doubt, it will be useful in making the respondent more careful in future to see that due notice is given, but it is impossible to say that there were not ample grounds for the justices to refrain from disqualifying him, and, therefore, the appeal is dismissed.

BYRNE, J.: I entirely agree. I think it would have been extremely surprising if the justices had come to any other conclusion than that to which they did come.

ORMEROD, J.: I agree.

BECKER v. PURCHASE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Ormerod, J.J.), October 5, 1950.]

Quarter Sessions—Costs—Appeal from court of summary jurisdiction—Costs of successful appellant disallowed—Reason for disallowance stated by court—Decision based on conclusion of court on material issue—Appellant's evidence not heard.

A

The appellant appealed to quarter sessions against a conviction by a court of summary jurisdiction for driving a motor vehicle in a manner which was dangerous to the public, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s.11 (1), in that he had driven a motor car over the pavement of a London street. It was an essential part of his case that he was obliged to drive over the pavement because the driver of a van was backing the van towards him. After hearing the case for the prosecution, quarter sessions allowed the appeal without calling on the appellant, but refused to make an order as to costs, and they refused to hear counsel for the appellant on the question of costs. The chairman of the court said that they had formed the unanimous view that the driver of the van had stopped the van when the appellant drove over the pavement, and that it had been unnecessary and imprudent for the appellant to cross the pavement, and, therefore, he was not entitled to costs. It was contended by the appellant that the decision of quarter sessions on costs was bad, as it was based on a finding on which his evidence had not been heard.

HELD: as the chairman of the justices had given as their reason for refusing to award the appellant his costs their conclusion on a material issue before them on which they had not heard the evidence of the appellant, they had not exercised their discretion judicially, and the case should be remitted to them to hear the appellant's evidence before making a decision as to costs.

CASE STATED by the Appeal Committee of the City of London Quarter Sessions.

H

The appellant appealed against a conviction at the court at the Mansion House of having, on May 23, 1949, driven a motor vehicle in a manner which was dangerous to the public, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), by driving his motor car over the footpath at the corner of a street. On Jan. 4, 1950, after hearing the case for the prosecution, quarter sessions allowed the appeal without calling on the appellant, but refused to make an order as to costs. The chairman of the court stated that they had reached the unanimous view that the driver of a van, which was involved in the incident, the subject-matter of the appeal, had stopped the van when the appellant drove over the footpath. The appellant's case was that he was forced to mount the footpath because the driver of the van was backing the van towards him. It was contended by the appellant that the decision on costs was bad, as it was based on a finding on a material issue on which his evidence had not been heard. The justices agreed to state a Case for the opinion of the High Court, and a draft Case, which contained the statement of the chairman of the court that they had formed the view that the van was stationary at the time of the incident, was agreed by counsel, but was not accepted by the justices. The Case stated by the justices contained their reason for disallowing costs (viz., that, while they were prepared to accept the appellant's reason for driving over the footpath, as put by counsel on his behalf, as an answer to the charge of dangerous driving, they "were nevertheless of the opinion that it was an unnecessary and imprudent thing to have done amounting to carelessness"), but it omitted any reference to the chairman's statement. At the hearing before the Divisional Court, an affidavit, sworn on behalf of the appellant by his solicitor and exhibiting the agreed draft Case, was allowed to be read. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., and Medd for the appellant.

E. J. P. Cussen for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the appeal committee of the City of London Quarter Sessions and it is of an unusual character. The appellant was convicted at the court at the Mansion House of driving a motor vehicle in a manner which was dangerous to the public, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), in that at a certain place in Tallis Street he drove on to the pavement. He appealed to the City of London Quarter Sessions. Quarter sessions, having heard the evidence adduced for the prosecution and the cross-examination by counsel for the appellant of the driver of a van which was involved in the incident that gave rise to the prosecution and of two pedestrians who were present at the time, were evidently prepared to accept, in general, the case which was being put forward by the appellant. The members of the court conferred on the bench and then said that they would allow the appeal. That clearly showed that they did not think that the prosecution had established a case. If they had merely said: "We allow this appeal, but we shall not give costs," it would have been impossible to ask this court to interfere with the exercise of their discretion as to costs. It is, however, agreed by both parties—although not so stated in the Case which the justices have signed—that the chairman of the court said that they were satisfied that the driver of the van had stopped the van when the appellant drove over the pavement. It may be that the cross-examination had not been thoroughly understood, since the appellant's contention was, apparently, that he was obliged to go on to the pavement because the van was backing towards him. Counsel for the appellant then asked to be heard on the question of costs, but the court said that it would be no use hearing him because they had accepted enough facts to show that the appellant was Not Guilty. They had, therefore, accepted the admissions which had been made in cross-examination in support of the appellant's case, but they had not heard him on the question whether or not the van backed.

If that was a material point in the case, it seems to me that quarter sessions could hardly exercise their discretion in regard to costs without hearing the appellant's evidence on the matter, and, as they had not heard his evidence when the chairman of the justices said that the court were of opinion that the van was stationary when the appellant mounted the pavement, there was not, at the time, sufficient material before them on which they could exercise their discretion whether or not they should give costs. I wish to emphasise, however, that a defendant or a prisoner is not entitled, as of right, to costs whenever a court allows his appeal or dismisses an information against him or if a jury returns a verdict of Not Guilty. Costs are always in the discretion of the court. The court can stop a case and say: "Nevertheless, we are not going to give costs." If, however, a wrong reason is given for not allowing costs, I think the law has always been that a court of appeal can reverse the decision or make some further order.

The difficulty in this case is largely due to the procedure adopted. It would have been more satisfactory if the appellant had applied for a mandamus, when we could have had affidavits in full from the members of the court and could have then decided whether or not the case should go back to them, ordering them to give it a further hearing. I think, however, that we can deal with the case satisfactorily as, where a court of quarter sessions states a Case, the court is not functus officio until the Case goes back and the court has considered the expression of opinion of this court on the question asked.

The question of law that is put to us is:

"Whether upon the facts stated above the justices exercised a judicial discretion in refusing to award the appellant his costs of the appeal."

The parties had agreed a Case and submitted it to the justices for signature, but it was not adopted by the justices. If parties agree a Case, it is rather a strong thing for justices not to adopt it. The paragraph which was agreed between the parties was this:

- A "The chairman of the said justices then said that the said justices had formed an unanimous view to the effect that the van driver (who was concerned in the incident which was the subject-matter of the appeal) had stopped his van when the appellant drove over the pavement, that it had been unnecessary for the appellant to cross the pavement and that he had been unwise in doing so, and that they, the said justices, were, therefore, not awarding the appellant costs."
- B I think we should answer the question asked by the Case in this way. It appearing to this court from affidavits which it has allowed to be read and by the admission of counsel for the respondent that the chairman of the justices stated that they were satisfied that the van driver concerned in the incident which was the subject-matter of the appeal had stopped, and as the court is satisfied that that question was the issue before the justices, they should not have given a decision on costs without having heard the appellant's evidence on that point.
- C The justices will be asked to hear the appellant's evidence on the point. We are not saying that the justices must give the appellant his costs, nor are we saying that the order which they have made with regard to costs should stand. All we are saying is that, in view of what happened in this case and of the particular reason which the chairman announced, we think that the justices cannot be said to have exercised their discretion on proper material. They ought to have heard more. Therefore, the case must go back to them with that expression of opinion.

- E BYRNE, J.: I agree. I only desire to emphasise one observation which LORD GODDARD, C.J., has made, and that is that this case must not be taken as a precedent in regard to the proper procedure in a case in which an appellant is successful before quarter sessions. This case proceeds on its own peculiar circumstances and our decision is based on the fact that the chairman gave a reason for not allowing costs. It should be clearly understood that we are not laying down a general principle that, when a question of costs arises, a defendant who has been successful shall have a right to call evidence.

HOLT v. DYSON.

October 6, 1950.]

Street Traffic—Dangerous driving—Notice of intended prosecution—Notice sent by registered post to defendant's permanent residence eleven days after commission of the offence—Defendant known to be then seriously ill in hospital—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 21 (c).

On Nov. 17, 1949, the respondent was seriously injured in a road accident while driving a motor car in Hove. She was taken, unconscious, to Hove hospital, where she was detained until Jan. 23, 1950. A police officer saw her in the hospital on Nov. 17, Nov. 20 and Nov. 24, and it was known to the police that she was not likely to be discharged from hospital for some time. On Nov. 28 a notice of intended prosecution for an offence against the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), was sent to her by registered post, addressed to her permanent residence in Worthing. The house being unoccupied at the time, the envelope containing the notice was returned to the police at Hove on Dec. 9, and was served personally on the respondent in the hospital on the same day. On being charged under s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1930 with driving a motor car in a manner which was dangerous to the public, the respondent contended that s. 21 (c) of the Act had not been complied with.

HELD: as the police knew that the respondent was in hospital and would not be returning to her permanent address for some time, their sending the notice of intended prosecution by registered post to her permanent address three days before the period required by s. 21 (c) of the Act of 1930 had expired was not a compliance with the section.

CASE STATED by Hove justices.

On Nov. 17, 1949, while driving a motor car on a road in Hove, the respondent was involved in an accident and was seriously injured. She was removed from her car in an unconscious state and taken to the Hove General Hospital, where she was detained until Jan. 23, 1950. She was seen in the hospital three times by a police officer, the third time being on Nov. 24. On Nov. 28 a notice of intended prosecution was sent to her by registered post, addressed to her permanent residence at Worthing. The house was unoccupied at the time, and on Dec. 9 the registered envelope containing the notice was returned to the police station at Hove. On the same day the notice was served personally on the respondent in the Hove General Hospital. On June 1, 1950, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Hove, the respondent was charged, on an information preferred by the appellant, the chief inspector of the Hove Division, East Sussex Constabulary, with driving a motor car in a manner which was dangerous to the public, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1). The justices were of opinion (i) that a notice of intended prosecution under s. 21 of the Act had to be served personally or sent by registered post to the place where the addressee actually was or was reasonably believed by the addressor to be, (ii) that the appellant knew that the respondent was at the Hove General Hospital and he, or one of his subordinate officers, also knew that she was not likely to be discharged from hospital for some time, and (iii) that, as the notice was not served on her in the hospital until more than fourteen days after the commission of the offence

s. 21 (c) had not been complied with, and, accordingly, they dismissed the information. From that decision the appellant appealed.

Harold J. Brown for the appellant.

Friend for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the borough of Hove, before whom the respondent was charged under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1), with driving a motor car in a manner which was dangerous to the public. The point that was taken on her behalf was that no notice of intention to prosecute was given within the period required by s. 21 of the Act, which provides:

“Where a person is prosecuted for an offence . . . relating . . . to . . . dangerous driving, . . . he shall not be convicted unless either—(a) he was warned at the time the offence was committed that the question of prosecuting him for an offence under some one or other of the provisions aforesaid would be taken into consideration; or (b) within fourteen days of the commission of the offence a summons for the offence was served on him; or (c) within the said fourteen days a notice of the intended prosecution specifying the nature of the alleged offence and the time and place where it is alleged to have been committed was served on or sent by registered post to him or the person registered as the owner of the vehicle at the time of the commission of the offence: Provided that—(i) Failure to comply with this requirement shall not be a bar to the conviction of the accused in any case where the court is satisfied that—(1) neither the name and address of the accused nor the name and address of the registered owner of the vehicle, could with reasonable diligence have been ascertained in time for a summons to be served or for a notice to be served or sent as aforesaid . . .”

The accident in this case happened on Nov. 17, 1949, and the respondent was in hospital from Nov. 17 to Jan. 23, 1950, which shows that she received very severe injuries. A police officer saw her in the hospital on Nov. 17, while she was still unconscious. He saw her again in the hospital on Nov. 20, and, although she was conscious, she was confused, as she was still suffering from concussion, and could not recollect the route which she had taken before the accident. He saw her in the hospital for the third time on Nov. 24, when she said that she remembered the route she had followed part of the way, but did not remember the rest. On Nov. 28 the superintendent of police sent a notice of intended prosecution to an address in Worthing which the justices find was the respondent's permanent address. The justices stated in the Case that, in their opinion,

“ . . . the appellant [the chief inspector of police] knew that the respondent was at Hove General Hospital on Nov. 24, 1949, and that it was within his knowledge or the knowledge of one of his subordinate officers that the respondent was not likely to be discharged from hospital for some considerable time . . .”

That being so, I am at a complete loss to understand why the police did not send the notice, either by hand or by post, to the hospital. It would be the ordinary, reasonable and sensible thing to do. They sent it, instead, to an address to which, as they must have known, the respondent would not be returning for some time.

It is contended by the appellant that this point has been decided by Stanley v. Thomas (1). In that case, when the police superintendent sent the notice of intended prosecution to the respondent's usual place of residence he knew that the respondent was still in hospital, but the Divisional Court considered that, as the notice was posted nine days before the period required by s. 21 (c) of the Act of 1930 had expired, it was reasonable to suppose that it would, in the ordinary course, reach the respondent before the expiration of the statutory period. In the case now before us the notice was sent to the respondent's permanent address only three days before the statutory period had expired and while the respondent was in hospital, obviously still very ill. For these reasons, I think that this case is entirely different from Stanley v. Thomas (1).

The consequence of acceding to the appellant's contention in this case would be remarkable. If, for example, a person, whose permanent address was in Cornwall, happened to be staying in Northumberland for a month and was involved in a motor accident on the second day of his stay there, the police could send a notice of intended prosecution to his address in Cornwall two days before the expiration of the period required by s. 21 (c) of the Act, although they knew that he was staying in Northumberland. The police must act reasonably in these matters. By s. 21 (c) of the Act, the notice is to be served on the person to be charged, or sent to him by registered post, within fourteen days of the commission of the offence. If the police know where he is staying at the time, they can send the notice to him at that address. They did not do so in this case, and it was entirely their fault that the notice was not received within the fourteen days. For these reasons, I think that the justices came to a perfectly right decision, and the appeal is dismissed.

BYRNE, J.: It is significant that, when the registered envelope containing the statutory notice was returned to the police station on Dec. 9 because there was no one to receive it at the respondent's address, that notice was then served personally on the respondent at the Hove General Hospital on the same day. That indicates, to my mind, that the police knew perfectly well where the respondent was at all material times. It is to be observed that in Stanley v. Thomas (1) LORD HEWART, C.J., said that other considerations might apply where the circumstances were of a different kind. The circumstances in this case are entirely different from those in Stanley v. Thomas (1), and I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

NOTE.

F. E. HOOKWAY & CO., LTD. v. H. W. HOOPER & CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Denning, L.J.J.), October 5, 1950.]

Arbitration—Commencement within time fixed by agreement—Extension of time—“Undue hardship”—Delay due to fault of applicants for extension—Loss on sub-contracts—Arbitration Act, 1934 (c. 14), s. 16 (6).

[EDITORIAL NOTE. The Arbitration Act, 1934, was repealed by the Arbitration Act, 1950, which came into force on Sept. 1, 1950, and s. 16 (6) of the Act of 1934 is now reproduced in s. 27 of the Act of 1950.]

APPEAL by the buyers from an order of the Divisional Court, dated July 11, 1950, refusing an application under s. 16 (6) of the Arbitration Act, 1934, for an extension of time for claiming arbitration. By s. 16 (6) the court has power to extend the time limited by a contract for claiming arbitration “if it is of opinion that in the circumstances of the case undue hardship would otherwise be caused, and notwithstanding that the time so fixed has expired . . .”

The applicants were buyers of coffee under a contract which contained an arbitration clause requiring any dispute arising out of the contract to be made within fourteen days after the final day of discharge of goods at the port of final destination. The coffee was discharged at Gibraltar, the port of final destination, on Mar. 2, 1950, and the buyers thereupon requested their Gibraltar sub-agents to take samples of the coffee and forward them to London for testing. The sub-agents were unable to do this at once, as the bills of lading, which had been in the buyers' possession since Jan. 25, were still in London. On the receipt of the bills by the sub-agents there was a further delay because the goods had been warehoused and the buyers did not wish to take delivery until Mar. 20. Samples were finally taken on Mar. 24 and forwarded to London where they arrived on Apr. 14. The buyers received the samples on Apr. 17 and on the same day made a claim for arbitration on the question of quality. The umpire found that the buyers' claim was out of time and could not be proceeded with. There was no evidence that the buyers had suffered any loss on sub-sales.

Foster, K.C., and Littman for the buyers.

Stephen Chapman for the sellers.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the buyers stresses the wording of s. 16 (6) of the Arbitration Act, 1934, and submits that one has to consider solely the degree of hardship that may be caused. He says rightly that one factor in considering that is whether or not any hardship will fall on the seller. A seller who could say: "After all this time, it will be impossible to prove our case," would have a strong argument against the application being granted. The seller here does not suggest that, but counsel for the buyers goes a stage further than I am prepared to go. He submits that, in considering what is undue hardship, what I may call the negligence of the buyers in failing to take any steps to claim the arbitration as provided for by the agreement is irrelevant. I do not accept that submission. I think the man who can say: "I did everything I could to comply with this provision" would have a case of greater "hardship" than a man who has to say: "I forgot all about this clause, and it is entirely my own fault that I am out of time." It is less hard on him that he should suffer the consequences of his own neglect than it would be on a man who has taken every reasonable step to comply with the provisions of the clause. Therefore, I think this is a relevant circumstance. The inference I draw from the evidence is that the buyers forgot about this clause, and that is a factor which makes it difficult for them to show undue hardship. Dealing with the matter de novo, although it is near the line, I think that their application does not come within the section, and the appeal must be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: If the delay was no fault of the buyer, it would, no doubt, be an undue hardship on him to hold the clause against him, but, if the delay is his own fault, the hardship may not be undue. It may be a hardship which it is due and proper that he should bear, because he may only have himself to thank for it. The delay is, therefore, a relevant circumstance. Another relevant circumstance is that there is no evidence of any loss on any sub-contracts and no evidence of any claims by sub-buyers or any complaints by them. If there had been, the court might have taken a lenient view of the delay and held that, notwithstanding it, there was undue hardship on the buyer, but in the absence of such evidence, I do not think this is a case where the discretion of the court should be exercised.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

C.N.B.

PEARL ASSURANCE CO., LTD. v. WEST MIDLANDS GAS BOARD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), October 5, 6, 1950.]

Gas — Nationalisation — Compensation — “Securities” — Debenture — Redeemable mortgage debenture — Gas Act, 1948 (c. 67), s. 74 (1).

The Gas Act, 1948, s. 74 provides: “(1) In this Act, except where the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say . . . ‘securities,’ in relation to a body corporate, means any shares, stock, debentures and debenture stock of the body corporate, and also includes any mortgages of the body which were quoted in the STOCK EXCHANGE OFFICIAL DAILY LIST (within the meaning of s. 25 of this Act) on all six . . .” of certain specified dates.

The plaintiffs held a document entitled “Redeemable Mortgage Debenture” dated Dec. 19, 1938, issued by the C.D. Gas Co., Ltd., a company incorporated under the Companies Acts. By cl. 1 of the document the company agreed to pay £18,480 to the plaintiffs on Nov. 10, 1963, or on such earlier date as the money would become payable in accordance with the conditions indorsed thereon. By cl. 2 the company agreed to pay interest, and by cl. 3 it charged with such payments the undertaking and all the property of the company present and future. The document constituted a floating charge, and the twelve indorsed conditions were in the form commonly found in debentures issued by companies incorporated under the Companies Acts.

HELD: the document was a “debenture” within the first part of the definition of “securities” in s. 74 (1); while it might be that it could also be described as a mortgage, there was nothing in the later part of the definition to cut down the meaning of the words “debentures and debenture stock” in the earlier part so as to exclude from them a debenture creating a charge on the property of the company; and, therefore, the document was a security in place of which the plaintiffs were to receive compensation under s. 25 of the Act of 1948 by the issue of gas stock.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether on the true construction of the Gas Act, 1948, and in the events which had happened (a) the secured debt of £18,480 with interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum payable under or by virtue of and secured by a document dated Dec. 19, 1938, and issued by Cannock District Gas Co., Ltd., to the plaintiffs, which document was called a redeemable mortgage debenture, constituted a liability or obligation of the company within s. 17 of the Act which on the vesting date in the Act vested in and became and remained a liability or obligation of and enforceable against the company, or (b) the document and rights and remedies thereby conferred on the holders thereof (including the right to be paid the debt and interest thereby secured) constituted a security within the meaning of s. 74 (1) of the Act in respect of which the plaintiffs, as holders, were or would be entitled to and bound to accept compensation in accordance with the provisions of s. 25 of the Act.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This is a summons which raises a question of construction under the Gas Act, 1948. The plaintiffs, the Pearl Assurance Company,

A Ltd., are the holders of a document described on the face of it as a "redeemable mortgage debenture," dated Dec. 19, 1938, and brought into existence and issued by a company called the Cannock District Gas Co., Ltd., a company incorporated under the relevant Companies Act and an undertaker within the meaning of that term as used in the Gas Act, 1948. By this document, the gas company, by cl. 1, agreed that, on Nov. 10, 1963, or such earlier date as the principal money
B would become payable in accordance with the conditions indorsed thereon, it would pay to the plaintiffs £18,480. By cl. 2 the company agreed in the meantime to pay interest at four per cent. per annum by stated half-yearly payments. By cl. 3 the company charged with such payments the undertaking and all the property of the company present and future, including any capital for the time being uncalled. By cl. 4 it is provided that this mortgage debenture is
C issued subject to and with the benefit of the conditions indorsed thereon which are deemed part of it. Turning to the conditions one finds twelve conditions set out in what may be conveniently and not inaccurately described as a common form usually found in debentures issued by companies incorporated under the Companies Acts with a view to securing money borrowed by them. The charge, it is made clear by condition 1, is a floating charge. Provisions are made for the D keeping of a register of the debentures; for transfer; as to the two events in which the principal moneys are to become immediately payable; and for the remedies to be open to the holder of the debenture on the happening of either of those events.

D A perusal of the document satisfies me that it is accurately described as a debenture. It is made manifest by the cases which have been cited to me by counsel for the plaintiffs that there does not exist any precise, definite, and universally accepted definition of debenture, but it is equally clear that this document is a debenture. By the Gas Act, 1948, s. 17, it is provided:

E " (1) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act [Part II] all property, rights, liabilities and obligations which, immediately before such date as may be appointed by order of the Minister (in this Act referred to as 'the vesting date'), were property, rights, liabilities and obligations of an undertaker to whom this Part of this Act applies, shall on the vesting date vest by virtue of this Act and without further assurance in such area board as may be determined by order of the Minister . . . (6) Notwithstanding anything in this section—(a) there shall not, by reason of the vesting of property, rights, liabilities or obligations of any undertaker to whom this Part of this F Act applies in any area board or in the Gas Council, be transferred to the board or the council any right, liability or obligation of the undertaker in respect of any securities issued by the undertaker . . . "

G By s. 25, to the language of which I need not refer in detail, it is in substance provided that every holder of securities of any undertaker whose liabilities are taken over is to be compensated by the issue to him of British Gas Stock, and machinery is incorporated in that section to resolve in each particular case how much of British Gas Stock is to be issued by way of compensation.

H Pausing there and looking no further at the Gas Act, 1948, it is plain that the scheme of the Act is to take over gas undertakings carried on by undertakers as defined by the Act, which include not merely companies such as the one concerned in this case, incorporated under the relevant Companies Act, but bodies corporate incorporated under special Acts and bodies corporate to whom the provisions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, apply. The scheme is that the area board or the Gas Council, in whom the property of the undertaker is vested, shall assume the liabilities and obligations of that undertaker with the exception that, as regards liabilities, whatever falls within the meaning of the word "securities" as used in the Act is not to be kept alive but is to be extinguished, and the person who is the holder immediately before the appointed day is to receive in place of the extinguished security British Gas Stock.

I pass now to the critical provision in the Act on which the question in this summons arises, i.e., the definition of "securities" in s. 74 (1) of the Act, which so far as is relevant provides:

"(1) In this Act, except where the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say . . . 'securities,' in relation to a body corporate, means any shares, stock, debentures and debenture stock of the body corporate, and also includes any mortgages of the body which were quoted in the STOCK EXCHANGE OFFICIAL DAILY LIST (within the meaning of s. 25 of this Act) on all six . . ."

of certain specified dates. The question which is raised on this summons is whether, as the plaintiffs contend, this is a redeemable mortgage debenture, which does not fall within that definition and is, therefore, preserved in existence, or whether, as the defendants, the West Midlands Gas Board (the area board in whom the undertaking of the company is vested), contend, the document falls within the definition of "securities," and, therefore, will be extinguished and the plaintiffs compensated by the issue of an amount of British Gas Stock calculated in accordance with the provisions of s. 25 of the Act.

The point, therefore, is a short point of construction. The opening part of the definition is clearly wide enough to include the document in question, and, indeed, it is conceded on behalf of the plaintiffs that, if the definition of "securities" stopped short before the words "and also includes," the defendants would have no case to answer. Let me repeat the opening words:

"... 'Securities,' in relation to a body corporate, means any shares, stock, debentures and debenture stock of the body corporate . . ."

This document, as I have already said, in my view, is accurately to be described as a debenture and, therefore, prima facie, clearly falls within the definition of "securities," but it is argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that this document does not fall within that definition because, having regard to the force of the language contained in the second part of the definition, the words "debentures and debenture stock" in the first part of the definition are confined to debentures and debenture stock which do not create any charge on the property of the body corporate in question. That conclusion is sought to be reached in this way. The definition proceeds by providing that "securities" also include any mortgages of the body which were quoted in the STOCK EXCHANGE OFFICIAL DAILY LIST on six specified days. It is pointed out, with force, that a mortgage which is quoted cannot refer, for instance, to a mortgage of freeholds, and must refer to a mortgage which has the characteristic of marketability, and, therefore, the meaning of the word "mortgage" in the second limb of the definition is mortgage debenture or, on the basis that the two words are interchangeable, debenture mortgage. It is argued from that that, if the word "mortgages" means debenture mortgages or mortgage debentures, and as those mortgages are limited to a particular class, viz., those which are quoted in the STOCK EXCHANGE OFFICIAL DAILY LIST on the days in question, that must of necessity limit the scope of the words "debentures and debenture stock" in the earlier part of the definition, because otherwise no meaning can be given to the second part of the definition, and there could be no sense in its inclusion in the Act unless the words "debentures and debenture stock" in the earlier part are read as being limited to debentures and debenture stock which contain no charge. Such a construction is one which, if the language is sufficiently strong, must have effect, but, in the first place, it is to be observed that it is a construction which, to put it no higher, would defeat what, in my view, as I have already described it, is the scheme and policy of the Act. Further, looking only at the language of the definition of "securities," this construction would run counter to what, at any rate at first sight, would appear to have been the intention of the draftsman, viz., to incorporate in the Act a definition which, as it progressed, was meant to be of an expanding nature. The definition starts by providing that “ ‘ securities ’ . . . means any shares, stock, debentures and debenture stock of the body corporate, and also includes . . . ” Reliance was placed on the word “ also ” by both counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs, but, in my view, the presence of that word tends strongly against their argument. In my judgment, it indicates that what follows is to be in addition to what has gone before, yet, if the construction for which the plaintiffs contend is the correct construction, the inevitable result will be to cut down what has gone before by the phrase starting with the words “ and also includes.”

Unless, therefore, I find the language of the second part of the definition so strong that I cannot avoid the result, I should not incline to accept the plaintiffs’ construction. I do not find it so strong. I do not find it necessary to make any pronouncement as to the exact scope of the word “ mortgages ” in the second part of the definition, but it is clearly a word which is apt to include those securities issued by statutory companies pursuant to the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 38 and s. 41, in the form of sched. C to that Act, where the form is described as a “ Form of mortgage deed ” and contains the word “ Mortgage, number——.” It may well be that the document which I have to consider in this case is not only capable of being described as a debenture, and, therefore, falling under the first part of the definition, but also can be described as a mortgage. It has, on the face of it, the word “ mortgage.” I see no reason, in arriving at a conclusion in this case, to pronounce definitely on that, but, assuming that that was the position, that appears to me not to help the plaintiffs, because it is clear from British India Steam Navigation Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) that a document which can be described as a debenture may also be described accurately as another type of document, viz., in that case, a promissory note. Nor do I feel constrained to speculate why the mortgages referred to in the second part of the definition are limited to those which were quoted in the STOCK EXCHANGE OFFICIAL DAILY LIST on the six days in question, thus excluding documents falling within the description of mortgages in that definition which were not quoted in the STOCK EXCHANGE OFFICIAL DAILY LIST on those days. That is a matter of policy with which this court cannot be concerned.

It appears to me, therefore, that there is no reason which compels me to cut down the meaning of the words “ debentures and debenture stock ” in the earlier part of the definition, and that there is every reason why I should not do so, having regard both to the policy of the Act and to the language by which the second part of the definition is introduced.

Declaration accordingly. The plaintiffs were ordered to pay the costs.

INVESTMENTS, LTD.,

Applied. WOOLFE v. WEXLER. [1951]
All E.R. 635.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Finnemore, JJ.), July 26, 1950.]

Rent Control—Tribunal—Jurisdiction—"Limitation of rent under any enactment"—Dwelling-house built under building licence—Maximum rent to be charged on letting stated in application for licence—No condition limiting rent attached to licence—Condition limiting rent and purporting to be condition "attached to a building licence" registered as local land charge under Land Charges Act, 1925 (c. 22), s. 15, pursuant to Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945 (c. 20), s. 8 (1)—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 1 (7) (b).

An application under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A, for a building licence to construct a block of flats contained a statement by the landlord (the builder) that the maximum rent of a flat would be £220 per annum, but the licence, which was issued on Oct. 10, 1945, contained no condition limiting the rent. In a letter, dated Mar. 5, 1946, the local authority informed the landlord that they proposed to register the condition attached to the licence, viz., that the flats should not be let at a rent of more than £220 per annum, as a land charge, under the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 15, in accordance with s. 8 (1) of the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, and a condition limiting the maximum rent to £220 a year and purporting to be a condition "attached to a building licence" was registered as a local land charge. In December, 1947, one of the flats was let to a tenant at a rent of £185 a year. On an application by the tenant to the rent tribunal to determine the reasonable rent of the flat, under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), the landlord contended that, under s. 1 (7) of the Act, the tribunal had no jurisdiction to consider the application because a limitation of the rent was in force, within the meaning of s. 1 (7) (b).

HELD: (i) the application for the licence and the licence could not be read as one document, and, therefore, there was no condition attached to the building licence limiting the maximum rent of the flat.

Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth ([1948] 2 All E.R. 558), applied.

(ii) the registration under the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 15, was not a limitation of the rent "imposed by or under any enactment," within the meaning of s. 1 (7) (b) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, for the Act of 1925 did not impose the limitation on the rent and the entry in the register merely recorded that a building licence in respect of the premises contained a condition limiting the rent, a statement which was wrong. No condition being attached to the licence, no limitation of the rent was in force within the meaning of s. 1 (7) (b) of the Act of 1949, and, therefore, the rent tribunal had jurisdiction to hear the application, under s. 1 (1).

Case referred to:

(1) Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth, [1948] 2 All E.R. 558; 112 J.P. 377; 2nd Digest Supp.

MOTION by the landlords for a writ of prohibition to restrain a rent tribunal from proceeding to hear an application by the tenant, under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), to determine the reasonable rent of a dwelling-house, a flat, No. 140, Beaufort Park, Falloden Way, in the county of Middlesex.

The flat, which was built subject to a building licence, dated Oct. 10, 1945, and issued under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A, was let to the tenant in December, 1947, at a rent of £185 a year. The application for the building licence contained a statement that the maximum rental would be £220 a year, but no condition limiting the rent appeared on the licence. In 1946 a condition limiting the rent, and purporting to be a condition attached to the building licence, was registered by the local authority as a local land charge, under the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 15. The landlords contended that, under s. 1 (7) of the Act of 1949, the tribunal had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the application because (inter alia) (a) the licence must be read together with the application which limited the rent, and, therefore, there was a limitation of the rent in force, imposed under reg. 56A of the regulations of 1939, within the meaning of s. 1 (7) (b), and (b) the registering of the condition under the Land Charges Act, 1925, constituted a limitation of rent imposed under a statute, within s. 1 (7) (b).

Heathcote-Williams, K.C., and Stranger-Jones for the landlords.
J. P. Ashworth for the rent tribunal.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the landlords moves for a writ of prohibition to restrain the rent tribunal for Barnet, etc., from proceeding to hear a reference under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to do so. He relies on s. 1 (7) of the Act which provides:

“No application shall be made under this section in respect of any house—(a) while it is under the management of a housing association within the meaning of the Housing Act, 1936 (including a development corporation established under the New Towns Act, 1946), or (b) while any limitation of the rent is in force, being a limitation imposed by or under any enactment not contained in the [Rent Restrictions] Acts or this Act.”

Counsel for the plaintiffs contends that a limitation is in force and that it is imposed by the Land Charges Act, 1925.

In July, 1945, the landlords applied for a building licence to construct a block of flats at Beaufort Park, in the north of London. The following particulars had to be completed on the application form:

“(1) If the house is to be occupied by the applicant, state (a) contract price of house . . . (3) If the house is to be let, state proposed rent of the house . . .”

The landlords stated that the contract price of the building was to be £22,000 and that each flat was “to be let at rentals varying according to type of flat, from £185 to £220 per annum.” Application for a licence has to be made under the terms of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A, which is still in force by virtue of the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945. Regulation 56A (7) provides:

“An authorisation or licence granted for the purposes of this regulation may be granted subject to conditions or limitations . . .”

That gives power to the licensing authority to impose any conditions which they may see fit to impose. The licence, which was granted to the landlords on Oct. 10, 1945, is in these terms:

“Subject to the conditions hereafter set out licence is hereby granted for the construction of twenty-seven self-contained flats at 139-165, Beaufort Park, N.W.11, at a total cost not exceeding £815 per flat . . . Conditions. Special conditions or limitations: The work to be carried out by Messrs. George Reed & Sons, Ltd., of Estate Office, Beaufort Drive, N.W.11, and no other contractor may be employed without special permission.”

No other conditions are imposed (except some printed conditions, at the back of the licence, which do not affect this point), and there is no reference to any rent or price, other than that the cost is not to exceed £815 per flat.

The Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, had not been passed when that licence was granted. It was not passed until December, 1945. If it had been passed, the licensing authority would, no doubt, have thought it necessary to limit the rent at which the flats could be let, as s. 7 of that Act deals with the limitation of rent of houses constructed under building licences, and s. 8 (1) provides:

"Where a building licence has been granted, whether before or after the passing of this Act, subject to any condition limiting the price for which a house may be sold or the rent at which it may be let, s. 15 of the Land Charges Act, 1925, as amended by the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, shall have effect as if the condition were a local land charge acquired by the local authority in the area of which the house is situated, and it shall be the duty of the proper officer of the local authority to register the condition accordingly."

By a letter, dated Mar. 5, 1946, the town clerk informed the landlords that he proposed to register the condition attached to the licence, viz., that the flats should not be let at a rent of more than £220 per annum, as a land charge under the Land Charges Act, 1925, in accordance with s. 8 of the Act of 1945, and the following entry was made in the register of local land charges:

"Conditions attached to a building licence issued on Oct. 19, 1945, in accordance with Defence (General) Regulations which, under s. 8 of the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, are required to be registered as a land charge whereby the maximum rent permitted to be charged in respect of this property was fixed at £220 per annum."

No such condition had, however, been attached to the licence. Counsel for the plaintiffs contends that we have to read the application for the licence and the licence as one document. I find it very difficult to give effect to that contention, because, according to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth (1), with which, if I may say so, I whole-heartedly agree, a licence granted for the purposes of reg. 56A of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, must be contained in a document. Supposing there had been a prosecution for a breach of this condition of the licence, the summons would have had to be dismissed as soon as the licence was examined, because there is no condition attached to it. It is true that the application for the licence contains a statement by the landlords that they intend to erect a building which is to include flats to be let at rents varying from £185 to £220. The local authority could have put some condition in the licence with regard to the maximum rent that could be charged, but they did not do so, and, therefore, there was no condition attached to the building of these flats, except the condition that a certain firm of builders, and no others, should be employed, and the printed conditions on the back of the licence, which are not relevant.

Counsel for the landlords contends, however, that the registration under the Land Charges Act, 1925, limits the rent, but I think that counsel for the tribunal provided a complete answer to that contention. Section 1 (7) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, provides:

"No application shall be made under this section in respect of any house . . . (b) while any limitation of the rent is in force, being a limitation imposed by or under any enactment not contained in the [Rent Restrictions] Acts or this Act."

No limitation has been imposed in this case under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A, or under the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945. The Land Charges Act, 1925, is simply an Act under which charges, or other matters which are for the purpose of that Act considered as charges, are entered in a register, so that intending purchasers, among whom intending tenants are included, may know what provisions, conditions or restrictions affect the land. It is a beneficial Act enabling prospective purchasers of land to which there is a registered title to inspect the title and find in the register any charges, be they mortgages or restrictive covenants, which affect the land. Anyone who had inspected this register would have seen that it contained a statement that there was a limitation imposed, not by the Land Charges Act, but by the building licence, but that statement is wrong, and steps may have to be taken to have this entry vacated. It is not the Land Charges Act, however, which imposes the limitation on the rent, and the entry does not purport to be imposing a limitation on the rent. It purports to record that there is in existence a building licence which contains these conditions. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the tribunal have jurisdiction to entertain this reference. They considered that they had jurisdiction because, when they looked at the building licence, they saw that there was no condition attached, and I think that that is the right view. The Land Charges Act, 1925, does not attach a condition. It merely records a condition.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

FINNEMORE, J.: I agree. I think the whole point is whether the licence contains any restriction. It is plain that it does not, but counsel for the landlords has argued that we ought to read the application for the licence as though it was part of the licence. That seems to be quite wrong because, if proceedings had been taken against the landlords for charging a rent higher than that stated in the condition to their licence, they would merely have produced their licence and said: "There is no condition about the rents." It could not have been said: "You suggested in your application that you would limit the rent to £220." The landlords would be entitled to reply: "There was no limitation or condition in my licence, whether by inadvertence or design, matters not." There was no limitation here, and I agree that the application fails.

Motion refused.

Re OAKES (deceased). PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), October 12, 1950.]

Estate Duty—Property deemed to pass—Money received under policy of assurance—“Effected” by deceased—“Wholly kept up . . . for . . . a donee”—Payment of initial premiums by third party—Commutation of premiums—Policy for the benefit of donee and the deceased—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (c. 7), s. 11 (1)—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 2 (1) (c).

In 1904 the deceased took out three policies of assurance on his life, expressed to be for the benefit of his wife under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 11, in the event of his wife's surviving him, but for his own benefit if his wife did not survive him. The first two premiums on the policies were paid, not by the deceased, but by his wife's father. Thereafter, the deceased paid the annual premiums until 1919, when he paid a lump sum in lieu of future annual premiums, thus converting the policies into fully paid policies. In 1920 the deceased and his wife, who were between them entitled to the whole beneficial interest in the policies, settled them by a voluntary settlement for the benefit of their issue. In 1948 the deceased died, leaving his wife him surviving, and the Crown claimed estate duty in respect of the proportion of the policy moneys equivalent to the proportion of the premiums paid by the deceased, under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), which incorporates the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, as amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11 (1). By s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1889 the charge imposed by s. 38 (2) of the Act of 1881 was extended to "... money received under a policy of assurance effected by any person ... on his life, where the policy is wholly kept up by him for the benefit of a donee, whether nominee or assignee, or a part of such money in proportion to the premiums paid by him, where the policy is partially kept up by him for such benefit."

HELD: (i) the policies were "effected" within s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1889 by the deceased and not by the wife's father.

(ii) the policies were "kept up" notwithstanding that no premium was paid after 1919, because those words required only that moneys, whenever payable, should be paid for the purpose of keeping the policies on foot, and the final payment made in 1919, as a composition for all future premiums, was the payment of a premium for the purposes of s. 11 (1).

(iii) although the deceased was beneficially interested in the policies as well as his wife, they were "wholly kept up" by the deceased "for the benefit of a donee" within the meaning of s. 11 (1), the word "wholly" relating solely to the payment of the premiums and not to the beneficial interest of the donee.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS under the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, s. 3, to determine the liability to estate duty of moneys payable under policies of life assurance effected on the deceased's life. The claim was made by the Crown both under s. 2 (1) (c) and under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894, but the claim under the latter paragraph was abandoned. The Crown also made a claim for succession duty, but that claim was settled by agreement between the parties.

ROMER, J.: This is an application the object of which is to obtain the decision of the court on the liability, and the extent of the liability, of the estate of Montagu Percy Rowland Oakes to estate duty on certain policy moneys which became payable by reason of his death, which took place on Sept. 2, 1948. The summons also raised the question as to liability to succession duty, but, as I understand it, since the summons was issued the Crown have taken up an attitude on that matter which is acceptable to the plaintiff, and, accordingly, it has ceased to be relevant for discussion.

A Mr. Oakes, whom I will hereafter refer to as "the deceased", effected three separate policies of assurance with the Law Life Assurance Society, each dated Dec. 10, 1904, on his life, for the sums of £2,000, £2,000 and £3,100 respectively, with profits, in consideration of twenty-five annual payments of £74, £74 and £114 14s. respectively, under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 11, for the benefit of Ellen Winifred Louise Oakes, née Cawston, his wife, in the event, and in the event only, of her surviving him. In the event of her not surviving him, the benefit of the policies would be vested in the deceased himself. The policies then contained certain privileges to which I need not refer, including the right in certain events to convert the policies into fully paid up policies. On Feb. 27, 1919, the policies for £2,000 were converted into fully paid up policies and declared to be exempt from payment of any future premiums, in consideration of the payment of £558 8s. 11d. in respect of each policy, and B in consideration of £860 18s. 10d. paid on the same date the policy for £3,100 was similarly converted into a fully paid up policy. Those payments were made by the deceased. The first two annual premiums on each of the three policies had, however, been paid by the wife's father. There was, apparently, some uncertainty as to who paid the premiums which became payable from C 1906 to 1908 inclusive, but the Crown are prepared to approach the matter on the footing that they were not paid by the deceased. The wife's father, in so far as it is material, died on Dec. 27, 1918.

The policies having been converted into fully paid up policies, the deceased and his wife executed a voluntary settlement on July 21, 1920, and, "as D beneficial owners according to their respective interests," they assigned to the trustee the said three several policies of assurance on certain trusts for the benefit of their daughters and their daughters' issue. The wife survived the deceased, and she is, so far as I am aware, still living. The sum of £20,830 was paid on the death of the deceased in respect of the sums assured by the said three policies, including bonuses. The estimated rate of estate duty payable on the property forming the estate of the deceased and property in which he E had a life interest, and also in respect of the said policy moneys or the limited interests therein so far as liable thereto, is approximately forty per cent., so that the amount involved in this question of estate duty is of some importance to the estate of the deceased. The wife's father was, until some years before his death, possessed of considerable wealth and would normally be described as a wealthy man, but at a date subsequent to 1909 he got into financial F difficulties. The deceased was an officer of comparatively junior rank in His Majesty's Army, and was at first entitled only to his military pay, without being possessed of any other income, but at some time after 1908 he became entitled in possession to additional income or property.

G The Crown say that estate duty is payable in respect of a proportion of the policy moneys which is equivalent to the proportion of the total premiums paid in keeping up the policies which was paid by the deceased. The claim is founded on the latter part of s. 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, which, among other things, amends the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38 (2). The words in s. 11 (1) on which the question depends are:

H "The charge under the said section shall extend to money received under a policy of assurance effected by any person dying on or after June 1, 1889, on his life, where the policy is wholly kept up by him for the benefit of a donee, whether nominee or assignee, or a part of such money in proportion to the premiums paid by him, where the policy is partially kept up by him for such benefit."

The argument on behalf of the plaintiff, representing the estate, is that that taxing provision does not apply to the present case. In the first place, it is said that, having regard to the fact that the wife's father paid the first two premiums, it cannot be said of the deceased that he was the person who

"effected" the policy of assurance. It is said that, although it was the deceased who applied for the policy and presumably filled up the necessary form for obtaining it, nevertheless the payment of the first premium was an essential ingredient to the obtaining of the policy, and, accordingly, the policy was "effected" at least as much by the father-in-law as it was effected by the deceased, and so it is said that, in limine, the provision is not applicable to the facts of this case. I am unable to accept that view of the matter. It seems to me that the mere fact that the father-in-law in this case, who was a wealthy man and whose daughter was marrying a comparatively impecunious officer in the army, promised to pay, and did pay, the first two premiums on this policy, which, after all, had been taken out for the benefit of his daughter, does not come within a long way of resulting in his "effecting" the policy. The policy was, to my mind, undoubtedly "effected" by the husband, viz., the deceased, and the fact that his father-in-law was generous enough, or thought it proper, to pay the first two premiums is an irrelevant factor for consideration. In my judgment, it is clear that these policies were effected by the deceased. A B

On that view of the matter, one has to consider the further language of this taxing provision. Counsel for the plaintiff said that the policy was not "kept up" between 1919 and 1948 by the deceased at all, first, since one cannot "keep up" a policy which no longer requires to be kept up because it is a fully paid up policy, and, secondly, because, if it was kept up by anybody, it was kept up, not by the deceased but by the deceased and his wife, who executed a settlement of these policies and dedicated them to a certain trust. Counsel agrees that in 1919 the deceased made a payment to convert these policies into fully paid up policies, but he says that that did not amount to a keeping up, which involves the payment of annual or periodical premiums. I do not think that matter is of any significance, and, indeed, I do not understand the argument except on the footing that, unless you can say of a policy that the premiums are payable for the purpose of keeping it up until the policy matures and the time arrives for payment, such a policy is outside the provisions. That is putting a construction on those words which I do not think they bear. There is nothing in the words about keeping up down to the date of maturity, but the reference is to moneys which, whenever payable, are paid for the purpose of keeping the policy on foot. Therefore, I do not think that any weight can be attached to that argument. C D E

Counsel for the trustee further said that the wife was not a "donee" for whose benefit the policy was kept up. He said, and said rightly, that the wife, although a beneficiary, was a contingent beneficiary only, and that, in so far as the policy was kept up at all at the instance of the deceased, it was kept up just as much for his own benefit as for hers, because he would be entitled to the policy moneys if he survived his wife, and, accordingly, although the wife was a donee within the meaning of the words as used in this provision, which expressly include in that meaning nominees or assignees, nevertheless the policy was not wholly kept up by the deceased for her benefit. I think it forms a necessary part of the argument which was addressed to me by counsel for the plaintiff on that point that you have got to read this section as though it said: "Where the policy is wholly kept up by him wholly for the benefit of the donee." Indeed, I think counsel would be inclined to read these words as though "wholly" was transferred from the position which it in fact occupies to a position a few words later on, so that it would control, not only the payments of premiums, but also the beneficial interest, and, of course, that is not so. The word "wholly" is related solely to the payment of the premiums, and not to the beneficial interest of the donee. F G H

However, it is a fact that the husband was at all material times until the settlement in possession of a contingent beneficiary interest, and, accordingly, it remains open to the argument that the payments were made, not exclusively for the benefit of the wife, but for the benefit of them both.

A In my view of the matter, the wife, who was, undoubtedly, a donee for the purpose of this provision, was a person for whose benefit the policy was kept up. It seems to me that where you find a wife who is a nominee of a policy taken out under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and moneys are then paid by the husband to keep the policy on foot, she is, undoubtedly, a donee for whose benefit the policy is kept up. It may be that the proper date for inquiring who is the donee may be, for the purpose of the provision, the date when the policy moneys became payable, and, if one applies that test, it is clear that at the date when the policy moneys became payable, if it had not been for the settlement, the wife would have been the person who would have been the donee, because she had survived the husband. Accordingly, I do not think that the mere fact that the husband himself had a contingent beneficial interest in these policies between 1904 and 1920 prevents, or displaces, the view that the wife, for whose benefit primarily these policies were taken out, is to be regarded as a donee for the purpose of this section, and, therefore, I hold that she was, and that payments were made for her benefit, although not exclusively for her benefit.

B There is a further point, and this is an alternative way of putting the case on behalf of the estate—that, in any case, assuming that the taxing provisions applied before, the sums which were paid to convert the policies into fully paid policies in 1919 are not “premiums” for the purposes of the section. It is said that the only premiums which can come within the purview and scope of the provision are annual or other periodical payments which have to be made to keep the policy alive, and that that cannot be said of these payments, which were made, as it is said, not to keep the policy alive, but to establish it once and for all.

D I was referred to one passage in the speech of LORD WRIGHT in Barclays Bank, Ltd. v. A.-G. (1). That case was a totally different case from the present matter because there a settlor assigned two policies of assurance which he had effected on his own life to trustees for the benefit of his son and others together with certain investments. He also assigned certain investments to the trustees, and it was the income of those investments that the trustees were directed to use in order to pay the premiums on the policies. On the settlor's death the Crown claimed estate duty on the amount of the policy moneys which had been paid to the trustees of the settlements, it being contended that the policies had been “wholly kept up” by the settlor, “for the benefit of a donee” within the meaning of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11 (1). The House of Lords held that the policies were not “wholly kept up” by the settlor after the date of the settlements within the meaning of that sub-section, and that, therefore, estate duty was not payable. In the course of his speech, LORD WRIGHT said ([1944] A.C. 379):

E “I think that ‘keeping up’ a policy according to the ordinary use of language connotes payment of the premiums, which is the normal method of keeping up a policy. This generally involves periodical payments, and, though a single premium policy is not unknown, that would have the effect not so much of keeping up a policy as establishing its operation once and for all. The Act did not, apparently, contemplate this contingency, but, however that may be, the insertion of the words ‘in proportion to the premiums paid by him’ is necessary to deal with the case where the deceased did not himself wholly keep up the policy but only did so partially.”

H Counsel for the plaintiff relied, I think, on that part of the speech of LORD WRIGHT in support of the view that nothing can be regarded as a premium for the purpose of this provision of the Act of 1889 unless it is an ordinary annual or other periodically recurring payment made for the purpose of keeping the policy on foot. I think that that argument overlooks the true nature and effect of what was done in 1919. These policies required annual premiums over a period of twenty-five years, and a certain number of those years still remained outstanding when this transaction was effected, but in fact all that it amounted to was that the deceased paid these lump sums in composition of those future outstanding annual premiums. It seems to me to be a remarkable conclusion if, notwithstanding that that was the effect of the payments, and notwithstanding that, if the premiums themselves had continued to be paid by the deceased until his death, the section would have been attracted, nevertheless it is not attracted because the premiums were paid in advance by one lump sum. Counsel for the Crown pointed to the fallacy of the plaintiff's argument on this point by illustrating the case of a policy which provides for payment of a comparatively small annual premium for a period of fifteen years, and then for the payment of a very much larger and final premium in the sixteenth year, and he said that it could hardly be suggested that the payment of the fifteen small sums was to be regarded as the payment of premiums, but that the larger payment, the final payment, was not a payment of premium. I think that clearly, in that case, the final payment would be a payment of a premium, just as much as the earlier ones.

So, in the present case, I come to the conclusion without any great hesitation that the payments made in 1919, which were merely pre-payments of future premiums, are to be regarded on the same lines as the payment of the annual premiums had they been paid. Therefore, it seems to me that all the points on which the objection to the payment of estate duty is founded fail, and that, accordingly, liability to estate duty is attracted under the provisions of this part of the section that I have read. There is no difficulty in applying the result of the conclusions which I have reached, because the position was stated by ROWLATT, J., in A.-G. v. Meech (2), and commented on favourably by LORD MACMILLAN in Lord Advocate v. Inzievar Estates (3). There LORD MACMILLAN, in dealing with the case then before the House, said ([1938] A.C. 413):

"Of the eleven premiums paid during that period in the present case the deceased paid four and the donees paid seven—that is to say, the deceased paid four elevenths and the respondents paid seven elevenths of the premiums falling due during that period. It follows, in my opinion, that the part of the proceeds of the policy which is proportionate to the premiums paid by the deceased within the meaning of the statute is four elevenths. I am fortified in this reading of the sub-section by the fact that it also commended itself to ROWLATT, J., who in the case of A.-G. v. Meech (2), said of the sub-section: 'I think it simply means that, where after the assignment what has kept up the policies has been provided partly by the assignor and partly by the assignee, the policy moneys are to be subject to and escape duty in the same proportion'."

That is the principle which I think should be applied in the present case.

Declaration accordingly. The defendant's costs as between party and party and the plaintiff's costs as between solicitor and client to be taxed and paid out of the policy moneys.

NOTE.

CRYSTAL PALACE TRUSTEES v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), October 5, 6, 1950.]

A Charity—Town and country planning—Benefit to community—Promotion of industry, commerce and art.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for a declaration that the Crystal Palace and Park were and are held, by virtue of the Crystal Palace Act, 1914, on charitable trusts or for other charitable purposes within the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 85 (1). The Crystal Palace Trustees were a body constituted by the Crystal Palace Act, 1914, s. 4, to acquire the Crystal Palace and grounds, and to hold and manage the same as a place of public resort and recreation and for other purposes including education and “the promotion of industry, commerce and art.” The councils of certain counties and other local authorities were empowered, by s. 19 of the Act, to contribute “towards the purposes of this Act,” and sched. I contained a list of local authorities and private individuals who had contributed.

C The trustees constituted by the Act were, to a large extent, representatives of contributing public authorities. The rents and income from investments received by the trustees had been admitted by the Inland Revenue Commissioners to be exempt from income tax under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 37, as being vested in trustees for, and only applied to, charitable purposes, but the Minister of Town and Country Planning decided that the land owned by the trustees was

D not land “an interest in which is held on charitable trusts or for ecclesiastical or other charitable purposes of any description” within the meaning of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 85 (1), on the ground that the promotion of industry, commerce and art were not charitable purposes.

G Denys B. Buckley for the Minister of Town and Country Planning.

DANCKWERTS, J., having recited the facts and referred to the relevant provisions of the Crystal Palace Act, 1914, continued: Counsel for the Minister placed reliance on Re Ogden (1), in which a bequest in a will of a fund to be used “... to encourage artistic pursuits or assist needy students in art” was held not to be a charitable gift. Counsel argued that the promotion of art meant the promotion of the interests or activities of artists rather than the benefit of the public at large. This does not seem to me to be the true meaning of the phrase. Re Ogden (1) is very inadequately reported, and it is impossible to ascertain properly the reasons which induced the Court of Appeal to reach the conclusion to which they came in that case. The decision was not favourably regarded by the Court of Appeal in Royal Choral Society v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), and though the Court of Appeal in the latter case based their decision, to some extent, on the educational effect of the society’s activities, it appears that the Court of Appeal regarded the promotion of the arts as a purpose which was for the benefit of the public at large and of a charitable nature. I do not find any real difficulty in reaching the conclusion that, so far as the objects of the trustees in the present case involve the promotion of art, they are not other than charitable. Some assistance is, I think, to be obtained from the apparent recognition by the legislature in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, s. 7, that the promotion of art is charitable, but it is not, in my view, necessary to rely only on that factor.

As regards the promotion of industry and commerce, the position is more uncertain, and I do not think that the Minister was unreasonable if he felt difficulty in finding such purposes to be charitable. Counsel for the trustees relied strongly on Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Yorkshire Agricultural Society (3). This society's objects were the holding of an annual agricultural show and the promotion of agriculture. The claim of the society to exemption from income tax was resisted mainly on the ground that, by reason of certain privileges which the members of the society possessed, the objects of the society were for the benefit of the members rather than the public welfare by the improvement of agriculture. The society was held to be entitled to exemption, and I think it is clear that the Court of Appeal regarded the improvement of agriculture, or the promotion or advancement of the industry of agriculture, as a charitable purpose. Counsel for the trustees claimed that this was, therefore, a decision that the promotion of a particular industry was a charitable purpose, and that, accordingly, the promotion of industry or commerce at large must be a charitable purpose. Counsel for the Minister argued, however, that the promotion of industry or commerce amounted to no more than the promotion of the interests of those engaged in the manufacture and sale of their particular products and was not in any way concerned with any benefit to the public at large, and so could not be charitable. He argued, further, that the ambit of the objects of the trustees in the present case, as expressed in s. 14 of their Act, was so wide that they would be entitled to expend money or effort in the promotion or advancement of political theories or purposes, which would be quite outside the limits of charitable activities. He relied, in particular, on the extensive nature of the powers contained in s. 14, and especially sub-s. (8), which, he contended, enabled the trustees to do whatever they thought fit, according to their judgment or opinion. In support of this proposition, he relied on the observations of COHEN, L.J., in Oxford Group v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4).

As regards this last argument, it appears to me that the position in the Oxford Group case (4) was very different from that with which I have to deal, as the powers in that case were held to be independent objects, and, in my view, the powers conferred by the sub-sections of s. 14 in the present case are not objects in themselves, but are simply powers which are ancillary to and for the purpose of carrying out the objects expressed in the opening provision of the section. As regards the construction which counsel for the Minister sought to put on the words "the promotion of industry and commerce," in my view, such a construction is contrary to the whole purpose of the Act and the creation of the statutory corporation represented by the trustees. I am entitled, where the terms of the trusts are not clear, to have regard to the surrounding circumstances, including the nature of the trustees: see Farley v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (5) [1938] Ch. 494, 495. I find, on perusing the provisions of the Crystal Palace Act, 1914, that the body of trustees constituted by the Act are, to a large extent, trustees representative of the public authorities who contributed to the moneys required for the acquisition of the property to be administered by the trustees as a concern which would not distribute any profits, and in the title and preamble of, and throughout, the Act, the note which is stressed is the provision of benefits to the public.

In those circumstances it seems to me that the intention of the Act in including in the objects the promotion of industry, commerce and art, is the benefit of the public, that is, the community, and is not the furtherance by the trustees of the interests of individuals engaging in trade or industry. It appears to me that the promotion of industry or commerce in general in such circumstances is a public purpose of a charitable nature within the fourth class in the enumeration of charitable purposes contained in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (6) ([1891] A.C. 583). Therefore, while I appreciate the doubts which the Minister has felt as to the wholly charitable nature of the trustees, I think that he came to the wrong conclusion, and that the Inland Revenue Commissioners came to the right conclusion.

Declaration accordingly. The Minister to pay the costs of the trustees as between party and party.

BIGGIN AND CO., LTD. AND ANOTHER v. PERMANITE, LTD ; BERRY WIGGINS & CO., LTD., THIRD PARTIES.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), June 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, July 3, 4, 5, 28, 1950.]

D Damages—Measure of damages—Foreseeable consequence of breach of contract—Series of contracts—Plaintiffs compromising claim by ultimate purchaser—Liability of original vendor to plaintiffs—Warranties added to succeeding contracts.

In February, 1945, the Royal Netherlands government asked the plaintiffs to supply an adhesive for use with certain roofing felt. The plaintiffs passed the inquiry to the defendants, who ordered the material from the third parties. Deliveries of the material, which was called Permasec, began in April, 1945, and in the winter of 1945 substantial amounts were applied by contractors to whom it was supplied by the Dutch government. In April, 1946, the Permasec which had been applied began to drip and run, or "creep," and claims were made on the government. The government asked the plaintiffs and the defendants to take back 1,400 tons of Permasec which had not been used, but they refused. Subsequently, the government having withheld payment of £55,000 due to the plaintiffs, it was arranged to refer to arbitration the question of the plaintiffs' liability to the government, but, on the first day of the hearing, the plaintiffs settled the dispute by accepting liability to the extent of £43,000 and costs. The plaintiffs claimed those amounts from the defendants, together with the plaintiffs' own costs of the arbitration, and the defendants made similar claims against the third parties. The court found that the defendants were in breach of one or more of the conditions of their contract with the plaintiffs under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 13 and s. 14, and that the third parties were in breach of their contract with the defendants in that there was a substantial defect in the Permasec so that it did not conform to the description by which it was sold. On the question of damages, HELD: (i) the compromise arranged between the plaintiffs and the government was not a foreseeable consequence of a breach of their contract by the defendants or a consequence thereof in the legal sense, but it flowed from the voluntary act of the plaintiffs, and, therefore, it was irrelevant to the issue of damages between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and evidence relating to the compromise was inadmissible.

(ii) in the absence of argument to the contrary, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the amount of the Dutch government's costs of the arbitration payable by the plaintiffs and that of the plaintiffs' own costs of the arbitration as between solicitor and client.

(iii) it being admitted that the plaintiffs' liability to the Dutch government was the proper basis for the assessment of damages, the plaintiffs were liable to the Dutch government in damages in respect of the 1,400 tons of Permasec which were not used and in respect of the cost to the Dutch government of the repairs necessitated by the defects in the Permasec, but

(a) in so far as the claims were based on sub-sales by the government, in order to sustain them it was necessary that the contracts throughout the series of sales from the defendants or third parties to the ultimate purchaser should be the same, and if the variation to a description were such that it was impossible to say whether the injury which ultimately resulted would have flowed from the breach of the original warranty, the parties must be presumed to have put the liability for the injury outside their contemplation as a measure of compensation. The materiality of any variation in the present case would depend on the nature of the damage suffered.

Observation of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Dexters, Ltd. v. Hill Crest Oil Co. (Bradford) ([1926] 1 K.B. 359), applied.

(b) if, by reason of a material variation in the ultimate contract, the physical damage suffered was excluded as a measure of liability, the position was as if the government's transactions with contractors (by way of sub-sales) were excluded, and the plaintiffs would be entitled to adopt as the measure of damages the difference in value of the Permasec due to its defects; where the government had sold the Permasec after the government had acquired knowledge of its defects, the criterion of liability remained the amount of the physical damage suffered by the use of the Permasec, subject to the limitation that the government was under a duty so far as possible to mitigate the damage.

(iv) it could not be accepted that only nominal damages could be recovered where the notional value of the unsound Permasec was relevant and precise evidence thereof could not be produced, but the court must attempt an assessment on the basis of whatever evidence was available.

Dictum of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Chaplin v. Hicks ([1911] 2 K.B. 792), applied.

B ACTION for damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiffs, Biggin & Co., Ltd., and Archibald Bathgate (Building Materials) Ltd., two associated firms, in 1945 were asked to supply the Royal Netherlands government with large quantities of an adhesive for use with roofing felt. The plaintiffs passed the inquiry to the defendants, for whom the third parties manufactured the required material. The Royal Netherlands government re-sold the adhesive to various contractors, who, when it was found to be unsatisfactory, made claims for compensation on the government. The government in turn claimed against the plaintiffs, who settled the claim against them by the payment of £43,000 and certain costs and now claimed damages against the defendants. The defendants claimed to be indemnified by the third parties. The facts appear in the judgment.

Beufus, K.C., and Stenham for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Monckton, K.C., Karmel, K.C., and Beddington for the defendants.

Diplock, K.C., J. C. Leonard and Vick for the third parties.

Barrowclough watched the proceedings on behalf of the Royal Netherlands government.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 28. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. This case concerns 2,500 tons of Permasec, a material intended for use as an adhesive in the laying of felt roofs. In 1944 the Royal Netherlands government (I shall shorten the title by calling it the Dutch government) had to face the prospect of repairing war damage in Holland and providing emergency housing. Through a department in London, called N.O.R.R. and in charge of a Mr. Kraayvanger, they bought considerable quantities of roofing felt from the plaintiffs, who are two associated companies describing themselves as manufacturers and specialists in roofing materials. They acted in this case through Mr. Robinson, a director, and Mr. Trinder, a sales representative. The plaintiffs had bought a good deal of the felt supplied to the Dutch government from the defendants, who describe themselves as roofing contractors and roofing felt manufacturers. Mr. Turney is their general manager. In February, 1945, the Dutch government asked the plaintiffs to supply an adhesive for use with the felt. In ordinary times this would have been a bituminous adhesive, but in 1945 bitumen was scarce, so that it had to be made of fluxed pitch. The Dutch government also wanted it to be an adhesive which could be applied cold because of the shortage of fuel in Holland. The plaintiffs passed the inquiry on to the defendants, and the defendants ordered the material from the third parties, who are manufacturers of specialised products from bitumen and other similar substances. Mr. Church, the sales manager of the third parties' compound department, arranged the sale, and Mr. Licence, their chief technical adviser, was responsible for the preparation of the compound which he called Tensulac No. 5211, but whose name the defendants, who posed as its manufacturers, changed to Permasec. Deliveries began in April, 1945, f.a.s. Miller's Wharf on the Thames. The Dutch government transported the material to Holland and re-sold it to numerous Dutch roofing contractors. The results of the application of Permasec were in many cases unsatisfactory. Most of it was applied in the winter of 1945, and in the warm spring of April, 1946, it began to drip and run—"creep" is the term used in the trade. Outside the buildings it dripped down from the eaves, and it found its way through the roofs and dripped inside the buildings too. The roofs had to be repaired or renewed, and claims were made on the Dutch government. In May, 1946, the government asked the plaintiffs and the defendants to take back 1,400 tons of the stuff which was unused, but they would not. The government withheld £55,000 which they owed the plaintiffs for roofing felt. The government would not allow themselves to be sued in the English courts, but they agreed to arbitrate in England. In January, 1949, on the day the hearing of the arbitration began, the plaintiffs, on the advice of their counsel, settled the dispute by allowing the government approximately £43,000 for their claim and paying their costs. The plaintiffs now claim from the defendants these sums, together with their own costs of the arbitration, as damages for breach of contract, and the defendants make similar claims against the third parties.

There is no doubt that the Permasec "crept" seriously. In the course of the trial numerous reasons for the "creeping" have been suggested, and they can be grouped under three heads. The first head covers alleged defects in the composition of the material which made it inherently unsuitable for its purpose. The second and third heads cover alleged misuse of the material, that is to say, its use for a purpose or in a manner for which it was not designed. I have divided the second from the third head according to whether the misuse was innocent or culpable. Under the second head it occurred because the Dutch contractors had not been told, and were not to know, of the peculiarities and limitations of the material. The main question there is to assign the responsibility for the failure to instruct the contractors properly. The third head covers matters of improper workmanship and breaches of the instructions which were given to the contractors. [HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence and found that when Permasec was used as a top dressing the cause of the "creeping" was that it was not fit for the purpose, for which it was not designed. When it was used as an adhesive, the cause of the "creeping" was threefold—the low temperature at which the compound softened, its incompatibility with bituminous felt, and the insufficient time allowed for drying before application of the felt, none of the Dutch contractors having allowed the prescribed drying time of thirty to sixty minutes. As regards the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, HIS LORDSHIP found that it was a term thereof that the adhesive should be suitable for use with pitch felt and bituminous felt. The Permasec did not correspond with its description, and, having regard to the impracticability of the long drying time in Holland, the adhesive could probably not be described as an efficient adhesive, and it was certainly not fit for the purpose for which it was required. As between the plaintiffs and the defendants, one or other of the conditions under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 13 and s. 14, had not been fulfilled. As between the defendants and the third parties, there was a sale by description, and HIS LORDSHIP was satisfied that the material did not comply with the description, and that the defect in the compound was substantial, which was enough to constitute a breach of contract. HIS LORDSHIP continued:—] It is not suggested that the third parties have any responsibility for the incompatibility with bitumen felt, and so the sum of the matter is that neither the defendants nor the third parties are responsible for the failure of Permasec as a top dressing; that in respect of its use as an adhesive the defendants broke their contract with the plaintiffs in respect of all the three factors which contributed to "creeping"; and that the third parties broke their contract with the defendants in respect of one only of the three factors.

I arrive now at the issue of damages, and the first point I have to consider is whether, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, at any rate, it can be disposed of simply by saying that it is the sum of £43,000 odd which the plaintiffs, on the advice of counsel, paid to the Dutch government. In my judgment, the general rule is that a defendant who is required to indemnify a plaintiff against his liability to a third party is entitled to have the existence and precise extent of that liability proved against him in proceedings to which he is a party.

A That does not mean that a plaintiff may not compromise with his adversary save at the risk of losing his indemnity or at the cost of offering the defendant a choice between the compromise or the proof. A plaintiff acts in such a matter at his own risk and for his own benefit. If he compromises erroneously where there is no liability, he cannot make the defendant pay for his error. If he compromises successfully, he will be that much in pocket. It is true that if the B defendant pays him more than the compromise, the plaintiff will be paid more than he has lost. But that is a thing which is bound to happen whenever the nature of the indemnity is precisely defined, and the area of its operation consequently circumscribed, and an event takes place outside that area. One need only take the present case a step further back. If the plaintiffs' sub-sale to the Dutch government was not a matter within the contemplation of the C parties, any profit or loss the plaintiffs made on it would be their own.

"... unless the seller contemplates the possibility of a sub-contract under which a claim may be made on the buyer, the sub-contract must be disregarded for the purpose either of increasing or diminishing the damages. This was one of the many instances in English law where the measure of damage did not give the real loss suffered by the party":

D see Finlay (James) & Co. v. N. V. Kwik Hoo Tong H.M. (1), per SCRUTTON, L.J., ([1929] 1 K.B. 411), where also the earlier authorities are cited.

Of course, an indemnity can be what the parties choose to make it, and any general rule is subject to that. A policy of insurance often indemnifies a man against sums he may be adjudged liable to pay, and sometimes against those E which he may pay on the advice of competent counsel. (Incidentally, the latter indemnity is usually only to be found in special circumstances where an assured's reputation might suffer from litigation, and then it is expressly stated. It would be curious if an assured without the aid of express words could arrive at the same result by saying that he was entitled to compromise on the advice of counsel anyway.)

F To determine the matter in principle, it is, therefore, necessary to consider the extent of the indemnity which the law grants by way of damages for breach of contract. The indemnity covers all those matters which the defendant as a reasonable man ought to have foreseen might well result from the breach. It is not disputed that the defendant ought to have foreseen a claim by the Dutch government, but the claim, when it comes within the area of the indemnity, G does not bring with it as a matter of course all that may appertain to the handling of it. Thus, in Hammond & Co. v. Bussey (2) it was not disputed that the plaintiff could recover from the defendant the damages he had paid to a third party, and the question was whether he could recover the costs he had incurred in the unsuccessful defence of the action brought by the third party. The H Court of Appeal had to consider whether the probability of such costs having to be incurred was a matter which must have been within the contemplation of the parties, and they held that on the facts of the case it must. I, therefore, have to determine whether the defendants should have regarded it as a serious possibility that one of the consequences of their breach would be that the plaintiffs would compromise the claim. Was the compromise a foreseeable consequence of the making of the claim? In my judgment, it was not a consequence in the legal sense at all. It flowed from the voluntary act of the plaintiffs.

When a claim is made, the respondent to it is bound to choose between admitting and disputing it. If his choice to dispute it is reasonable, the costs of so doing necessarily flow from the making of the claim. But, having chosen to dispute it, he is not bound to make a further choice between compromising and litigating. It is argued that the plaintiffs were under a duty to mitigate their damages, and were, therefore, not at liberty to reject a reasonable opportunity of compromise. If, it is said, they had continued to fight and more than the £43,000 had been awarded against them, they could not have recovered the excess from the defendants. This is putting the same point in another way, for the test of its validity is the same, namely, whether the compromise was a consequence of the breach. In Williams Bros. v. Ed. T. Agius, Ltd. (3) VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., referred ([1914] A.C. 520) to British Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. Underground Electric Rys. Co. of London, Ltd. (4) as showing "... that a subsequent transaction, if it is to be taken into account in mitigating damages, must be one which arises out of transactions naturally attributable to the consequence of the breach, and must not be of an independent character."

Apart from this, there is not, in my judgment, any duty to mitigate in the manner suggested. A man always has the right to have any liability alleged against him, the existence or extent of which is doubtful, determined according to law, and he cannot be under any duty which impairs that right. Certainly, he can be under no duty to compromise a claim before all the relevant facts have been ascertained. Counsel for the plaintiffs conceded that, if an award had been made by the arbitrator after complete investigation of the whole issue, it would be no more than prima facie evidence of the amount recoverable by the plaintiffs. If this is right (and I need not decide whether it is even prima facie evidence), it is hard to see why the opinion of a counsel whom the defendant has not retained, given before the claim has even been precisely formulated, should be conclusive evidence of the amount which the plaintiffs can recover.

For these reasons, I hold as a matter of principle that the making of a compromise between the plaintiffs and the Dutch government is irrelevant to the issue of damages between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and I do not feel that I need do more than canvass quite generally a number of practical considerations which were discussed in the course of the argument, and which I think would defeat the working of any rule based on the plaintiffs' submission.

It is conceded that counsel's views on the facts and law on which the existence of liability is based are irrelevant, and that that is a matter for the court. Why as a matter of logic are his views on the facts and the law relating to the extent of liability any different? What happens if the court thinks that nominal damages only have been proved? Is it permissible to investigate the chain of counsel's reasoning to see if it contains any error? Would an incorrect appreciation of the facts be a fatal error, or must it be an error of law? If in the case of a large number of items counsel has erroneously included one, does that invalidate altogether a settlement for a global sum? And so on. The point is not, I think, improved by the alternative submission that the settlement made must be reasonable. If this means that the sum paid must be the reasonable value of the claim when all the material facts are taken into consideration, it can only be that which the court would itself have awarded, and the inquiry is neither shortened nor affected by the advice of counsel. Therefore, it is contended that reasonableness must be judged as at the time of the settlement and on the information then available. This means that instead of weighing the true facts the court would have to weigh only those, however incomplete and erroneous, which were known to counsel. What standard of reasonableness can be applied to that? Whether to snatch boldly at a tempting offer which may not be repeated when all the facts are known or to insist more cautiously on fuller information, whether to fight or to compromise, these are matters governed more by temperament than by reason. The man who buys shares on the stock exchange in the belief that they will go up is acting quite as reasonably as the man who sells the same shares in the belief that they will go down. Moreover, as counsel for the defendants pointed out, counsel might have given weight to a number of matters which it would be highly inconvenient to discuss. He might have been influenced by the opinion he had formed of the reliability of witnesses; or, as is likely in the present case, by admissions made in without-prejudice discussions or by other inadmissible matters.

The plaintiffs relied on Fisher v. Val de Travers Asphalte Co. (5), in which it appears that DENMAN, J., left it to the jury to determine whether a compromise was reasonable or not. The decision is not binding on me, and, as there was no discussion of the point I have to decide (it does not appear that the relevance of the question was contested), I have not obtained any guidance from it. Accordingly, I rule that the plaintiffs cannot prove their damages by reference to the settlement which they made with the Dutch government and that evidence relating to such a settlement is irrelevant and inadmissible. I must make it clear that no criticism has been made of the counsel and solicitors who unanimously advised the settlement, nor of the wisdom of their advice. At the time the settlement was made, the immediate subject of the arbitration was the question of liability, and the claim for damages had not been formulated. The plaintiffs' counsel thought, rightly if this judgment is correct, that on the issue of liability they would fail. The advantage to their client of seeking to reach a settlement of the whole dispute before liability was admitted or determined is obvious. The advantage of settling for a sum arrived at on a broad estimate rather than by means of the more exact calculation which the law necessarily requires is also from the business point of view obvious and may become even more apparent when I have expressed my views on the way in which in default of agreement the damages must be assessed. I am, however, concerned, not with the wisdom of the settlement, but only with whether, wise or foolish, it determines the extent of the defendants' liability, and, in my opinion, it does not. So the claim for £43,000 as a lump sum fails.

The statement of claim contains a claim for the costs of the arbitration, both those payable to the Dutch government, which were admitted to be £2,911 and the plaintiffs' own costs of the arbitration as between solicitor and client, which were proved at £3,284 18s. 1d. No argument was addressed to me in opposition to these claims, and, in my judgment, they should be allowed.

I have next to consider a measure of damages alternative to the £43,000 which is raised by an amendment to the statement of claim which I permitted at the trial. Under this alternative the plaintiffs claim that they were liable to pay to the Dutch government damages in respect of breach of contract under two heads. The first head, quantified at £49,300, relates to the loss sustained by the Dutch government in respect of 1,400 tons which were not used. The second head, quantified at £52,270, covers the cost of repairs necessitated by the defects in the Permasec. In case it is not quite clear from the form of pleading, I should say that the plaintiffs do not claim more than the £43,000 odd which they paid to the Dutch government. The figures which I have given are designed to show that the plaintiffs' liability was not less than that sum. It has not been contended that this measure of damages is totally incorrect. The defendants were aware that the plaintiffs proposed to supply the material to the Dutch government under the same description as the defendants were supplying it to the plaintiffs. It is, therefore, admitted that the plaintiffs' liability to the Dutch government is the proper basis for the assessment of damages. This covers the first head in principle, but there is considerable dispute on quantum. The second head is disputed both in law and in fact.

[On the question of quantum under the first head, HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence and assessed the damages at £5 a ton for 1,350 tons, remarking that he had disregarded the possibility that the price of Permasec ultimately obtainable by the Dutch government might have been affected by the action of the Dutch government itself in its control of the market. Dealing with the dispute on the facts under the second head, HIS LORDSHIP said that the plaintiffs were not in a position to prove the terms of the sales by the Dutch government to contractors, whose claims constituted the major part of the damage suffered. If necessary there must be an inquiry. HIS LORDSHIP found, however, that the Dutch government ought to have known by Sept. 30, 1945, that Permasec was impracticable for ordinary use. Allowing time for the notification of contractors, the use of Permasec with insufficient drying time after Oct. 31, 1945, was attributable to the failure of the Dutch government to take the necessary action. HIS LORDSHIP continued :—] I have said that the second head of the Dutch claim is challenged in law as well as in fact. Some of the points of law arise not only between the plaintiffs and defendants, but also between the defendants and third parties. So in this section of my judgment I shall include where convenient reference to the case against the third parties.

The defendants begin with a submission that this head of damage is on the face of it too remote. I cannot accept that. I think that the defendants must be taken to have known that, if the compound were defective, the Dutch government would sustain damage, for which they would hold the plaintiffs responsible, and that such damage might fall under three heads. The government might use this material on their own property; they might use it through their own contracting departments or through agents on other people's property and so be liable to pay them compensation; they might sell or distribute it to independent contractors and so become liable to claims from them. It was contended by the defendants that the chain leading from them to the Dutch contractors, particularly since it involved the intervention of a Bathgate-Biggins contract, was too long. I do not think that the application of the principle is to be determined by the number of links in the chain. If what happened at the end was within the contemplation of the parties, I do not think it matters how long the chain is. I respectfully adopt what was said on this point by BRANSON, J., in Kasler & Cohen v. Slavovski (6) ([1928] 1 K.B. 85).

I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs can now recover from the defendants that which the government could under these heads properly have recovered from them. I shall call damage under these heads physical damage to distinguish it from the market loss or difference in value which is the ordinary measure. There must be further inquiry into the extent of the physical damage and the nature and amount of the claims which the Dutch government could have made. In order to limit as far as possible the collection by the parties of unnecessary material for the inquiry, I shall express my views on certain points of principle that are likely to arise and on which I have heard argument. I shall not, in matters which cannot be determined until after further inquiry, attempt to lay down the law finally as in a declaratory judgment. That is always difficult to do, and especially in this branch of the law where so much depends on the facts of each case. What I say may, therefore, require modification when the facts are known.

The defendants submit that there are two qualifications to the application of the principle I have adopted. The first is that in claims based on sub-sales by the Dutch government, the description of the compound and any warranties of quality must be substantially the same in all the contracts in the chain. It is not disputed that the necessary similarity exists in the contracts between the defendants and the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs and the government respectively. Whether it exists in the contracts between the government and the Dutch contractors cannot be determined until the contracts are produced and, if necessary, the relevant principles of Dutch law ascertained, but it is desirable that I should indicate whether I think the qualification sound, and if so, in what manner it should be applied. The second qualification is that claims arising after the government knew or ought to have known of the defects in the compound should be excluded. On this point I have already found the facts.

A The first qualification depends on the views expressed by BANKES, WARRINGTON and SCRUTTON, L.JJ., in Dexters, Ltd. v. Hill Crest Oil Co. (Bradford) (7). They were all obiter dicta and SCRUTTON, L.J., reserved his final opinion, but a unanimous expression of opinion by three lords justices carries great weight, and in particular the following passage from the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1926] 1 K.B. 359) is often cited:

B “Those cases where there has been a chain of sales and sub-sales often present complications and difficulties, but one point I have always understood as clear—namely, that in order to make a sum recovered for breach of the last contract in the chain the measure of damages for a similar breach of a contract higher up in the chain, it is essential that the contracts along the chain connecting them should be the same. Where, as here, the earlier contracts are for the sale of goods under one description, and that not an
C ordinary trade description, and at some link in the chain the description varies, and becomes a well known trade description, I find it difficult to hold that the amount recovered for a breach of the last contract in the chain can be made the measure of damages for a breach of the first.”

I respectfully adopt this principle, but I have still to determine how it should
D be applied in this case, and also what degree of variation in description breaks the chain. SCRUTTON, L.J., was dealing with a chain of contracts between merchants wherein one might expect the same specification to be used, but a claim for physical damage may be initiated by a person who is not a party to a contract of sale, or, perhaps, to any contract at all—a householder, for example, whose property has been damaged by Permasec. It is not to be expected that
E a builder, when making a contract for repair work, will recite to the householder and incorporate therein all the specifications and warranties which he may receive from his suppliers in respect of all the different materials which he may use on the job. To understand the application of the principle it is necessary to understand its basis. Like every principle in this branch of the law, it stems from the broad rule that the damage is to be measured by those consequences of the F breach which the parties as reasonable men would, if they had thought about it, have foreseen and accepted as natural and probable. If the variation to a description is such that it is impossible to say whether the injury that ultimately results would have flowed from the breach of the original warranty, the parties must as reasonable men be presumed to have put the liability for the injury outside their contemplation as a measure of compensation. If this is, as I believe,
G the nature of the principle, it must be applied very differently according to whether the injury for which the defendant is being asked to pay is a market loss or physical damage. In the former case (which I think is what the lords justices were considering in Dexter v. Hill Crest (7)) any variation that is more than a matter of words is likely to be fatal, because there is no way of telling its effect on the market value. In the latter case the nature of the physical H damage will show whether the variation was material or not. I may illustrate this by a hypothesis taken from the facts of this case. Suppose that all the Dutch government did in their sub-sales was to add to the original warranties given them by the plaintiffs a guarantee that the compound could be used at any time within two years, whereas in fact it was usable only for one year after manufacture. Looked at generally, that is a material addition, but if, in fact, it had been used within one year with injurious results, the additional warranty ought not, I apprehend, to bar the claim. If, however, it were sold with all faults, it would generally be impossible to prove what part of the market loss was due to its known tendency to "creep" and other breaches of the original warranties and what part to its shorter life in breach of the hypothetical warranty. It seems improbable that the Dutch government will in every case have passed on to the Dutch contractors the specification in the same form as received and even more improbable that any implied condition as to quality that there may be in Dutch law will correspond exactly with the statutory conditions in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. I do not think that is necessarily fatal. When the terms of each Dutch contract and the nature of the physical damage is known, I think that the test will be whether the Dutch government could show that the whole of its liabilities to the contractors arose from the failure of the compound to behave as warranted by the plaintiffs.

That is as much as I can say on the point as it affects the plaintiffs and the defendants. The third parties' case on the same point is clear. I think that they can successfully invoke the principle. The third parties in effect warrant the material to be good, except for slight "creepage". The defendants, in effect, pass on the warranty without the exception, and add to it a warranty that the material can be used with bitumen felt and that it needs no unusual or impracticable drying-time. The injury that arises is in two categories—first, repairs have to be done in Holland; secondly, the Dutch government has to dispose of the unused material at a loss. No one can say how far the deficiency in the Permasec which necessitates the repairs is due to the original defect or to the curtailment of the drying-time, or, perhaps, to its incompatibility with bitumen felt. Similarly, even if the difference in value could be ascertained by an actual sale at market price, the lower price would be for the material with all its disadvantages. I hold that the damage sustained by the defendants cannot be measured by their liability to the plaintiffs.

I turn now to the second qualification. It is, I think, clear that in this sort of case a plaintiff cannot pass on his liability to an outside party for bad quality if, before the sale to the outside party, he had notice of the defect in quality: see British Oil & Cake Co., Ltd. v. Burstall & Co. (8), per ROWLATT, J. (39 T.L.R. 407), and Dobell (G. C.) & Co., Ltd. v. Barber & Garratt (9), per LAWRENCE, L.J. ([1931] 1 K.B. 238). It is not so clear whether and in what circumstances a plaintiff ought to examine the goods himself to ascertain if they are defective, but I need not concern myself with that, for the Dutch government had all the data which, had it been properly assembled, would have shown that the compound required an impracticable drying-time. It would not be in accordance with a plaintiff's duty to mitigate his damage that he should in such circumstances sell without qualification. Similarly, if the knowledge of the defects comes to the plaintiff after the sale to the outside party, and if, by passing on that knowledge to the outside party, he can diminish his liability to that party, he is bound to do so. The result is that on the facts that I have found there may be cases in which the plaintiffs cannot set up as the measure of damage the sum payable to the Dutch contractors. Counsel for the plaintiffs contends that in such cases he can recover as damages the difference in value between the contract price and the figure of £6 a ton (at which 1,350 tons were ultimately sold by the Dutch government to a distillery). In other words, he seeks to substitute the ordinary measure of depreciation in value. I presume that he would make a similar contention in respect of the compound (if any) sold under a different warranty if the Dutch claims are excluded under the principle in Dexter v. Hill Crest (7). A question of principle thus arises whether the ordinary measure remains available, and on that I shall express a view.

Damages which arise under the so-called "second rule" in Hadley v. Baxendale (10) are sometimes referred to as if they were an increased sum which the plaintiff could obtain if he could show "special circumstances", or as if the rule embodied a measure of damage specially beneficial to the plaintiff which he could invoke if he fulfilled the necessary conditions. It is, no doubt, true that it generally operates in favour of a plaintiff rather than against him, but I think that it is capable of doing either. I feel, with deference, that the division into two rules of what is in Hadley v. Baxendale (10) a statement of principle in a single sentence has sometimes proved misleading. The re-statement of the relevant principles in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries,

A Ltd. (11) makes it clear that there is only one area of indemnity to be explored, and that is what is within the prevision of the defendant as a reasonable man in the light of the knowledge, actual or imputed, which he has at the time of the contract. It has often been held—I have already referred to the authorities—that the profit actually made on a sub-sale which is outside the contemplation of the parties cannot be used to reduce the damages measured by a notional
B loss in market value. If, however, a sub-sale is within the contemplation of the parties, I think that the damages must be assessed by reference to it, whether the plaintiff likes it or not. Suppose that the only fault in the compound was its incompatibility with bitumen felt, the chance that it might produce bad results would certainly reduce its market value before use. But if it is the plaintiff's liability to the ultimate user that is contemplated as the measure of damage and
C if in fact it is used without injurious results so that no such liability arises, the plaintiff could not claim the difference in market value and say that the sub-sale must be disregarded.

I say this so as to make it clear that, although I have come to the conclusion that, if the plaintiffs' basic claim fails, they can to some extent rely on the alternative of difference in market value, it is not because I think the plaintiffs
D have an option in the matter. The result is brought about in another way. First, if physical damage is excluded as a measure of liability on the principle of Dexter v. Hill Crest (7) the position is the same as if the whole of the government's transactions with outside parties was excluded. The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled, and, indeed, compelled, to prove their damage by some other measure, which would ordinarily be difference in value. In the second class of
E case where the government ought not to have made the sub-sale, the position is, I think, this. Liability for physical damage remains the criterion of loss. All the parties are to be taken as having accepted it as such, and the government cannot by their unilateral act displace it. The plaintiffs cannot claim any relief in respect of any quantity of compound which has not caused physical damage,
F and in cases where physical damage has been caused they must meet the criticism that the government ought to have mitigated it. The course they ought to have taken was to sell the compound with all faults for what it would fetch, and the damage would have been the pecuniary loss they would have suffered, i.e., the difference in value. The plaintiffs cannot, therefore, claim more than that: see Wagstaff v. Short-Horn Dairy Co. (12). But they cannot claim that, if it exceeds
G the physical damage. It is relevant only as matter of mitigation, and if it is shown that the loss that would have occurred, had the government sold with all faults, would have exceeded the claim for physical damage, they have an answer to the criticism that they should have mitigated, but no more. The liability for physical damage remains the primary measure of liability contemplated by the parties. The result is that in respect of compound sold after H Sept. 30 from whose use no physical damage resulted, the plaintiffs can claim nothing. In the case of any quantity from whose use physical damage has resulted, the plaintiffs may obtain (subject to the next point) the cost of making good, etc., or the difference in market value, whichever is the less. The third class of case covers sales made before Sept. 30 where the government after Oct. 31 allowed the continuing use of the compound without warning. The basic measure here is physical damage, but if it can be shown that under Dutch law the claim which the contractor would have had against the government would have been less if the government had given warning, the claim of the government and of the plaintiffs must be diminished accordingly.

The last point of principle to be considered concerns the assessment of the notional value of the unsound Permasec. As between the third parties and the defendants, there is very little to go on. The material was specially compounded for the job, it was passed on by the defendants to the plaintiffs and was never given a fair commercial trial. It is, therefore, very difficult to say what it would have been worth in the defendants' hands if they had known of its inherent defect. Counsel for the third parties has submitted that unless the defendants can offer some reasonably precise evidence of the value of the unsound material, they cannot discharge the burden of proving any substantial damage and so must fail to recover anything more than nominal damages. He submits that there is no such evidence in this case. The same point arises between the defendants and the plaintiffs if I reject, as I do, the submission of counsel for the plaintiffs that the unsound value in 1945 can be taken as the figure which the material fetched on the sale by tender in October, 1946.

It seems to me that one can very rarely arrive at an accurate figure of unsound value. Where the breach is non-delivery, there is often a market price which can be quoted, or evidence can be given of the price at which at the relevant date similar goods were changing hands, but there is rarely any market price for damaged goods, since their value depends on the extent of the damage. If the actual damaged goods are sold with all faults, good evidence can be obtained of the difference in value, but such a sale is not always possible, and a claim for substantial damages cannot be limited to goods which have been sold. Moreover, damage may arise from two sources. Suppose that goods are delivered which are inherently defective in breach of the contract of sale and that they are further damaged by negligent handling in breach of the contract of carriage, and that in their damaged condition they fetch seventy per cent. of their sound value. Is the plaintiff to recover nominal damages only because he cannot prove against either defendant what part of the depreciation in value was due to his acts? It is one thing to say, as I have said, that this is the sort of situation which parties in contemplating the measure of damage would be glad to avoid, and it is another thing to say that it is one which must necessarily result in an injured plaintiff obtaining no satisfaction. I think that in such a situation the court is bound to do the best that it can. It is no more difficult to estimate a plaintiff's loss in such circumstances than it is to estimate the loss of earning power caused by physical disablement. The third parties submit that the latter case is entirely different. I do not think the fundamental principle on which damages are awarded for breach of warranty of quality, namely, that it "is the estimated loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the breach of warranty" is any different in principle. It is only that where precise evidence is obtainable, the court naturally expects to have it. Where it is not, the court must do the best it can. In Chaplin v. Hicks (13) VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said ([1911] 2 K.B. 792):

"In the case of a breach of a contract for the delivery of goods the damages are usually supplied by the fact of there being a market in which similar goods can be immediately bought, and the difference between the contract price and the price given for the substituted goods in the open market is the measure of damages; that rule has been always recognised. Sometimes, however, there is no market for the particular class of goods; but no one has ever suggested that, because there is no market, there are no damages. In such a case the jury must do the best they can, and it may be that the amount of their verdict will really be a matter of guesswork. But the fact that damages cannot be assessed with certainty does not relieve the wrong-doer of the necessity of paying damages for his breach of contract."

FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., said much the same thing (ibid., 795, 796).

A I do not think it would have assisted me much in this case if hypothetical buyers had been found to say what they might have paid in 1945 for a compound which they never saw and of whose defects they have learnt only at second hand. It is a common practice in the commercial world to deal with this type of case by way of a price allowance, and claims for damaged goods are constantly met to the satisfaction of both parties by the fixing of an allowance by an adjuster or some person skilled in the trade. I think that that is a method which can legitimately be followed by the court where no more precise method of calculation presents itself, and, indeed, I should be sorry to think that in the commercial court it was thought preferable to award nominal damages rather than to have resort to it.

B I have to consider in the first place, therefore, what I think the value of the goods would have been—that is, what they would have fetched in Holland if they had been sold in 1945 with all faults. I do not, as I have already indicated, accept the view that no more than £6 per ton would have been obtained. That was the figure paid in October, 1946, when supplies of the Dutch product were much more plentiful and when, I dare say, the urgency for repairs was not so great as in 1945. The compound's main fault was, I think, the length of drying-time or drying-out time required, but that was a matter which, if known, might well have been taken as part of the bargain. Mr. Kramer, the contractor who did most of the work in Holland, although he was aware to some extent of the defects of the material, was willing to give it a trial and in fact bought a large quantity. The tendency to "creep", if known, might have been guarded against by guttering or by taping. The material, if not suitable for the better type of building, might well have been used on outhouses or in temporary repairs where dripping outside was not of the first importance, or it might be used, as it was in fact, mixed with other adhesives. Similarly, its use might be restricted to non-bituminous felt. I dare say that in normal times these defects would render it unmarketable as an adhesive, but these were very abnormal times. Having regard to the very high price which was paid for what was supposed to be sound material, I am satisfied that it would have commanded a respectable price even if sold with its known defects. There were doubtless cases where it was used without any damage, as is shown by the evidence for the defence. The difference in price between its purchase as a sound material by someone who believed in it in October, 1946, and its purchase for distillery use was about fifty per cent.

F I do not take this as more than a very rough guide, but it accords with my view of the sort of discount which the contractors would have demanded and which would have had to be conceded had the true facts been known. I think they might well have paid about half its sound value. I take its sound value to be the average price which it was fetching in the autumn of 1945, namely, £40 a ton, and I assess the depreciation at £20 per ton. This produces, of course, a very different figure from the similar assessment of depreciation in October, 1946.

G It may be that the depreciation should be calculated on the contract quantity as a whole and at the date of delivery. As I have said, this point has not been taken, and, in any event, I think that what may seem to be a rather arbitrary division into two parcels does produce a just result. If I had assessed the depreciation as at the time of delivery, I could not have put the market price as high as £40 per ton. I should have had to have regard to the fact that that price was obtainable for only a limited quantity and that the total quantity of 2,500 tons was more than the market would have absorbed.

I think that I have now said all that I can usefully say on the quantum of damage between the plaintiffs and the defendants until there has been further inquiry into the Dutch claims. The case between the defendants and the third parties is simpler. For reasons which I have already made clear, I think that the right measure of damages is such sum as I consider in all the circumstances to represent the depreciation in the value of the material by reason of its tendency to "creep" in high temperatures. I assess this at fifteen per cent. of the purchase price, and for the sum so calculated there will, therefore, be judgment for the defendants against the third parties.

Order accordingly. No order for costs as between the defendants and the third parties. The plaintiffs were awarded costs against the defendants, apart from the cost of preparing certain bundles of correspondence incurred by the defendants which was ordered to be borne by the plaintiffs. Liberty to apply.

BEADSLEY AND OTHERS v. UNITED STEEL COMPANIES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Singleton and Birkett, L.JJ.), October 11, 12, 1950.]

Factory—Lifting tackle—Tackle of good construction, etc., supplied by employers, but used for wrong purpose by servant—Fellow-servant killed—Liability of employers—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 23 (1) (a).

The workman died from injuries received when a heavy mould, while being lifted to be moved to another part of the factory in which he was employed, came adrift from its fastenings and fell on him. The proper lifting tackle for the moving of moulds was provided by the defendants, the plaintiff's employers, but on the day of the accident the slinger, one E., did not use it, but made use of other gear with the result that the mould was improperly secured and fell out of its fastening when the overhead crane was put into operation. The plaintiffs, the wife and children of the workman, claimed damages on the ground that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 23, which provides: "(1) The following provisions shall be complied with as respects every chain, rope or lifting tackle used for the purpose of raising or lowering persons, goods or materials:—(a) no chain, rope or lifting tackle shall be used unless it is of good construction, sound material, adequate strength and free from patent defect . . ."

HELD: that the defendants were not in breach of their duty under s. 23 (1) (a) because that paragraph only required that they should provide tackle of good construction, sound material, adequate strength, and free from patent defect (which they had done), and it was wrong to read into the section words which would make them liable for an accident if a workman used tackle for an unsuitable purpose.

APPEAL by the defendants from a judgment of ORMEROD, J., delivered at Leeds Assizes on May 4, 1950, awarding damages to the plaintiffs, the widow and children of George Beadsley, a workman employed by the defendants at their factory at Rotherham, Yorkshire, on the ground that the accident causing his death was due to the defendants' breach of their statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 23 (1) (a). A further claim by the plaintiffs that the defendants were also in breach of their common law duty and that this caused the accident was rejected by ORMEROD, J., and the plaintiffs cross-appealed against that finding. The facts are sufficiently set out in the headnote.

- D Nelson, K.C., and G. N. Black for the defendants.
Beney, K.C., and Denny for the plaintiffs.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The cause of this accident was that the wrong lifting tackle was used, though the evidence showed that the proper lifting tackle of two chains fitted with stirrups was immediately available to the slinger, Ellis, if he had thought it right to use it. Ellis, however, decided to take the risk and used something which he ought not to have used for the purpose of lifting the mould. Section 23 of the Factories Act, 1937, has the marginal note, "Chains, ropes and lifting tackle," and it provides:

- F "(1) The following provisions shall be complied with as respects every chain, rope or lifting tackle used for the purpose of raising or lowering persons, goods or materials:—(a) no chain, rope or lifting tackle shall be used unless it is of good construction, sound material, adequate strength and free from patent defect . . ."

G The submission on behalf of the plaintiffs was that the lifting tackle which was used was not of good construction because the chain with the hooks at the end was not suitable for carrying a mould. Junior counsel for the plaintiffs drew the attention of the court to the words "adequate strength," and he said that, though the question of the marking of chains, hoists and the like is laid down in para. (b) and certain offences are created by that paragraph, it is no answer, in a case in which a chain breaks, to say that it complied with sub-s. (1) (b) if, in fact, the chain was inadequate for the work to which it was put. That may or may not be right. I am inclined to take the view that s. 23 provides something in the nature of a code, and where it places a duty on the employers it is an absolute duty. It is sufficient to consider the first line and a half: "No chain, rope or lifting tackle shall be used unless it is of good construction . . ."

H ORMEROD, J., said:

"The meaning of those words must be that if lifting tackle is used for any particular purpose, whether the man who is using it is an employee who has made a mistake and used the wrong tackle or not, there must be a breach of the section."

Earlier he had said:

"I am satisfied that what the section does mean is that it should be of good construction for the purpose for which the tackle is being used, which means that it must be constructed in such a way that it can properly be used for the particular purpose."

Counsel for the defendants submitted that the meaning given by the learned judge to that part of the section meant reading into the section something which was not there. He pointed out that this section creates penal offences and that nothing ought to be read into it which is not there unless it is necessary so to do in order to give effect to the section.

In my view, it is not necessary to read anything into the section. The words "no . . . lifting tackle shall be used unless it is of good construction" are capable of an ordinary, natural meaning, and the question arises: Was the lifting tackle in the present case of good construction? Junior counsel for the defendants asked us to consider whether it was necessary to read into the section the word "suitable" which the plaintiffs wished to read into it. He referred the court to other places in the Act in which the word "suitable" appeared. One was s. 30 where the word "suitable" appears several times. Counsel put this further argument before the court which impressed me. He said that the court had to consider whether the chain, rope or lifting tackle was of good construction, and, if the plaintiffs were right, the result would be that that same chain, rope, or lifting tackle one day would be of good construction and the next day of bad construction, and, perhaps, the next hour of good construction again, according to the use to which it was put. I cannot think that the section was intended to cover anything like that.

No attack has been made on this lifting tackle in regard to its actual construction, and I have reached the conclusion that the learned judge was wrong in his decision that the appellants were in breach of s. 23 (1) (a) of the Factories Act, 1937. This sub-section puts a heavy burden on the employers. The duty laid on the employers is absolute and a breach of it may entail a criminal prosecution; but it does not make the employers responsible for everything that a workman does. Though the last Act went very much beyond the earlier Factories Acts and regulations, it recognised that, however good employers may be and whatever efforts they may make to comply with their statutory obligations, accidents may still happen through the carelessness of a workman. If the legislature had intended to make the occupiers of a factory responsible because a chain or lifting tackle which was not suitable was used, it would have been quite easy to say: "No chain, rope or lifting tackle shall be used unless it is of good construction, sound material, adequate strength, free from patent defect and suitable for the purpose for which it is used." Those last words do not appear in the sub-section. It seems to me that some such words as those must be read into sub-s. (1) (a) if it is to be held that, on the facts of this case, there was a breach of the statutory duty on the part of the employers. Accordingly, I take the view that ORMEROD, J., was wrong in the decision at which he arrived.

[Turning to the allegation that the defendants were in breach of their common law duty to provide a proper system of working His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and said that he agreed with ORMEROD, J., that the evidence did not show that there was any lack of supervision or failure to provide a proper system of work, and added:] In my judgment, this appeal ought to be allowed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered by SINGLETON, L.J. Counsel for the defendants argued that the construction put on the Factories Act, 1937, s. 23 (1) (a), by ORMEROD, J., was wrong. The second question was the liability, if any, of the defendants at common law.

It is important to notice that the words of this section are common to many other sections of the Act. The words "good construction, sound material, adequate strength and free from patent defect," are to be found in several sections in this statute. The only words with which this court is really concerned are the words "good construction." The point can be stated in this way. ORMEROD, J., has said that those words "good construction," must not be looked at as simple English words, but something must be imported into them.

A In his judgment he said:

"The question that has to be decided here is: Was this lifting tackle of good construction? Was it free from patent defect? Was it of good construction generally for the purpose for which it was intended? If construction imports suitable design for the purpose for which it is being used, does the fact that a negligent employee using tackle for a purpose for which it is not designed when suitable tackle is available still render the employer liable for a breach of the section? I have come to the conclusion in this case, that the wording 'no chain . . . shall be used unless it is of good construction,' must mean that the tackle which is used for the particular piece of work which is being done must be of good construction for that purpose. I am asked to say that 'good construction' cannot mean 'good design'—that a chain may be of good construction, and, therefore, comply with the section and still be in every way as this was, unsuitable for the work which had to be done."

It is plain from that passage that what ORMEROD, J., has done is to import into the section the element of suitability or fitness for a particular purpose, but on the face of it the section requires no such thing.

D

The first matter that occurred to me when the argument was presented was that, if it had been intended that the element of suitability should be imported, I cannot see, with these very full details set out in the statute, why that element was not also mentioned. I think that, if it had been intended that this section should read in the way the learned judge interpreted it, Parliament would have inserted in it the plain words which would have been necessary. This is, I think, very strongly supported by the argument of junior counsel for the defendants. He referred, not merely to s. 23, but also to s. 30 (1) of the Act, a section which deals with steam receivers and steam containers, and reads:

" . . . shall be fitted with—(a) a suitable reducing valve or other suitable automatic appliance . . . (b) a suitable safety valve so adjusted as to permit the steam to escape . . . (d) a suitable stop valve . . . ", introducing the very element of fitness for the purpose or suitability. The argument at once comes to the mind: If suitability is referred to in s. 30, and it was intended that s. 23 should enact the same obligation, why not also refer to it there? Section 30 has in sub-s. (3) the words:

F

"Every part of every steam receiver shall be of good construction, sound material, adequate strength, and free from patent defect," the very words of s. 23. I can quite see that when dealing with matters like steam receivers it may be more feasible to state particulars in which fitness or suitability shall be laid down in the Act of Parliament itself, but it is important to notice that s. 30 (3) uses the very same words as s. 23 (1) (a). I observe also that s. 31, which deals with air receivers, requires the fitting of a suitable safety valve, a suitable appliance for draining the receiver, a suitable manhole, handhold and so on, elements of fitness and suitability again. In sub-s. (3) it says:

"Every air receiver and its fittings shall be of sound construction and properly maintained."

Those considerations lead me to the view that these words "sound construction" really mean "well made," and that no ground exists for importing, as ORMEROD, J., has done, this element of fitness or suitability into the construction of s. 23 (1) (a). I am also influenced by the fact that this is a penal section. We were referred to London & North Eastern Ry. Co. v. Berriman (4) where the court was dealing with rules affecting a railway company. LORD SIMONDS said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 270):

"... it is enacted by s. 11 (1) of the Act under consideration that, if any railway company acts in contravention of or fails to comply with any rule made under the Act, it shall be liable for each offence on conviction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to a fine not exceeding £50. I think that the same rule of construction must apply whether the duty and the penalty are imposed by the same section of an Act, or by different sections of an Act, or the one by a rule made under the Act and the other by the Act itself. That rule of construction is very well settled; though not always easy of application. I will state it by three familiar citations. In Tuck & Sons v. Priester (5) LORD ESHER, M.R., said (19 Q.B.D. 638): 'We must be very careful in construing that section, because it imposes a penalty. If there is a reasonable interpretation which will avoid the penalty in any particular case we must adopt that construction. If there are two reasonable constructions we must give the more lenient one. That is the settled rule for the construction of penal sections.' LINDLEY, L.J., in the same case said (ibid., 645): '... the well settled rule that the court will not hold that a penalty has been incurred, unless the language of the clause which is said to impose it is so clear that the case must necessarily be within it ...' Finally I will cite the words of JAMES, L.J., delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Dyke v. Elliott (6) (L.R. 4 P.C. 191): '... Where the thing is brought within the words and within the spirit, there a penal enactment is to be construed, like any other instrument, according to the fair common sense meaning of the language used, and the court is not to find or make any doubt or ambiguity in the language of a penal statute, where such doubt or ambiguity would clearly not be found or made in the same language in any other instrument ...'

That is a very important matter to be considered in construing this section.

The main facts of this case have never really been in dispute, certainly not the fact that the defendants provided equipment that was of good construction and sound material. The trouble arose because a workman did not use the proper appliance. The only matter that is found is that it was unsuitable for the particular job for which Ellis used it. It would be rather a strange thing if it could be said: You have provided a proper appliance. It is of sound construction, adequate strength and so on, but because a workman mistakenly has used something else you have failed in your statutory duty. ORMEROD, J., said:

"So far as concerns the argument that it is sufficient for the employer to provide suitable tackle and that then, if the wrong tackle is used by one of the workmen for doing some particular work, the responsibility is no longer on the employer, that argument I think must fall to the ground from the very words of the section. The section does not say that 'chains, ropes and lifting tackle shall be provided of good construction and sound material,' and so on. It says, 'no chain, rope or lifting tackle shall be used.' It seems to me that the meaning of those words must be that, if lifting tackle is used for any particular purpose, whether the man who is using it is an employee who has made a mistake and used the wrong tackle or not, there must be a breach of the section. It is presumably put in those words to provide for that particular happening; and it may be unfortunate from the point of view of the employer that he should be held responsible for the carelessness of one of his workmen in using the wrong tackle. But that is a matter for the legislature and, if they have used the words 'no chain ... shall be used unless it is of good construction,' then it does seem to me that the employer cannot cease to be liable merely because, although it has been used, it has been used because one of his employees has made a mistake."

A With great respect to the learned judge I think there is a fallacy underlying all that. Nobody doubts that the obligation laid on the employer by s. 23 (1) (a) is in its nature absolute, but what ORMEROD, J., is there saying is that the statutory obligation, which is absolute, is that tackle which is not suitable for the purpose shall not be used. In my view, if s. 23 (1) (a) is examined, good construction, sound material, adequate strength and freedom from patent defect are general matters and have no reference to any particular purpose, and those words cannot be considered as meaning good construction for some particular purpose. Therefore, I think that on this first matter ORMEROD, J., came to a wrong conclusion.

B [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence on the second point and said that he agreed that ORMEROD, J., had come to a proper conclusion.]

C BUCKNILL, L.J.: I also agree that the appeal of the defendants should be allowed. It is an important case, and there does not seem to be any direct authority on the first point. There is only one case that I would refer to, Reilly v. Beardmore & Co. (9), where the Court of Session had to consider the interpretation of s. 23 of the Factories Act, 1937. In that case an employee in a factory, injured owing to the parting of the cable of a crane, brought an action for damages against his employers on the ground that the cable had not complied with the conditions required by s. 23 (1) (a). The sheriff-substitute found in favour of the plaintiff, apparently, on the ground that, if a cable broke while it was being used, the Act had not been complied with. On appeal to the Court of Session the plaintiff held her judgment, but I would just refer to what the Lord President (LORD COOPER) said on the question of the meaning of the section (1947 S.C. 278):

E "In two passages in his note, which were subjected to criticism, the learned sheriff-substitute has, in my view, stated too highly the obligation upon the factory occupier under this section. He says 'if a cable breaks down while it is being "used," which is what this cable did here, I am of opinion that the Act has not been complied with'; and a little later he adds, 'I consider that the obligation which it [the statute] imposes is absolute, and that, if a cable breaks in use, a liability for the consequence is imposed on the users.' So to put the matter is, in my view, to overstate the absolute character of the obligation imposed by the statute and to make liability an automatic and inevitable consequence of the bare fact that a rope broke in use."

G If a rope breaks in use it obviously is not of adequate strength for the work for which it is being used, but if the argument which has been put forward here on behalf of the plaintiffs is sound, I think that the inadequacy of the rope, whatever the task was, would ipso facto have entitled the plaintiff in Reilly v. Beardmore & Co. (9) to judgment. I do not see any difference between the interpretation to be placed on "adequate strength" and "good construction." I agree entirely with the judgments which have been delivered and have nothing useful to add to them.

directing the payment of his debts, there appears in print the formula: "I give and bequeath unto . . ." Then the testator, in his own handwriting, firm and clear notwithstanding his eighty-six years, enumerated ten objects of bounty, numbered consecutively. The first is to Caroline Mary Gertrude Jameson and the gift is £3,000. The next seven are of the same kind, i.e., they are gifts of sums of money to named persons. It is, perhaps, significant, though I do not wish to attach very much importance to it, that with one exception the gifts are in a regular descending scale. The testator began with the largest and ended with the smallest. The fifth gift must be mentioned because it is in these terms: "Unto my executor [the plaintiff] £500." It is on No. 9 that the argument turns:

"Further I leave in addition to the bequest given him above to my executor Norman Francis Edward Knapp my books furniture and other personal belongings whether at New Court, Temple, or elsewhere."

The final provision is No. 10, in which the testator says:

"And I surrender to the committee of the club my shares in the University of London Club, Ltd."

Before I deal with the language of No. 9, there are certain surrounding circumstances which should be stated. In the first place, the testator was a man of education. He was for many years in the service of the Board of Customs and Excise, and for a very large period of his long life he was a member of the Bar, practising as such, and the reference to New Court, Temple, is a reference to his chambers in the Temple. He was, I think, never married, and for many years he lived with some friends of the name of Jameson. The first gift which I have read is to a member of that family. We were told that he was born in Eire and that no relatives of his are known to live in England. It is, indeed, conceded that they are either in the United States of America or in Eire and that he himself was wholly out of touch with his relations. Certainly there is no suggestion in the will of any intention or desire to benefit any of them.

With those matters in mind I return to the will. In deciding a question of this sort I think it is clear that, in addition to the surrounding circumstances properly to be regarded, the court has to look, not only at the actual words, but also at the context, and, particularly, the character, of the clause in which they appear. Counsel for the plaintiff has cited a number of authorities. I think they are of assistance because they show that, whatever might be thought to be the dictionary meaning properly to be given to the word "belongings," the court has construed the word as meaning "that which belonged to the giver"—certainly all property of a personal character which belonged to the giver. Re Bradfield (1) before EVE, J., and Re Mills' Will Trusts (2), before BENNETT, J. (where the phrase was "personal belongings") are instances showing that the court went quite a long way in giving to those words a very wide connotation so as to cover in effect the whole of the personal estate of the testator. The wills in those cases were, however, very different from the will in this case, and the circumstances also are different. I have referred to the fact that the testator was an educated man, whereas in the case of Re Mills (2) the testatrix was unable to read and write, and I find a further distinction in the two cases I have cited. It is plain when you look at the wills therein that in their brief compass the testator or testatrix was really purporting to deal with his or her whole estate. I think the cases show further (if authority is necessary) that where you get general words such as "belongings" or "effects" they must not be cut down by applying the ejusdem generis rule in circumstances in which so to do would be to deprive a residuary gift of full effect and leave some of the residue undisposed of. There are, moreover, instances which show that the position in which the gift in question appears in the will is by no means conclusive. For example, Fleming v. Burrows (3) showed that where a residuary gift was followed by particular legacies the effect would not be to cut down the residuary gift because it was followed, and not preceded, by the particular legacies.

I have tried to keep these things in mind, but, coming back to this will, I must conclude, if I can, what this paragraph 9 has expressed. Neither in its position nor in its expression does it look to me at all like a residuary gift. After all, we are not simply concerned with the formula "personal belongings." This is an additional gift to a legatee who has been given £500, and the testator says: "Further to that £500 I wish this beneficiary to have my books furniture and other personal belongings whether at New Court, Temple, or elsewhere."

A If it was intended that this gentleman should be made residuary legatee it seems strange that the testator should first give him £500 and then make this addition when other means were so simple. It is, however, the whole phrase, the reference to "books and furniture," and the reference to "New Court, Temple, or elsewhere," which leaves on my mind clearly the impression that this is not a residuary gift but one of a series of particular gifts, and I think the other features in the will to which I have already made some allusion bear that out. If that view is right, I think counsel for the plaintiff conceded that there would be no case for giving this phrase "personal belongings" a meaning which would make it a residuary gift.

B I should, perhaps, have said that the property of the testator amounted to some £12,000 odd in value and that the particular gifts in value amounted to C £8,200, so that there was, excluding debts and duties, about a third of the whole undisposed of by the particular clauses. The property consisted of stocks and shares and appreciable sums of cash in the Westminster Bank and the Post Office Savings Bank. Like ROXBURGH, J., I have to bear in mind also the warning (as he described it) of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Perrin v. Morgan (4) ([1943] 1 All E.R. 190). Although I think that cases are valuable as guides and indications of how the court approaches this difficult task, it is in the last resort, as D I have said more than once, a question of deciding, looking fairly at this literate man's language and applying the ordinary canons of construction, what it is that he has expressed to the reader. I answer that question in the same way as ROXBURGH, J., did. I appreciate that the result is that this testator has not succeeded in disposing of all of his property and as to part died intestate. E Counsel for the plaintiff has reminded us that the court, as has been said, inclines against intestacies, particularly (as I follow the cases) where the intestacy would result from a narrow construction of what is a residuary gift. Like ROMER, J., in Re Price (5), however, I bear in mind that SIR ROBERT ROMER some little time before pointed out that it may be an error to suppose that testators never deliberately contemplate intestacy. For these reasons I think that this appeal F fails.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the defendants in an action for libel from an order of PARKER, J., made in chambers and dated July 26, 1950, confirming an order of the master that the defendants should give particulars of the facts on which their plea of fair comment was based. The plea was in the following form: "The said words are a fair comment made in good faith on matters of public interest." The defendants contended that, as the defence was a general plea of fair comment, and not the plea commonly known as the "rolled-up plea" to which R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 22A now applied, the plaintiff was not entitled to the order.

Hawser for the defendants.

Milmo for the plaintiff.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I will ask DENNING, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J.: For many years before 1949 it was the practice of the Bar, in an action for libel, to plead the defence of fair comment in the form commonly known as the "rolled-up plea," because it gave to the pleader the benefit of not being ordered to give particulars of the facts on which he relied. That benefit was conferred by Aga Khan v. Times Publishing Co., Dawson v. Same (1) and many other cases, but several judges, including ATKIN, L.J., in Hobbs v. People Newspaper Publishing Co., Ltd. (2), and SCRUTTON, L.J., in the Aga Khan case (1), expressed their strong disapproval of it, and in 1949 the practice was altered. By R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 22A, it is laid down that, where the defence of fair comment is pleaded in the form known as the "rolled-up plea," the defendant

"... shall give particulars stating which of the words complained of he alleges are statements of fact and of the facts and matters he relies on in support of the allegation that the words are true."

That new rule does away with an anomaly of the law.

This case is really an attempt to bring that anomaly back again. It is said that, if the defendant does not plead the rolled-up plea, but only pleads the general plea of fair comment, the plaintiff is not entitled to particulars of the facts on which the comment is based. Let us just see what the plea of fair comment entails. An essential part of it, and the proper preamble to it, is for the defendant to allege that the facts on which he comments are true. If that is expressly alleged, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to particulars of the facts. Even if it is not expressly alleged, it is still implicit in the plea, and, if the plaintiff is to know the case he has to meet, he must be given particulars of the facts which are relied on in support of the plea. Take the instance which I put in the course of argument (taken from a similar illustration given by ATKIN, L.J., in Hobbs v. People Newspaper Publishing Co., Ltd. (2), and quoted in the judgment of the court, delivered by GREER, L.J. ([1937] 4 All E.R. 477), in Tudor-Hart v. British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection (3). Suppose it is said of a man that "he is a thief and, therefore, unfit to be a councillor," then, if the rolled-up plea were pleaded, in the old days the plaintiff could not get any particulars of the charge that he was a thief. As ATKIN, L.J., said in Hobbs' case (2), that was a monstrous state of affairs, and it has been rectified by R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 22A. Suppose now, in such a case, that the general plea is put in—"The said words are fair comment made in good faith on a matter of public interest"—surely particulars should be given. That was the practice before the new rule. Indeed, in the Aga Khan case (1), SCRUTTON, L.J., expressly stated ([1924] 1 K.B. 682), in reference to the general plea, that

"... unless it set out the facts upon which the comments alleged to be fair were based, the defendant might be ordered to give particulars of those facts."

That practice should, I think, be retained, and no new anomaly introduced. It is not sufficient for the defendant to specify merely the matter of public interest. That would be done, in the illustration which I have given, by simply saying that it was the plaintiff's fitness to be a councillor. The defendant must go further and give particulars of the facts on which the comment is based, i.e., the facts which go to the pith and substance of the matter. He must know what they are, because he intends to prove them at the trial, and it is no hardship for him to give particulars of them. For the reasons which I have stated, the plaintiff is entitled to particulars of the facts on which the comment alleged to be fair is based, not only in the cases to which R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 22A, applies, viz., cases where the defence of fair comment is pleaded in the form known as the "rolled-up plea," but also where the plea of fair comment has been pleaded generally, and, therefore, I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), October 16, 1950.]

Discovery—Interrogatories—“Opposite parties”—Joint tortfeasors—Administration of interrogatories by one tortfeasor to another—Necessity of notice—R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 1.

By R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 1 “In any cause or matter the plaintiff or defendant by leave of the court or a judge may deliver interrogatories in writing for the examination of the opposite parties, or any one or more of such parties . . .” In an action by the plaintiff against two alleged tortfeasors, the second defendants sought to administer interrogatories to the first defendants. No notice under R.S.C., Ord. 16A, r. 12, claiming contribution or relief connected with the subject-matter of the action, had been served on the first defendants by the second defendants.

HELD: in ordinary cases where the issues were plain, a defendant could claim contribution from a co-defendant under s. 6 (2) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, without delivering a notice under R.S.C., Ord. 16A, r. 12; but where a defendant desired to obtain discovery from, or administer interrogatories to, a co-defendant, he must serve a notice claiming contribution and apply for directions, so that the court might know what issues he sought to raise.

APPEAL by the second defendants from an order of PARKER, J., dated July 26, 1950, affirming a decision of MASTER BAKER, whereby he refused leave to the second defendants to administer interrogatories to the first defendants on the ground that they were not “opposite parties” within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 1.

It was contended for the second defendants that, in view of the decision in Croston v. Vaughan (1), a defendant seeking to recover contribution from another defendant under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6, was not required to serve a third party notice on the other defendant in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 16A, r. 12, and was entitled to administer interrogatories in spite of the absence of such notice. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Nelson, K.C., and R. H. Forrest for the second defendants.

Humphrey Edmunds for the first defendants.

C. H. Duveen for the plaintiff.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of PARKER, J., affirming a decision of MASTER BAKER, refusing leave to the second defendants in the action to administer interrogatories to the first defendants on the ground that they were not opposite parties. R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 1, provides:

“In any cause or matter the plaintiff or defendant by leave of the court or a judge may deliver interrogatories in writing for the examination of the opposite parties, or any one or more of such parties . . .”

A note to this rule in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1949, vol. I, p. 524, under the heading “Opposite Parties” says:

“... a party not on the other side of the record is an opposite party within the meaning of these rules if between him and the applicant there is some right to be adjusted in the action, which in Chancery actions might often be the case between two plaintiffs or two defendants . . . ”

The authority for that phraseology in principle is Shaw v. Smith (2).

The present claim is by an infant. She was employed in the works of the first defendants, Rolls Royce, Ltd., and claims damages

A “for personal injuries and loss and damage caused by a defective lift at the first defendants’ premises owing to the breach of statutory duty and/or the negligence of the first defendants or their agents and/or owing to the negligence of the second defendants.”

B The claim against the first defendants is founded on breach of statutory duty and also on negligence. The second defendants were joined in the action because of the defence of the first defendants who say that the injuries were caused by the negligence of the second defendants. They allege a contract between themselves and the second defendants under which the second defendants agreed, inter alia, to examine the lift by a competent mechanic and to report from time to time on anything which could by an external examination be determined as being in need of further attention, and they say that they will refer to the contract at the trial. Then they say that the second defendants knew of these defects and failed to give notice, and they rely on that in answer to the plaintiff’s claim. They have not so far taken the procedure to claim an indemnity from the second defendants by virtue of the contract between them in the event of their being held liable to the plaintiff. The second defendants admit the contract, but deny the negligence.

D Counsel for the second defendants says that the learned judge was wrong because of s. 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, which provides:

“(1) Where damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort . . . (a) judgment recovered against any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage shall not be a bar to an action against any other person . . . ”

E The section goes on to provide that any tortfeasor liable for the whole of the damage may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor, and the amount of that contribution shall be such as may be found by the court to be just and equitable having regard to the extent of that person’s responsibility for the damage. Counsel also referred, and it was a necessary part of his submission, to the procedure which has grown up after being declared to be valid and proper by this court in Croston v. Vaughan (1). That was an action concerned with motor-cars. The plaintiff in that case was claiming that two defendants had been negligent and that the accident was caused either by the negligence of one or the other or both. Immediately after judgment had been delivered, an application was made to the judge to apportion the blame between the two defendants in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1935. The judge apportioned the blame two-thirds to one defendant and one-third to the other. On appeal it was held that the judge had jurisdiction to make that apportionment, that it was a matter of discretion for the judge, and that it could not be disturbed by the Court of Appeal. We were told that that practice has been followed, and that in that class of case it is unusual to follow the procedure of a notice under Ord. 16A, r. 12. Sometimes a letter is written, but sometimes no communication is given beforehand, it being recognised, perhaps, that in that class of case an application on those lines will be made if both defendants are held to be to blame.

H I am going to confine my decision to the facts of the present case in which one defendant is seeking to administer interrogatories to another defendant. I wish to say nothing which can throw doubt on, or might impede, any practice such as is referred to in Croston’s case (1), where there is no question of interrogatories or discovery. It was not disputed before us that Ord. 16A, r. 12, which deals with the position if one defendant seeks contribution or indemnity from another, would cover the case of an ordinary claim in a running down action against two defendants such as was dealt with by an application after judgment in Croston's case (1). The rule provides:

"(1) Where a defendant claims against another defendant (a) that he is entitled to contribution or indemnity, or (b) that he is entitled to any relief or remedy relating to or connected with the original subject-matter of the action and substantially the same as some relief or remedy claimed by the plaintiff . . . the defendant making the claim may without any leave issue and serve on such other defendant a notice making such claim or specifying such question or issue. (2) No appearance to such notice shall be necessary and the same procedure shall be adopted for the determination of such claim, question or issue between the defendants as would be appropriate under this order if he were a third party."

That, of course, means an order for directions. In my opinion, where one defendant as against another defendant is alleging a right to discovery, as he is in the present case, by seeking to deliver interrogatories, and a contest arises, it is right that he should deliver a notice under Ord. 16A, r. 12, and that the procedure under the rules should be invoked. The present case is a very good example of the importance of defining what is the right to be adjusted as between the two defendants. I had to ask counsel for the second defendants during the course of the argument how the question of a contribution would arise, and what form it might take. There also is a contract between the first and the second defendants which on the face of it might be relevant if a court was asked to decide as to any liability as between one defendant and the other. I think where issues as to discovery arise the procedure which was perfectly satisfactory in Croston's case (1) is not satisfactory and that the party seeking discovery should serve his notice so that the court, when it comes to deal with his claim, can have a record of what issues he seeks to raise. In the present case it may be that neither side is relying on the contract, but it may be that, if the issue of the liability of the first defendant to the second defendant is raised by a notice, one or other side may rely on that. For those reasons I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: In ordinary cases where a defendant claims contribution from a co-defendant under s. 6 (2) of the Act of 1935, it is not necessary for the full third party procedure to be followed, and since Croston v. Vaughan (1) it never has been. It is, I think, desirable that notice should be given by letter that a claim for contribution will be made, but even this is not essential in ordinary collision cases where the issues between two defendants are plain and do not need further definition. Exceptional cases may, however, arise, like the present one, in which one of the defendants desires to obtain particulars, or discovery of documents, or interrogatories, from his co-defendant. Then it is essential for him to serve a notice claiming contribution and to apply for directions so that the issues may be clearly defined, but this expense should not be incurred unless it is necessary for fairly disposing of the matter, and the master should, I think, refuse to direct pleadings as between the two defendants or to give other directions except where he is satisfied they are necessary. In the present case, as a necessary foundation for the application to administer interrogatories, I think it was essential that a notice claiming contribution should be served. As it was not served before the application was heard by the master or the judge, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

TAYLOR AND ANOTHER v. SAYCELL.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Ormerod, JJ.),
October 5, 16, 1950.]

Street Traffic—Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Avoidance of disqualification—No “special reasons” found—Conditional discharge—Exercise of discretion—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (2)—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 7 (1), s. 12 (2).

A By a policy of insurance in respect of third-party risks held by one of two partners who carried on business as haulage contractors in relation to the user of a lorry belonging to the partnership it was provided that the policy should be effective, while the vehicle was being used for carrying goods for hire or reward, only when it was driven by the policy holder himself or by a person employed by him, and only when used for the carriage of goods on behalf of a named company. On the material date the lorry was driven by the partner other than the policy holder (he not being employed by the policy holder), not to deliver goods on behalf of the named company, but to deliver goods for reward on behalf of the partnership. Both partners were convicted by justices of using a motor vehicle on the highway without there being in force in relation to the user a policy of insurance as required by s. 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. They were fined, and, under s. 35 (2), were disqualified for holding or obtaining a licence under Part I of the Act for a period of twelve months. On appeal against sentence to quarter sessions, the recorder, taking the view that the offence was not serious, substituted for the decision of the justices an order conditionally discharging the partners under s. 7 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948.

D HELD: while in such a case quarter sessions had jurisdiction to make an order of conditional discharge with its attendant avoidance of disqualification, such an order should only be made in most exceptional circumstances; such circumstances did not exist in the present case; and the Divisional Court had power to remit the case to quarter sessions with an expression of their opinion to that effect.

G CASE STATED by the recorder of Sheffield.

H At a court of summary jurisdiction for the city of Sheffield sitting on Mar. 15, 1950, the defendants were convicted of having, on Dec. 16, 1949, unlawfully used a motor vehicle on a road in the city, there not being in force in relation to such user such a policy of insurance or such a security in respect of third-party risks as complied with the requirements of Part II of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, contrary to s. 35 (1). The justices fined the defendants and disqualified them for holding or obtaining a driving licence for a period of twelve months from the date of their conviction. The defendants appealed to quarter sessions against their convictions and sentences. The appeals were heard on Apr. 21, 1950, when the defendants abandoned the appeals against the convictions. On the question of sentence it was submitted on behalf of the defendants that the case was a proper one to be dealt with under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 7 (1). For the prosecutor it was submitted that, in determining whether to make an order under s. 7 (1), the court should follow the principles laid down with reference to the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1, in Gardner v. James (1). The recorder held that the power of the court to make an order for conditional discharge under s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1948 was wider than the power formally conferred by s. 1 of the Act of 1907 and that he was not bound by the principles applicable to the former provision in exercising his discretion under s. 7 (1). Having regard to the smallness of the fines imposed by the magistrates he was satisfied that the offence was not a serious one, allowed the appeals against sentence, and ordered each of the defendants to be discharged subject to the condition that he committed no offence for twelve months from the date of the order. By reason of that order and by virtue of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 12 (1) and (2), the defendants were not disqualified for holding or obtaining a licence under Part I of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and the court had no power to impose such a disqualification. The prosecutor appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 16. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is a Special Case stated by the recorder of Sheffield to whom the defendants appealed against two convictions by the city justices, the first for unlawfully failing to comply with the conditions subject to which an "A" contract licence had been granted, contrary to s. 9 (1) of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, and, secondly, for unlawfully using a motor vehicle on the highway without there being in force a policy of insurance as required by s. 35 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The magistrates had imposed fines in respect of each of these offences and had also disqualified the defendants for holding a licence under Part I of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, for twelve months. On the hearing the defendants abandoned the appeals against conviction and appealed only against sentence. We are not concerned with the first of these offences and the Case stated by the recorder in fact relates only to the second, namely, with regard to using an uninsured vehicle. The recorder set aside the sentence imposed by the justices and substituted for it an order of conditional discharge under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 7 (1) and also, rightly, held that the effect of granting a conditional discharge was, by reason of the provisions of s. 12 (2) of the Act, to remove the disqualification imposed. On the application of the prosecutor he stated a Case and the question he puts to the court is whether there was any evidence on which he could properly exercise his discretion to make an order for conditional discharge, thereby removing the disqualification imposed on the defendants as a result of their conviction.

The material facts are that the defendants carried on business in partnership as haulage contractors. The offence consisted in the defendant Taylor driving a lorry belonging to the partnership for the purpose of delivering coal at miners' homes although the policy of insurance then in force provided that the policy was effective while the vehicle was being used for carrying goods for hire or reward only when it was being driven by the policy-holder or any person employed by him under a contract of service who was driving on his order or with his permission or while it was being used for the carriage of goods on behalf of a named company and for social, domestic and pleasure purposes of passengers other than for hire or reward. The policy had not been issued to the partners. The policy-holder was the defendant Marriott, and on the occasion in question Taylor was not driving under a contract of service with Marriott. Furthermore, the coal was being delivered, not on behalf of the company specified in the policy, but on behalf of the partnership. Clearly, therefore, on the journey the subject of the charge the lorry was not insured, and, had an accident occurred,

A the insurers could not have been required to indemnify the defendants had they been liable for the consequences of the accident. The recorder has not found any special reasons for refraining from upholding the disqualification imposed by the magistrates, but he has said that he was satisfied that the offence against s. 35 was not serious, and, consequently, that he was warranted in making an order for the conditional discharge of each of the defendants which, by virtue of s. 12 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, would avoid disqualification. His only reason for holding that the offence was not serious appears to be that the justices only inflicted a small fine, but this overlooks the fact that in addition they imposed disqualification, which of itself is a very serious punishment.

B This court is unable to share the view of the recorder that the offence of driving an uninsured lorry, more especially in a city, is not an offence of a serious character. The object of the legislature in providing for compulsory insurance is well known. It is that if persons are injured through no fault of their own by a motor vehicle they shall be enabled to recover the damages awarded to them, although the driver or owner of the vehicle causing the damage may not be in a position himself to satisfy the claim. There have, no doubt, been cases where facts have been proved which justify a court holding that there were special reasons within the meaning of the statute enabling them to refrain from ordering disqualification, but no special reasons were found by the recorder, nor could he have found them as no evidence was given by the defendants. He has, however, granted a conditional discharge, and by that means, owing to the provisions of s. 12, has avoided disqualification. This court can only regard the offence of driving uninsured vehicles as serious, and, I think I may fairly say, generally as very serious. An accident may happen immediately the vehicle starts on its journey or at any time on its journey, and if persons take out a policy to which are attached conditions limiting the persons entitled to drive or the use to which the vehicle may be put, they do so for the purpose of paying a smaller premium than they would have to pay if full cover was granted. It is, therefore, the bounden duty of the assured to see that there is no breach of the conditions of the policy which would entitle the insurers to decline liability. If the assured deliberately use the vehicle without regard to the conditions they are committing a serious offence. There was no suggestion here that the defendants were in any way misled or did not understand the conditions of the policy and this court has more than once laid down that it is the duty of the assured to make themselves acquainted with and abide by such conditions.

F The recorder does not ask whether he had jurisdiction to make use of s. 7, which has now taken the place of the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, formerly in force, and we are in no way throwing any doubt on Quelch v. Collett (2), in which the court held, on facts very different from the present, that, although justices might not find special reasons for refraining from disqualifying, they nevertheless might discharge the offender under s. 1 (1) of the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907. Considering also that s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1948 provides G that the conviction of an offender who is discharged absolutely or conditionally shall in any event be disregarded for the purposes of any enactment which imposes any disqualification or disability upon convicted persons, or authorises or requires the imposition of any such disqualification or disability, and that no reference is made to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, so that convictions under that Act are in no way excluded from the provisions of s. 12 (2), there can be no doubt H that there is jurisdiction in the court to discharge conditionally and thereby to avoid the necessity of disqualification. Because, however, it is within the jurisdiction of a court to make that order it by no means follows that they should do so, unless in most exceptional circumstances. In Gardner v. James (1) in delivering the judgment of the court I said:

“ It is very difficult indeed to see how justices can be justified in acting under the Probation of Offenders Act on reasons which would not constitute special reasons entitling them to refuse, on conviction, to suspend the licence."

It would have been more accurate if I had said "to disqualify for holding a licence." It was not suggested in this case that there was anything that could have been called a special reason, and I am unable to see how it can be said that the offence was not a serious offence. Moreover, when the previous motoring history of the two defendants is examined we find that the defendant Taylor has ten previous convictions for motoring offences, including one of driving without reasonable consideration, another for dangerous driving, and four for using a vehicle, no doubt a lorry, with inefficient brakes. Marriott's record is not so bad, but he has three convictions for using a vehicle with inefficient brakes and two for exceeding the speed limit, which may, however, for this purpose be disregarded.

This court has always held that where a court has refrained from imposing sentences or penalties under the provisions of various statutes they have power in a proper case to interfere. There are many cases in which, in former days, magistrates refrained under s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, from passing any sentence and dismissed the information on the ground that the offence was trivial, but this court said that the course taken by the magistrates was wrong and remitted the case to them with directions to convict and impose a penalty. When the provisions of the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, took the place of s. 16 the court also interfered on occasion in the same way. Exactly the same considerations apply where absolute or conditional discharges are granted under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. This court will never readily interfere with the exercise of the discretion if it is exercised judicially and the facts are such that they can see there was justification for the court taking the action which it has. As BIRKETT, J., put it in Quelch v. Collett (2) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 284):

"That discretion must be judicially exercised by the justices and this court will be vigilant to see that it is so exercised. Where, however, materials exist on which the justices may properly exercise that judicial discretion and they have exercised it, this court will be equally vigilant to see that their considered view is made effective."

We can see no grounds here on which it can be said that it was proper to grant an order of conditional discharge for the purpose of avoiding disqualification, and I repeat with emphasis the words that I quoted above from Gardner v. James (1). Everyone recognises that the penalty of disqualification is severe. It often causes great hardship, and, accordingly, it may be distasteful to a court to impose it, but it is a penalty which Parliament has imposed and has said is prima facie to be imposed in every case of this character and a court is only to refrain from imposing it if it can find special reasons for so refraining. It must, therefore, be very seldom that a court is justified in granting an absolute or conditional discharge so as to avoid doing that which s. 35 (2) says shall be done, and ought certainly not to do so where no excuse has been put forward by an accused for his breach of the law. As we pointed out in Pilbury v. Brazier (3), there may be cases in which a technical objection could be taken on the terms of the policy, such, for instance, as that the driver at the time when he was stopped was not the holder of a licence because he had forgotten to renew it and generally policies only indemnify licensed drivers. That is a point which no reputable insurance company takes, and if, as in Pilbury v. Brazier (3), the insurance company inform the court that they would have regarded themselves liable to indemnify had an accident occurred, that may well be a special reason or a reason for a conditional discharge. No suggestion was made in this case that the insurance company would have taken up any such attitude. The case must go back to the recorder with the opinion of the court that there was no evidence on which he could properly exercise his discretion to make an order of conditional discharge.

Before parting with this case, I desire to add that this is a good illustration of what I cannot help thinking is an unintentional lacuna in the Act. The disqualification can only be imposed from the date of the conviction, which was in March of this year. It ran, apparently, until the recorder removed it in April. The case comes before this court in October and the effect of our judgment is that the disqualification is restored, but it will be for twelve months from last March. It is to be hoped that some day an alteration in the law will be made so that where a court of appeal imposes a penalty of disqualification the disqualification will run from the date of the decision of the appeal and not from the date of conviction. The court will order that the disqualification be re-imposed as from today and the Master of the Crown Office will so inform the clerk of the peace and the prosecutor, and the superintendent or the inspector of police.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Re VESTEY'S SETTLEMENT. LLOYDS BANK, LTD. AND OTHERS v. O'MEARA AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.JJ.),
October 9, 10, 11, 1950.]

Settlement—Trust—Discretionary trust—Trustees directed “to pay or apply” income of trust fund during specified period to or for “the support or benefit of all or any one or more” of a named class of persons—Corpus to be divided at end of specified period—Beneficiaries of discretionary trust having only contingent interest in corpus—Exercise of trust—Allocations of income in favour of infant beneficiaries—Resolution of trustees that sums “shall belong” to or be divided among each of the infant beneficiaries—Sums allocated to infants not being required for their maintenance, resolution to accumulate—Trustee Act, 1925 (c. 19), s. 31 (2).

By cl. 7 of a settlement, made in 1935, the settlor directed that, during a specified period, the trustees “shall pay or apply the income” of the trust fund “unto or in any manner for the support or benefit of all or any one or more” of a named class of persons, “such payment or application” to be made in such shares, in such manner, and on such terms, as the trustees should in their discretion think fit. The objects of the discretionary trusts were members of the settlor's family and consisted, at all material times, of a number of adults and infants. At the end of the specified period, the corpus of the trust fund was to be divided among a named class. None of the beneficiaries of the discretionary trust had a vested interest in corpus, but the infant beneficiaries had contingent reversionary interests therein, such interests being contingent on their surviving the end of the specified period. By a resolution, made on Feb. 2, 1949, and purporting to be in exercise of their discretionary power under cl. 7, the trustees decided that, after the payment of certain sums to the adult beneficiaries, the balance of the income which they decided to make available for immediate distribution in each half year “shall belong” in specified shares to each of the infant beneficiaries, and they then proceeded to allocate the shares for the half year ending Sept. 30, 1948. They then resolved that, as none of the income falling in that half year to the infant beneficiaries under the first part of their resolution was required for the maintenance of the infants, "that income should be accumulated in accordance with s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925." By a resolution dated Apr. 29, 1949, the trustees resolved "to divide" the balance of the income of the half year ending Mar. 31, 1949, among the infant beneficiaries, and, for the same reasons as before, that the income should be accumulated.

HELD: (i) as the effect of the trustees' resolutions was to give to each infant a specific portion of the income, and, without those resolutions the infant was entitled to no part of it, the first part of the resolutions amounted, if not to payments, to applications of the moneys for the benefit of the infants, and, therefore, the allocations were within the power of the trustees under cl. 7 of the settlement.

Re Peel ([1936] Ch. 161), distinguished.

Per JENKINS, L.J.: "Words such as 'payment' must be construed in their context, and, inasmuch as this is a discretionary trust in favour of a class of persons which, ex necessitate, includes infant beneficiaries, I would be disposed, if it were necessary to do so, to put a wider interpretation on the expression 'pay,' and include in it the transaction consisting of the allocation of a share of any year's income to an infant absolutely, although, owing to his infancy, no receipt is possible."

(ii) as the infants had merely contingent reversionary interests in the corpus of the fund and the reversionary interests in corpus did not carry the intermediate income and were thus excluded from the application of s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925, by sub-s. (3), sums received by an infant by an exercise of the trustees' discretion under cl. 7 of the settlement were not received by virtue of his contingent interest in corpus, nor were such sums received by him by reason of something analogous to a life or other limited interest in income, as, under the terms of the discretionary trust, no infant had any share or interest in the income unless and until the trustees, in the exercise of their discretion, decided to pay or apply to or for the support or benefit of that infant some part of the income from time to time in hand, but, on a sum of income being allocated to him under the trustees' discretion, the infant became absolutely entitled to it, and, therefore, s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925, did not apply to that sum.

(iii) as the effect of the first part of the resolutions was a disposition of part of the income of the trust fund in such a way as to appropriate particular shares absolutely to each of the infants, the fact that the trustees wrongly thought that the sums then became subject to the trusts imposed by s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925, did not make the allocations invalid.

APPEAL by the infant beneficiaries from an order of HARMAN, J., dated May 2, 1950.

Clause 7 of a settlement, made on Nov. 15, 1935, by Baron Vestey and Sir Edmund Vestey, contained a discretionary trust in regard to the payment to, or application for the support or benefit of, all or any one or more of the beneficiaries, during a specified period, of the income of the fund settled by Sir Edmund Vestey. By resolutions made on Feb. 2, 1949, Apr. 29, 1949, and Nov. 28, 1949, Edmund's trustees, purporting to exercise the discretionary trust contained in cl. 7, allocated certain shares of the income then in hand to each of the infant beneficiaries who were among the objects of the trust. Being under the impression that s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925, applied to these allocations, the trustees on each occasion directed that, as the sums allocated were not required for the maintenance of the infants, they should be accumulated in accordance with the provisions of the section. On a summons taken out by the trustees, the court was asked to determine: "(1) Whether on the true construction of the . . . deed of settlement . . . the trustees . . . of Edmund's fund . . . are, in the execution or exercise of the discretionary trust and powers [contained in cl. 7 thereof] (a) at liberty to allocate to any one or more of the objects who is or are an infant or infants such part or parts of the income of Edmund's fund . . . as the . . . trustees . . . may think fit, notwithstanding that no present or immediate application thereof for his, her or their maintenance is contemplated or required, or (b) are bound in every year to execute or exercise the aforesaid discretionary trust and powers so as and in such manner that the whole of the income of Edmund's fund . . . for that year is actually paid or applied to or for the support or benefit of all or some one or more of the objects. (2) If the answer to question (1) hereof shall be in accordance with alternative (a), whether any of the income of Edmund's fund . . . which is so allocated as aforesaid to any one or more of the objects who is or are an infant or infants is during his, her or their infancy respectively income of property held by the . . . trustees . . . in trust for such object or objects within the meaning of s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925, and, accordingly, the statutory powers of maintenance and accumulation conferred on trustees by that section are during the infancy of any such object exercisable by the . . . trustees . . . in relation to the income so allocated as aforesaid to him or her." HARMAN, J., held that the allocations were outside the ambit of the discretionary trust, being neither payments to the infants nor applications for their benefit within cl. 7 of the settlement, and, therefore, the operations were wholly ineffective, and the second question did not arise. The facts and the relevant provisions of the settlement appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and E. I. Goulding for the infant beneficiaries.

Dunbar for the adult beneficiaries.

H. A. Rose for the trustees.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This appeal has raised points which I have found of considerable difficulty. The question, briefly, is whether, in respect of certain half-years, the trustees of a settlement made on Nov. 15, 1935, effectually exercised certain discretionary trusts which were imposed on them by the settlement, and, if so, with what result.

The settlement is an elaborate one. Indeed, counsel for the adult beneficiaries applied to it the adjective "sophisticated," which I think might, perhaps, also not inappropriately be applied to some of the argument which has ranged round the question. There were two settlors, Lord Vestey and Sir Edmund Vestey, but the present problem relates only to such trusts as apply to the funds settled by Sir Edmund Vestey. I can state the material part of those trusts, I think, briefly. The scheme provided for the disposal of the income of Sir Edmund Vestey's funds (which were substantially augmented in 1942 by another deed of covenant, to which I need not further refer) for a considerable period, called "the specified period," the specified period being defined as being the period from the date of the deed until the death of the last survivor of the issue actually born before that date of Lord Vestey, Sir Edmund Vestey and his late Majesty, King Edward VII, or until Jan. 1, 2011, whichever date should first arise. During that period, the income of the funds, by virtue of cl. 7, was to be disposed of as follows: "Edmund's trustees shall"—it is to be noted that that word is imperative:

"... pay or apply the income of Edmund's fund . . . unto or in any manner for the support or benefit of all or any one or more of the following persons for the time being in existence (whether now living or hereafter to be born) . . ."

Then follows the necessary definition of the class which, for the moment, I pass over. Clause 7 continues:

"... such payment or application to be made at or for such times in such shares in such manner and upon any such terms and conditions whatsoever as Edmund's trustees in their discretion shall from time to time think proper, and so that the same shall in no case give any right of continued or future receipt or enjoyment of any income or the benefit thereof."

There was then a series of provisos, one of which enabled, for certain limited periods, an accumulation of the income during this specified period. We have been informed, and I accept it, that at the moment the only possible and legitimate period of accumulation would be the settlor's, Sir Edmund Vestey's, own life. He is now a man somewhat heavy with years, and, therefore, the period of accumulation permitted would be necessarily, or very probably, short. Apart from that proviso permitting limited accumulation, the direction in cl. 7 is a trust imposing a duty, as I read it, on the trustees to pay or apply the income in the manner indicated. The objects of the discretionary trust were members of the family, and at the present time they consist of eight adults and seven infants. All persons at present interested as objects of the discretion have been represented before the court. At the end of the specified period, the corpus will be divided among a class to be derived, again, from the family. I need not take time by specifying it. Suffice it to say that these infants and some, but not all, I think, of the adults, should they survive that period, would be qualified to come in at the final distribution of corpus, but, should they not survive, then other persons would take their place. In other words, none of these persons now before the court has a vested interest in corpus, but each of the seven infants has a contingent interest, contingent on surviving the expiration of the specified period.

That, I think, is a sufficient statement of the facts, so far as the settlement is concerned, and the obligations imposed thereby on the trustees. The plaintiffs in the action consist of Lloyds Bank, Ltd., which corporation is a custodian trustee, and four other persons, who are the managing trustees. It falls, therefore, on the last four plaintiffs to exercise, on the appropriate occasions, the discretion imposed by cl. 7. The method which they have adopted is made to appear from three exhibits to the affidavit filed in the case by the fourth plaintiff, Mr. Brown, one of the managing trustees. The deed imposes—in my limited experience it is a novel provision—on the trustees the positive duty of keeping minutes recording resolutions passed in the exercise of these discretions, and provides—though this is irrelevant for the present purposes—that a majority vote should prevail, but so that any dissent should be recorded. On the first occasion on which the discretion was exercised in the way which has given rise to this question a meeting was held on Feb. 2, 1949, for dealing with the income which had come to the hands of the trustees for the half-year ended Sept. 30, 1948, and the way in which the matter was dealt with was this, as appears from the minutes:

"The trustees considered the question of distribution of income, and it was noted that there was a total sum of £63,375 in hand [which was made up partly of income of the original settled fund, and partly of income of the added funds]. The trustees decided to allocate £47,000 for immediate distribution, leaving the balance for consideration when the accounts for the year ending Mar. 31, 1949, were available, and the following resolution was passed."

I should state that nothing turns in this case on the trustees' decision to hold over, so to speak, until the next half-year, the difference between £47,000 and £63,375. I observe, however, that, according to the minute, the decision was to allocate £47,000 for immediate distribution. The minutes then proceed:

"The trustees resolved in exercise of their discretionary power under cl. 7 of the settlement that until further resolution of the trustees the balance of the income which the trustees shall decide to be available for immediate distribution in each half-year after making such distributions (if any) to adult beneficiaries as the trustees shall in each half year in their discretion think proper shall belong to such of the issue of Sir Edmund Vestey as are objects of the said power and are under twenty-one years of age at the date of the relevant half-yearly distributions and if more than one in equal shares except that John Vestey, one of Sir Edmund's grandchildren, being the son of Mr. William Vestey, shall be allotted two shares in such distribution."

Therefore, Mr. John Vestey (who is now nearing his majority) is allotted a share twice as large as that allotted to the other infants. Then the minutes go on:

"Out of the above-mentioned sum of £47,000 the trustees decided to pay £1,000 each to the following adult beneficiaries . . . then set out, leaving £42,000 available for the issue of Sir Edmund Vestey who are under twenty-one divisible as follows . . ."

Then their names are set out, and, following what had previously been said, John, the first named, gets double the shares of the other five [there being, at the date of that resolution, six infant beneficiaries], so that there are, in effect, seven shares of £6,000 each, £42,000 in all. Finally:

"The trustees, being of the opinion that none of the income falling in the current half-year to infant beneficiaries under the trustees' resolution above is required for the maintenance of such beneficiaries, resolved that that income should be accumulated in accordance with s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925."

The first thing to note is that the first resolution, so called, appears on the face of it to be a resolution covering future exercises of the discretion, but it has been pointed out that it could not, of course, be an effective exercise, nunc pro tunc, for the future, and that it must, therefore, be regarded as a statement of policy to be followed, subject, of course, to review and possible alteration on every subsequent occasion. So far as this particular distribution of the half-year's income to Sept. 30, 1948, is concerned, it lays down what the trustees decided then to do with the £47,000 in hand. The decision—and I repeat the vital words—was a decision that, subject and after payment to the adults, the balance "shall belong" in certain proportions to the infant beneficiaries. Then, after the result of the first resolution has been set out, there follows the second resolution, which is represented to be—and, I think, rightly—a subsidiary resolution, namely, that the £42,000 which is to belong to the infants, not being required for immediate maintenance, must, as a result, be accumulated pursuant to s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925. That being the form of the resolution, the sums in question were set aside in books kept by the bank. Investments have been made of the sums set aside and of the income as it has accrued due, on the footing that s. 31 of the Trustee Act was operative in regard to these sums, and, accordingly, that Lloyds Bank was simply giving effect, subject to the directions of the managing trustees, to the statutory duties imposed by s. 31.

There are, I think, two quite separate questions. The first question is: Whether such an operation fell at all within the relevant words of cl. 7 of the settlement. Did the operation constitute either a payment to the infants or an application for their benefit? It is not suggested that it could be an application for their support, and, therefore (to be effective) it must be either a payment to the infants or an application for their benefit. HARMAN, J., was of opinion that it was neither, and that the operation, being outside the ambit of the discretionary trust, was wholly ineffective. He, therefore, did not have to consider the second question, namely: Assuming that the operation was effective, i.e., that it constituted either a payment to the infants or an application for their benefit, were the trustees right in their second resolution, which proceeded on the footing that, as the result of what they had done, s. 31 came down, so to speak, and fastened on the sum so set aside, and required, in the absence of maintenance demands, the accumulation of the income pursuant to that section? There is a further question which emerged during the course of the argument. Supposing that the right answer be that the first part of the resolution, the first stage in the operation, was a valid exercise of the trustees' powers under cl. 7, but that they were wrong in supposing that s. 31 of the Trustee Act had anything to do with the result, is the proper conclusion (a) that the original allocation stands as either a payment to the infants or an application for their benefit, or (b) that, since the trustees may be taken only to have exercised the discretion on the footing that the result produced would be an accumulation under s. 31, and since, on this hypothesis, they were mistaken in thinking that s. 31 would apply, the whole operation ought to be treated as ineffective—thus arriving at the same result as HARMAN, J., arrived at, namely, that there had been no effective exercise of the discretion?

Before I turn to s. 31, I think it might be convenient to say a word about the next resolution passed by the trustees on Apr. 29, 1949, in respect of the next half-year's income, namely, that which had accrued to Mar. 31, 1949. The language of the minutes in that case is not quite the same. Under the heading "Income distribution," I find this: "The trustees considered the question of distribution of income, and it was noted that there was a total sum of £27,470 in hand"—that included, I take it, what was left over from the previous half-year—"and the trustees resolved to distribute the whole of this amount as follows." There then appears a table of distributions in favour of adult beneficiaries. The minutes go on:

"... and subject to these payments totalling £3,257.19s. 11d., to divide the balance of £24,212 12s. among the issue of Sir Edmund Vestey who are under twenty-one years of age in accordance with the resolution passed by the trustees on Feb. 2, 1949, as follows ..."

There then follows the necessary arithmetical table. Then there is repeated, in almost identical language, the second resolution of the earlier occasion:

"The trustees, being of the opinion that none of the income of the infant beneficiaries under the above resolution is required for the maintenance of such beneficiaries, resolved that such income shall be accumulated in accordance with s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925."

I need not refer to the third of the minutes (viz., of a meeting held on Nov. 28, 1949), save to say that it followed almost precisely the language and effect of the second. It will be observed that there is this difference (and I leave out of further consideration the general language of the first resolution in so far as it indicated future policy) that in the first case the effective words are the decision "to allocate for immediate distribution" and the resolution that the £42,000 so to be distributed should "belong to" the infants in certain shares. In the second case the resolution is "to divide" the sum of cash so set out among the issue in similar shares. The wording is different, but, for the purposes we have to determine, it does not seem to me that anything turns on it. In each case, on the face of that part of these resolutions, it was a resolution wholly to dispose of, in favour of the infants, the sum of cash left over for such disposal.

I now turn to the most difficult part of the problem, namely, the effect of s. 31. The contention of counsel for the infant beneficiaries is, to put it briefly, that, as a result of the first part of the resolutions, each of the infants, in each case, acquired a vested interest in a specific portion of the income for a particular half-year which had then become available. The necessary result of his having so acquired it (says counsel) is to bring the case within s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925. The language of s. 31, I confess, is by no means easy to follow, nor does it seem to me that the section has been put together in a way which makes the task of apprehending its effect as easy as might be. Finally, the variations in language between this section and other sections in the same part of the Act add to the difficulties of the judge who is called on to pronounce on the effect of these provisions. However, we can only do our best. Section 31 (1) is as follows:

“Where any property is held by trustees in trust for any person for any interest whatsoever, whether vested or contingent, then, subject to any prior interests or charges affecting that property . . .”, a discretion is given to the trustees to apply a whole or part of the income for his maintenance during infancy. Section 31 (2) directs the trustees to accumulate the income not required for actual maintenance, and provision is made for the eventual destination of the income so accumulated in the alternative event of the infant in question either attaining or failing to attain majority. If the argument of counsel for the infant beneficiaries is correct it would follow that property was held in trust for a person for a vested interest of some sort, since on that argument each infant had acquired, by virtue of the trustees' resolution, a vested interest in a particular piece of income, derived from the property held by the trustees. That is the foundation on which the case for saying that the second part of these resolutions recording the effect of what they had done, and, in particular, the necessity for accumulation, has been rested. Counsel for the infant beneficiaries referred also to s. 31 (3), which deals with contingent interests. So far as relevant, it reads:

“This section applies in the case of a contingent interest only if the limitation or trust carries the intermediate income of the property . . .”

He says that—apart altogether, for the moment, from this resolution—the class of infant beneficiaries, the class of infant objects of the discretion, are, cumulatively and singly, persons of whom it may be said that they have a contingent interest in the trust premises. That, of course, would obviously not suffice to bring the section into operation of itself, because s. 31 (3) in terms provides that in the case of a contingent interest its application is limited to cases where the intermediate income is carried by the contingent gift. Counsel, however, says that you get over that in this way, that, as the discretion is exercised (and it must be exercised somehow each year), the absence of the qualification required by sub-s. (3) is, so to speak, remedied. I confess that, if the word “sophisticated” be fairly applicable to any part of the argument in this case, it is, to my mind, applicable to this part of the case for the infant beneficiaries, for I confess that, ingenious as is the argument, and lucid as has been, as always, its exposition by counsel for the infant beneficiaries, it leaves me entirely unpersuaded of its reality. We are dealing here with a sum of money which has been received by the trustees as income. It has accrued, it is in their hands, and there is imposed on them the obligation under cl. 7 of the settlement to distribute it, and, when they exercise that discretion, then the objects, of course, are entitled to receive the sums which the trustees decide to pay them. It seems to me inaccurate to describe the result of the exercise of this discretion as giving to the infants the right to say that they are persons who have acquired a vested interest in shares of income flowing from the corpus of the trust. I do not propose to elaborate it. I simply must record my view that that part of the argument fails to persuade me. I do not think the case does come, by that process, within s. 31 (1), or, indeed, within s. 31 at all. The result follows that, assuming the resolution to be effective according to its terms, the conclusion recorded in the minutes that s. 31 thereupon operates, in my view, is erroneous.

I have, perhaps, gone too quickly, because the first question is (and, if it is answered as HARMAN, J., answered it, the problem with which I have been dealing does not arise): Is what the trustees did either a payment to any of these infants or an application for his or her benefit? HARMAN, J., gave a negative answer to both questions. He said that, according to the ordinary sense of our language, a resolution that a large sum of money should belong to infants, or be divided between them, followed by the method which had to be adopted, because some of these infants, being about two or three years of age, certainly could not possibly give any kind of receipt, was not a payment in any ordinary sense of the word. Counsel for the adult beneficiaries analysed for us the characteristics which, according to his argument, must be necessary if one is to say of an operation that it amounts to a payment. For example, it must postulate that the money paid passes altogether from the hands of the payer to the hands of the payee, and all property in it goes to the payee. Secondly, there must with the payment be something in the nature of a discharge to the payer. I say "something in the nature of a discharge," for counsel for the adult beneficiaries does not contend that one cannot have a payment unless one can produce a receipt signed by a person of full years. Still, there must be something, says he, which constitutes a discharge, though I am not clear that that something need necessarily be any activity on the part of the payee. For myself, I incline to the same view on this matter as HARMAN, J. I am not satisfied that what the trustees did can fairly be described as a payment to any of these infants, or that the trustees ever so regarded or intended it to be. I need not, however, express a final view, because, whether or no it be a payment, I have come to the conclusion that these operations did amount to applications of these moneys for the benefit of the infants.

On that matter, HARMAN, J., after referring to the observations of LORD CRANWORTH, L.C. (6 De G.M. & G. 463) in Tench v. Cheese (1), which support the view that certainly in certain circumstances an accumulation of moneys may have been properly described as an application for the benefit of the person on whose behalf the accumulation takes place, then felt constrained (as I read the note of his judgment) by the decision of EVE, J., in Re Peel (2) to hold that in this case what had been done could not be described as an application for the benefit of the infants. I think, as I read the judge's note, that he was influenced in arriving at that conclusion by supposing that the accumulation was the essential feature of these appropriations, so that what the trustees were, in effect, doing was no more than retaining the funds in certain proportions and accumulating them in circumstances which left it still doubtful who would be the persons who would ultimately be entitled to take the money. I have already indicated (and it is for this reason I dealt with it first) that, in my view, s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925, has no application to this case, and that, I think, is material in considering whether this allocation—I will use for the moment a neutral word—could be described as an application for the infants' benefit. I think that Peel's case (2) is in a vital respect wholly different from the present. Counsel for the infant beneficiaries invited us, if necessary, to say that it was wrongly decided, and it would, of course, be open to this court, but not open to HARMAN, J., so to hold. I do not think, however, that there is any necessity, or, indeed, ground, for holding that Re Peel (2) on its facts was wrongly decided, for the essential feature in that case, to my mind, is that the sum which was there being dealt with was a fund which had already been settled, in any event, on the infant in respect of whom discretion was being exercised.

The headnote in Re Peel (2) is ([1936] Ch. 161):

"On the marriage of O.P. and V.J., H.P. the father of the husband executed a deed whereby he covenanted with trustees that if the husband should die in his lifetime he would pay them an annuity of £1,000 in trust for V.J. so long as she should remain the widow of H.P. and thereafter upon trust to pay or apply the same for or towards the maintenance, education or benefit of any of the infant children of the marriage as the trustees might think fit."

- A The husband had died, and the wife had ceased to be the widow of the husband, but there was one issue of the marriage, namely, the infant defendant in the action. In those circumstances, the covenant provided that the £1,000 per annum was to be applied for the maintenance, education or benefit of that child in any event. That being so, the effect of what the trustees did or sought to do in not paying it over to the child's mother, but accumulating it, was, in truth,
- B mere retention. The essential difference between Re Peel (2) and this case seems to be that, in the present case, it cannot be predicted of the income, or any part of it, that it is in any event given to any of these infants. The first effect of the resolution of the trustees was to give to each infant a specific portion of the income, and without that resolution the infant was entitled to no part of it at all. That seems to me to provide a very marked difference, and enable, and, indeed,
- C require, the court to say that what is here done cannot be regarded as mere retention, as was the operation impugned in Peel's case (2). If Peel's case (2) is out of the way, it comes down to this, as a matter of ordinary common sense and the use of the language: Is a provision, to take John Vestey's case, that £12,000 shall belong to John Vestey an application for his benefit? If the question be fairly posed in that way, it seems to me impossible to give any but an affirmative answer. It is surely for his benefit that the trustees should resolve that
- D £12,000, which it was in their discretion to apply to any one of a considerable number of persons, should belong to John Vestey. I, therefore, with all respect to HAERMAN, J., come to the conclusion (and I think I am unfettered by Re Peel (2), which seems quite a different case) that the first part of this resolution did amount to an application for the benefit of the infants.
- E I have already indicated my view, and I do not propose to expand it, that, treating the resolutions, as I think they should be treated, according to the sense of them on their face, as amounting to a disposition of this fund in such a way as to appropriate out and out the particular shares to the particular infants, s. 31 does not come into the picture at all. In other words, I think that the effect of each of the resolutions was so to exercise the discretion that in each
- F case each one of these infants became absolutely entitled to a particular sum of money so appropriated, and, s. 31 being inapplicable, those appropriated sums have now become part of the infants' respective estates. That is (and I come finally to the last point), unless the view which I have taken as to the non-application of s. 31 produces the result that the court should hold that there has been no effective exercise of the discretion on the ground, which I have already
- G indicated, that the trustees intended to undertake this operation on the footing that they were going to produce a specific result, and, if they produced a wholly different result, that it would not be right to say that they had exercised the discretion if the result of so holding would be to cause the resolution to have an effect which the trustees did not intend. I confess I find that not an easy problem, any more than any of the other problems in this case, and the way
- H in which the matter was put in Mr. Brown's affidavit has not, perhaps, made it any easier. I do not say that out of any discourtesy to Mr. Brown. He was stating what in truth happened, but I think one must look at the resolutions taking the thing as a whole. I am persuaded that counsel for the infant beneficiaries is right when he says that the essential thing which the trustees were doing was to make this distribution, which was a final decision how these funds should go between the infant beneficiaries. They were then of opinion that, by the ingenious encroachment on the matter of s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925, the result would be that the sums, prima facie vested in this way, became divested again and subject to the trusts imposed by the section, and they later, therefore, recorded, in order that those responsible should know what they had got to do and how to do it, that they must deal with these sums as being subject to the provisions of the various sub-sections of s. 31. They were only, therefore, setting forth the mechanical results which had got to be applied. I do not think that it can or ought to be said that, if, as I hold, the trustees wrongly thought that s. 31 would operate, then a result is produced substantially or essentially different from that which was intended. In other words, I think that the discretion was validly exercised by applying—if I take the first resolution—£42,000 for the benefit of six infants in this way, viz., appropriating £12,000 to John absolutely and £6,000 to each of the other infants absolutely as their respective absolute property. Having done that, which I hold to be an application for their benefit, I think that is the end of it.

Various examples were put of what might happen if the trustees exercised the discretion in a somewhat different way, or, indeed, if the settlement had been different and had provided, not for the exercise of a discretion, but for a power of appointment. I do not propose to embark on further discussion of those hypotheses. The settlement did not provide for a special power of appointment, but it provided for the exercise of a discretion, and we must deal with it on that footing. The language at the end of cl. 7 of the settlement is very wide in its terms, and it may, or may not, enable the trustees to apply sums for the benefit of the infants by creating, so to speak, sub-trusts of a very elaborate character. That is a matter, again, on which it is not, I think, for the court now to venture any views, still less to give any advice. The trustees will be well able to procure any advice they require. If problems arise whether, having done this, that or the other, they have done something effective, no doubt on a future occasion some other judge will have the mental exercise of determining whether the trust has worked out quite as intended. I propose to confine myself to the particular problems which are now presented in this case, and for the reasons which I have stated I would reverse the conclusion of the learned judge and hold that the particular resolutions which I have mentioned operated as effective exercises of the discretion conferred by cl. 7 in that they operated to transfer the specified sums of money to the respective infants as their absolute property respectively, and, in my judgment, the view that s. 31 then proceeded to operate on the sums so appropriated was erroneous, so that the part of the resolution recording the necessity for accumulation should, in my opinion, be disregarded. I have said that I found the case difficult and complex, and I am grateful for the assistance we have received, but, with all due diffidence, having regard to the opposite view of the learned judge, that is my conclusion.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I respectfully agree, both with the conclusions and the reasoning of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., and I have no wish to add anything under either head.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. As we are differing from the learned judge, I will venture to add a few observations of my own. As regards the first question, namely, whether these allocations in favour of infant beneficiaries were within the power of the trustees under cl. 7 of the settlement, I entirely agree with what SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., has said to the effect that such allocations were, at all events, applications of income for the benefit of the infants in whose favour they were made. Apart from any such allocation, no infant had any right to claim any part of the income, but was merely eligible to participate in any authorised distribution that the trustees might from time to time determine to make. An allocation of the kind here carried out would have the effect of making a certain provision for the infant concerned, and I cannot doubt but that the making of such a provision would be the conferring of a benefit on the infant, so that the application of income for that purpose would be an application for the infant's benefit. With respect to the learned judge, I think that, in expressing the view in relation to this question to the effect that accumulation was not application for the benefit of an infant, he overlooked the important change of title, if I may so describe it, in favour of the infant which such an allocation would bring about. It is, therefore, unnecessary to decide whether these allocations might not also be justified on the ground that they were, within the meaning of cl. 7, payments to the infants. I agree that in a strict and literal sense there

A can be no payment unless there is not only a hand to pay but also a hand to receive and a recipient capable of giving a receipt. Thus, in the strict and literal sense, there can be no payment to an infant. Words such as these, however, must be construed in their context, and, inasmuch as this is a discretionary trust in favour of a class of persons which, ex necessitate, includes infant beneficiaries, I would be disposed, if it were necessary to do so, to put a wider

B interpretation on the expression "pay," and include in it the transaction consisting of the allocation of a share of any year's income to an infant absolutely, although, owing to his infancy, no receipt is possible. The different meanings that may be attached to expressions connoting "payment," according to the context in which they appear, are illustrated, on the one hand, by Re Banbury (3), where a provision in the will under which the trustees were to set aside an annual

C sum of £15,000 free of tax was held by DANCKWERTS, J., to be a provision for the payment of a stated amount free of income tax within the meaning of s. 25 (1) of the Finance Act, 1941, though, in truth, the transaction was not in the strict sense of the word a "payment," but merely the transfer of an amount from one account to another in the hands of the same trustees. On the other hand, in Re Salaman (4) it was held that the setting aside of investments to meet a legacy

D did not amount to payment of such legacy. Those cases illustrate the proposition that the meaning of the word "pay," like any other word, must depend on the context in which it is used, and, therefore, speaking for myself, were it necessary to the decision to do so, I would be disposed to hold that the transactions here under consideration could be warranted as payments within the meaning of cl. 7. At all events, as I have said, I entirely agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED,

E M.R., that they were applications for the benefit of the infants. It follows, therefore, that these transactions had the effect of entitling the infants concerned absolutely to the amounts allocated to them respectively.

As to the second point, namely, the question whether s. 31 of the Trustee Act, 1925, applies, it is to be observed that the section, as appears from the opening words of sub-s. (1), is directed to the case "where any property is

F held by trustees in trust for any person for any interest whatsoever, whether vested or contingent." Where that condition is satisfied, then, subject to any prior interests or charges affecting the property, during the infancy of the person, if the interest so long continues, the income of that property is applicable at the discretion of the trustees for the maintenance, education or benefit of the infant. The vital provision for this purpose is not merely that income not so

G applied is to be accumulated under sub-s. (2), but that, under cl. (ii) of that sub-section, on the death of the infant under the age of twenty-one years the unapplied accumulations are to follow the destination of the property from which they arose. Thus, in the present case, if the section is applicable, the result would be that, should any of these infants die under the age of twenty-one, then the unapplied fund representing the income allocated to him or her on each occasion,

H plus the accumulations thereof, would revert to the funds under the settlement, and follow the destination of the corpus of those funds. Does s. 31 apply in the circumstances of the present case to a sum of income allocated by the trustees to an infant? For that to be the case, one must find that there is property held by trustees in trust for the infant for some interest or other, and that the amount received is income of that property. So far as corpus is concerned, the infants here have, as I understand it, contingent reversionary interests, such interests being contingent on their surviving the end of the specified period, on the happening of which event there is, to put it shortly, a trust of the corpus for the issue of Sir Edmund then living per stirpes. But sums received by the infants under the exercise of the trustees' discretion cannot, in my judgment, be regarded as income of those reversionary interests. The reversionary interests in corpus do not carry the intermediate income, and are thus excluded from s. 31 by sub-s. (3). The whole of the intermediate income is exhausted by the discretionary trust and the trust for accumulation, where applicable. Such sums as may be received by an infant by an exercise of the trustees' discretion during the continuance of the specified period bear no relation whatever to that infant's contingent reversionary interest and are taken by the infant under a different title, i.e., as an object of the discretionary trust, and not by virtue of his contingent interest in corpus. A

Next, as to income, can it be said that the infant has an interest in the property by reason of something analogous to a life or other limited interest in income? B In my judgment, on the language of this trust, that cannot be maintained. It may very well be that, if there were a trust in the form that the trustees should hold income for a period in trust for a number of persons in such shares as the trustees might determine, the shares from time to time allocated to an infant member of the class of beneficiaries should be regarded as a life interest in income, albeit of varying amount, with the result that the sums from time to time C allocated by the trustees to the infant's account would be subject to the provisions of s. 31. In this case, however, it is plain that no infant has, under the terms of the trust, any share or interest whatever in the income, unless and until the trustees, in the exercise of their discretion, decide to pay or apply to or for the support or benefit of that infant some part of the income from time to D time in hand. When that event happens, when the trustees decide to apply some part of the income in hand for the benefit of an infant, or to pay it to an infant, if the wider interpretation of that expression to which I have referred is admissible, then it seems to me that the infant becomes absolutely entitled to the amount in question by a new title consisting of the exercise of the trustees' discretion in the infant's favour, the infant having previously been merely a E person eligible to benefit under the discretion. The infant becoming entitled to the sum of income allocated to him or her under the trustees' discretion, in my judgment, must become, in accordance with the terms of the allocation, absolutely entitled to that sum. So far as I can see, the fact that in origin it was income of the fund applicable at the discretion of the trustees for a class including the infant concerned is, for the purposes of s. 31, irrelevant. The only F property in such circumstances held in trust for the infant for the purposes of s. 31 is, in my judgment, the sum of income allocated on the particular occasion. The result may, no doubt, be that any income produced by the investment of that sum is income of property held in trust for the infant which will, therefore, become subject to the provisions of s. 31, but, in my judgment, there is no room in such circumstances for the application of s. 31 on the footing that under the G settlement the sum of income in question is itself income of property held in trust for the infant. The form of cl. 7 of the settlement and the nature of the allocations here made, I think, are wholly inconsistent with that view. The sums allocated become the absolute property of the infant, with the necessary consequence that any application of s. 31 in the sense contended for is impossible.

I also agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., on the third question debated, and the result, in my judgment, is that the allocations made are valid H and must stand as absolute allocations to the infants of the amounts in question.

NALDER AND ANOTHER v. ILFORD CORPORATION.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), October 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 16, 1950.]

Public Health—Building regulations—Breach of bye-laws—Notice requiring removal of structures—Validity—“Owner” of premises—Statement as to right of appeal—Need to state right to apply for extension of time—Statutory extension of time limit—Form of notice to owner—Service on owner—Wrongful removal of structures—Damages—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 65 (1), (3), s. 300 (3), s. 343 (1)—Building Restrictions (War-Time Contraventions) Act, 1946 (c. 35), s. 3 (1).

Three adjoining properties were held on long leases at rents of £16, £15 and £15 respectively by a director of a company who let them on monthly tenancies to the company at rents of £62 10s., £62 and £62, which, being less than two-thirds of the annual values of the premises, were not rackrents within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 343 (1). The company erected on the premises five structures of breeze blocks, comprising (i) a wall with a gap in the centre, (ii) southern and eastern walls, (iii) southern, eastern and northern walls, with concrete beams and a tarpaulin cover to form a roof, (iv) a southern wall and an eastern wall including a reinforced concrete beam eighteen feet long running from wall to wall, and (v) southern, eastern and northern walls, with a wooden door at the western end and a roof. Structure (v) was used as a garage. It was intended that all the walls should in due course support roofs. Structures (iv) and (v) were erected before the end of 1945, the others in 1946. On June 14, 1946, the local authority sent a letter to the company stating: “It is . . . clear that many buildings and erections have been placed on the land at the rear of the above properties which do not comply with the council’s bye-laws and in many cases without plans having been submitted, and the council will . . . exercise their statutory powers to secure that these buildings and erections shall be either pulled down, or, in proper cases altered so as to comply with the bye-laws.” On Jan. 17, 1947, within twelve months after the completion of structures (i), (ii) and (iii) but more than twelve months after the completion of structures (iv) and (v), the local authority served a notice on the company under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 65 (1), requiring it within twenty-eight days to remove the structures as contravening the bye-laws or to effect alterations to make them comply with the bye-laws. Nothing having been done in compliance with the notice, on Apr. 24, 1947, and following days the local authority entered on the premises and demolished the structures. In an action for damages for trespass by the director and the company against the local authority, HELD: (i) the company was the owner of the premises within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 343 (1), since on the facts it would have received the rackrent of the premises if they had been let at a rackrent.

Principle stated by KENNEDY, J., in Truman, Hanbury, Buxton & Co. v. Kerslake ([1894] 2 Q.B. 778), applied.

Kensington Borough Council v. Allen ([1926] 1 K.B. 576), distinguished.

(ii) the right under s. 65 (3) of the Act of 1936 to apply to a court of summary jurisdiction for an extension of the period specified in the notice under s. 65 (1) was not a right of appeal which, under s. 300 (3), ought to have been stated in the notice of Jan. 17, 1947.

(iii) with regard to structures (iv) and (v) (in respect of which the notices were out of time under s. 65 (4) of the Act of 1936), the letter of June 14, 1946, constituted a sufficient notice to the company of the proposal of the local authority to take steps for enforcing a building law under the Building Restrictions (War-Time Contraventions) Act, 1946, s. 3 (1); but, as the director was an “owner” for the purposes of the Act, s. 3 (1) required that notice of the proposal should be served on him in that capacity; notice served on the company was not service on the director in his personal capacity; and the local authority had, therefore, failed to comply with the requirements of the Act, and its action in regard to structures (iv) and (v) was unauthorised.

(iv) the plaintiffs (separately or jointly) were entitled to receive as damages in respect of structures (iv) and (v), not the cost of reinstating the structures, since their reinstatement would constitute a further infringement of the bye-laws, but damages measured by the injury to the reversion or the diminution in the value of the land, and, there being no evidence of such special damage, general damages only for trespass would be awarded. ACTION for damages for trespass, and COUNTERCLAIM for £40 10s. 8d., the reasonable expenses of the demolition and/or removal of buildings not complying with bye-laws under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 65 (3). E

The plaintiff, Nalder, was the leaseholder from the London County Council of 153, 155 and 157 Becontree Avenue, Ilford, at rents of £16 a year for No. 153 and £15 a year each for Nos. 155 and 157. He had let all three properties to the plaintiff company, Ilford and Dagenham Properties, Ltd., of which he was a director owning with his wife all but two of the shares, under an oral agreement on monthly tenancies at yearly rents of £62 10s. for No. 153 and £62 each for Nos. 155 and 157. On Apr. 24, 1947, purporting to act under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 65 (3), the Ilford Corporation entered on the three properties and demolished five structures thereon as being unauthorised buildings which contravened the building bye-laws and were an unsatisfactory development of the estate in which they were situated. The plaintiffs claimed that this action constituted a trespass on the ground that: (i) the notices required to be served on the owner of the premises under s. 65 (1) were out of time under s. 65 (4), having been served more than twelve months after the completion of the erection of the structures; (ii) the structures were not buildings to which the bye-laws applied; (iii) the company on which the notices were served was not the "owner" of the structures within the meaning of s. 343 (1) of the Act of 1936; (iv) the notices were invalid as not complying with the requirements in s. 300 (3) of the Act of 1936 in that they did not specify the recipients' right of appeal against the decision of the corporation. The corporation disputed contentions (ii), (iii) and (iv) and, as to contention (i), said that the time was extended by the Building Restrictions (War-Time Contraventions) Act, 1946, s. 1 (1). F G H

SELLERS, J. : The individual plaintiff, Lawrence Marcus Nalder, is a director of the plaintiff company, Ilford and Dagenham Properties, Ltd., in which he and his wife are the owners of all but two of the hundred £1 shares, the capital of the company. Mr. Nalder is the leaseholder of a substantial number of properties in, and in the neighbourhood of, Becontree Avenue, Ilford, and, in particular, of Nos. 153, 155 and 157 Becontree Avenue, the properties with which this case is concerned. All three properties are held on long leases from the London County Council, No. 153 at a rent of £16 a year and the other two at £15 a year each. Mr. Nalder holds No. 153 Becontree Avenue as executor of his father's estate. From July, 1944, all three properties were let to the company on an oral agreement at a rent of £62 10s. a year for No. 153 and £62 a year for each of the other two on monthly tenancies. The properties in question consisted of premises designed for shops with residential accommodation above. In addition there had been erected in the gardens or space at the back of the main premises a number of buildings or structures which the defendant corporation regarded as unauthorised buildings which contravened the building bye-laws and were an unsatisfactory development of the estate in which they were situated. On Apr. 24, 1947, and some days thereafter the defendants by their servants entered on the three premises and demolished the following structures which are referred to on an agreed plan: No. 1, a southern wall in two parts (it has a gap or entrance in the middle); No. 2, the southern and eastern wall; No. 3, the southern wall, which is also the northern wall of No. 2, the eastern wall and the northern wall, and such cover as there was over that structure, being a number of cross concrete beams carrying a tarpaulin sheet or sheets; No. 4, the southern wall of which is also the northern wall of No. 3, and the eastern wall including a reinforced concrete beam eighteen feet long running from wall to wall; and No. 5, the building referred to as a garage and the link-up just to the south of it, the southern, eastern and northern walls of that building and a wooden door at the western end.

In this action, the plaintiffs allege that these acts were unlawful, and claim damages for trespass. By their defence the defendants admit they entered on the premises and carried out the demolitions, but they deny that they acted illegally or trespassed and allege that they acted under powers conferred on them by the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 65.

On Jan. 17, 1947, the defendant corporation served a notice headed "Public Health Act, 1936," on the plaintiff company in respect of each of the properties in question alleging in the case of No. 153 that the company were erecting a building, and in the other two cases that they had erected a building, which contravened the bye-laws. The buildings concerned were identified on a plan, and the infringements alleged were set out. The notice in each case required the company either to pull down or remove the work in question, or, if they so elected, to effect such alterations as might be necessary to make the work comply with the bye-laws within twenty-eight days from receipt of the notice. Nothing in compliance was done by the plaintiffs or either of them within twenty-eight days or at all, and the defendant corporation allege that they were entitled under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 65 (3), to pull down the works, as they admittedly have done. If the three notices were valid, the defendant corporation have statutory sanction for doing that of which the plaintiffs complain. The plaintiffs allege that the notices were invalid, and a number of issues have arisen between the parties which call for determination.

The Public Health Act, 1936, s. 65 (4), provides that no such notice

"... shall be given after the expiration of twelve months from the date of the completion of the work in question ..."

I find that Nos. 1, 2 and 3 structures on the plan were erected in 1946 within the twelve months preceding the notice, but that Nos. 4 and 5 were erected before the end of 1945, and were, therefore, outside the period. The defendant corporation, apparently, took the view, and sought to establish before me, that Nos. 4 and 5 were constructed in 1946, but, having heard the witnesses and weighed the evidence, I feel no doubt that on this point the plaintiffs' evidence should be accepted. The notices, therefore, in respect of No. 155 in part and No. 157 were out of time under the Public Health Act, 1936, but the defendant corporation seek to rely on the Building Restrictions (War-Time Contraventions) Act, 1946, for an extension of the time, which contention I shall consider later.

[His LORDSHIP said that it was further submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs that the structures in question (or some of them) were not buildings to which the bye-laws applied. He considered the nature of the structures which had been demolished, and found that they had been constructed of breeze blocks, with a thin cement washing. No. 5 had a roof of similar material, and it had been intended that the walls of the other structures would in time support roofs. He held that the structures were buildings to which the bye-laws applied, and found it unnecessary to consider in detail Stevens v. Gourley (1) or other authorities cited to him where the question whether a structure was a building arose in different circumstances, and he continued:]

I deal next with the issue whether the notices were rightly served on the plaintiff company. Section 65 (1) of the Act requires the owner to be given notice

"... either to pull down or remove the work or, if he so elects, to effect such alterations therein as may be necessary to make it comply with the bye-laws."

The word "owner" is defined in s. 343 (1) of the Act as follows:

" 'Owner' means the person for the time being receiving the rackrent of the premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if those premises were let at a rackrent."

The term "rackrent" is defined thus:

" 'rackrent' in relation to any property means a rent which is not less than two-thirds of the rent at which the property might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free from all usual tenant's rates and taxes, and tithe rentcharge (if any), and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance and other expenses (if any) necessary to maintain the same in a state to command such rent."

I accept the evidence of the valuer called by the defendant corporation that £62 and £62 10s. are rents which are not rackrents. Mr. Nalder, therefore, was not the "owner" within the meaning of the Public Health Act. At the commencement of this judgment I set out the letting of the properties to the plaintiff company, and in the circumstances I find that the plaintiff company would be the person who would receive the same if the premises were let at a rackrent.

Various cases were cited to me in the course of the argument, but the circumstances were different in each case, and I think that I need only mention them. Reliance on Bowditch v. Wakefield Local Board (2) was placed by the defendant corporation in respect of the submission made by them which I accept. Truman, Hanbury, Buxton & Co. v. Kerlake (3) was also cited, and I think I might helpfully read an extract from the judgment of the Divisional Court in that case delivered by KENNEDY, J. I do not think that I need particularly refer to the facts of that case, but KENNEDY, J., says ([1894] 2 Q.B. 778):

"It appears to us to be impossible to treat as the person who would receive the rackrent, if the premises were let at a rackrent, persons who, at the time when the 'owner' of premises, as defined by s. 141 [of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891], has to be found, have not such an interest in the property that, if it was let at a rackrent, they would receive such rackrent. The

A words of the section, in our judgment, in the case of there being no one who in fact receives a rackrent from the actual occupier, designate as 'owner' the person who rebus sic stantibus, that is to say, with the interests in the premises as they then are, would, if they were let to an occupier at a rackrent, receive that rackrent. In this case, whilst the sub-lease to Aslett subsists, that is to say, for the next thirty and a half years and until a date only eleven days anterior to the expiring of the appellants' own interests, the appellants could not let to any one. The only person who could let the premises at a rackrent, the only person whose interest in the premises places him in a position to receive a rackrent, is Bishop, the assignee of the sub-lease to Aslett. His interest as assignee of that sub-lease gives him the power of so letting; and if the premises were so let, he is the person who would receive the rackrent. He chooses, it is true, to occupy the premises himself; but we see nothing to prevent the same person being both occupier of the premises and the 'owner' within the meaning of this section. The cases referred to in the course of the argument before us, Bowditch v. Wakefield Local Board (2) and Wright v. Ingle (4) in which questions as to the meaning of the term 'owner' in similar provisions of the Public Health Act, 1848, and the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, are raised, are not decisions directly in point; but there are passages in some of the judgments in those cases which appear to us, to some extent at least, to support the conclusion to which we have come in this case."

D I think that case and the authorities cited support the conclusion at which I have arrived. In the present case reliance was placed strongly by counsel for the plaintiffs on Kensington Borough Council v. Allen (5), but I think the complete answer is that there there was in fact a rackrent being paid, and that case, therefore, is not in point. On the evidence which I have accepted from the valuer here there was no rackrent being paid, and I have come to the conclusion, as I have said, that the company would be the person to receive the rackrent if there was one. Therefore, I hold that the company were rightly served.

E It was further submitted that the notices were invalid because they did not comply with the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 300 (3), which provides:

"In any case where such an appeal [i.e., to a court of summary jurisdiction] lies, the document notifying to the person concerned the decision of the council in the matter shall state the right of appeal to a court of summary jurisdiction and the time within which such an appeal may be brought."

F The notices in this case did not make any reference to a right of appeal. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that under s. 65 (3) there was such a right, and that, therefore, the notices are invalid because they failed to include a statement in regard to it. Section 65 (3) provides:

G "If a person to whom a notice has been given under the foregoing provisions of this section fails to comply with the notice before the expiration of twenty-eight days, or such longer period as a court of summary jurisdiction may on his application allow, the local authority may pull down or remove the work in question . . ."

H It is contended (and, I think, rightly contended) that that sub-section gives the right to a person so situated to apply to a court of summary jurisdiction to extend the time, and it is argued that such an application is a right of appeal which should have been stated on the notice.

I was referred to s. 290 by counsel for the defendant corporation. Both that section and s. 300 appear in Part XII of the Public Health Act, 1936. Section 290 (1) provides:

"The following provisions of this section shall, subject to any express modifications specified in the section under which the notice is given, apply in relation to any notice given under this Act which is expressly declared to be a notice in relation to which the provisions of this Part of this Act with respect to appeals against, and the enforcement of, notices requiring the execution of works are to apply."

Reference was also made to s. 39 and s. 60 where—if I may take s. 39 (1) as an illustration—there is to be found an express stipulation in these terms:

"The provisions of Part XII of this Act with respect to appeals against, and the enforcement of, notices requiring the execution of works shall apply in relation to any notice given under this sub-section."

It is to be observed that s. 300 (1) provides:

"Where any enactment in this Act provides—(a) for an appeal to a court of summary jurisdiction against a requirement, refusal or other decision of a council; or (b) for any matter to be determined by, or an application in respect of any matter to be made to, a court of summary jurisdiction, the procedure shall be by way of complaint for an order, and the Summary Jurisdiction Acts shall apply to the proceedings."

Reference is thus made in s. 300 both to "appeal" and "application." Sub-section (3) relates only to appeals, and would appear, therefore, to refer to s. 300 (1) (a) but not expressly to s. 300 (1) (b).

It is clear that if a statute, even if it is only in form, requires that particulars of such a right of appeal should be given in a notice, the notice would be invalid if they were omitted. In Rayner v. Stepney Corpn. (6) part of the statutory form was omitted from the notice, but in a later case, Arlidge v. Tottenham Urban Council (7), it was held that the notice served by a local authority under the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act, 1919, s. 28, was not rendered invalid because it omitted to state that the owner had the right of appeal mentioned in one of the sections of an Act which was applicable, and Rayner v. Stepney Corpn. (6) was distinguished. It appears that, apart from a statutory obligation, notwithstanding the desirability of inserting this information, it does not invalidate a notice if information as to a right such as is given here is omitted, and I do not find in the Public Health Act, 1936, an express provision that an application to extend time has to be notified to a person concerned. Such an application is not rightly described as an appeal, and where the statute uses in the same section the words "appeal" and "application" I see no reason for giving them both the same meaning. It was not contended before me that the buildings did not infringe the bye-laws, and, in my view, the evidence sufficiently establishes that they did in some at least of the ways alleged. For the reasons I have given, therefore, I find that the notices in respect of Nos. 1, 2 and 3 were valid and in accordance with the statutory powers of the corporation and that they provide a complete answer to the plaintiffs' claim relating to those buildings.

I turn now to consider buildings Nos. 4 and 5 which were not erected within twelve months of the service of the respective notices. The Building Restrictions (War-Time Contraventions) Act, 1946, s. 1 (1), provides that where during the war period—which is from Sept. 3, 1939, to Mar. 26, 1946—works on land have been carried out which do not comply with a building law, any period of time limiting the taking of steps for enforcing the law shall be calculated without regard to time elapsing during the war period. Section 2 (1) of the Act provides:

"At any time before the expiration of five years from the end of the war period, a person entitled to make an application under this sub-section with respect to any land may apply to an authority responsible for enforcing any building law or planning control for a determination under this section with respect to works on the land carried out, or a use of the land begun, during the war period."

Sub-section (2) requires the authority, on an application being made to it, to determine whether the works have failed to comply with the building laws or planning, and, if so, to specify the law or control in question. Sub-section (3) requires the authority further to determine if works or use fail to comply as aforesaid

"... whether having regard to all relevant circumstances the works or use shall, notwithstanding the failure, be deemed so to comply either unconditionally or subject to ..."

A conditions. Section 2 (4) provides:

"An application under sub-s. (1) of this section may be made with respect to any land by the owner or occupier thereof, or by any person who proves that he has or intends to acquire an interest in the land which will be affected by a determination given on such an application or that he has borne any of the cost of carrying out works on the land during the war period."

Either of the plaintiffs, therefore, might well have made application under s. 2. Section 3 (1) of the Act provides:

"Where during the period of five years beginning with the end of the war period any person proposes to take steps for enforcing a building law or planning control in the case of works on land not complying with the law or control in question carried out during the war period, or a use of land not complying with the planning control in question begun during that period, then—(a) unless an application under the last foregoing section in relation to the land has been made which has not been finally determined, he shall serve on every owner and occupier of the land not less than twenty-eight days' notice of the proposal, and if within the said period of twenty-eight days any person makes an application under the last foregoing section in relation to the land and within seven days of the making thereof serves on the person proposing to take steps as aforesaid notice that the application has been made, no steps for enforcing the law or control shall be taken until the final determination of the application; (b) if such an application has been made which has not been finally determined, no such steps shall be taken until the final determination thereof: Provided that no notice shall be required under paragraph (a) of this sub-section if steps for enforcing a building law or planning control in the case of any works on land are begun within twenty-eight days of the final determination of an application ..."

H

I find that the works, Nos. 4 and 5, were carried out in the war period, and, therefore, the Act and those provisions relating to them which I have just read apply. On that finding it is urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that the defendant corporation have failed to comply with the requirements of the Act of 1946 in two respects: (i) that the corporation have not served notice that they propose to take steps to enforce the building laws at all; and (ii) that they have not served such a notice or proposal on the owner or occupier, and, therefore, as a consequence, that they have not shown that their entry on these premises and their demolition was sanctioned by statute and was legal and valid.

The corporation rely on a letter of June 14, 1946, which was sent by them to the plaintiff company. The letter concerned a number of matters. It was headed with reference to a considerable number of different properties in which Nos. 153, 155 and 157 were included, and I find these words in the third paragraph:

"It is also clear that many buildings and erections have been placed on the land at the rear of the above properties which do not comply with the council's bye-laws and in many cases without plans having been submitted, and the council will also exercise their statutory powers to secure that these buildings and erections shall be either pulled down, or, in proper cases, altered so as to comply with the bye-laws."

I find that that letter is adequate though it is an informal, and, perhaps, fortuitous, fulfilment of the requirements stating the corporation's intentions under the Act of 1946. The letter has been contrasted with a formal notice that was put in which, no doubt, would have been served if the corporation had accepted the position or recognised the position that some of the works carried out on these properties were properly described as works having been carried out in the war period. On the evidence which they had (and which they thought accurate) the corporation took the view, the erroneous view as I find, that they had been erected after the war period. Nevertheless, although that form of notice was given, as I read this letter I think it sufficiently complies with the requirements of indicating in its terms the course which the council proposed to take. There is no form specified in the Act of 1946, and, in my view, the letter is sufficient.

The second question that arises is whether that notice of proposal has been served in accordance with the requirements of the Act. The letter was addressed to the plaintiff company. Mr. Nalder was a director of the company, and I think at one time he signed letters as assistant secretary. It may well be (and the probability is) that he was well informed of all the activities of the company and received this letter, which came by registered post, or read it shortly after it was received by the company. But s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1946 requires that this notice of proposal, as it has been conveniently called, shall be served "on every owner and occupier of the land." The word "owner" there has the same meaning as it has in the Housing Act, 1936. That Act, by s. 188 (1), defines the word "owner":

" 'Owner,' in relation to any building or land, means a person other than a mortgagee not in possession, who is for the time being entitled to dispose of the fee simple of the building or land, whether in possession or in reversion . . . "

The person or authority which is entitled to dispose of the fee simple of the building or land is the London County Council, and under this definition, as I see it, they are "owners." The definition continues:

" . . . and includes also a person holding or entitled to the rents and profits of the building or land under a lease or agreement, the unexpired term whereof exceeds three years."

That person would appear to be Mr. Nalder. If this definition visualises, as it seems to, two owners, Mr. Nalder is to be regarded as an owner, and I have come to the conclusion, though not without some doubt, that I should so regard him. In those circumstances, if that be right, s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1946 requires that a notice should be served on him in that capacity. Notice served on the limited company, notwithstanding Mr. Nalder's close relationship to that company and the other observations I have made about his knowledge of the matter, was not a notice served on the owner, and where trespass is alleged and statutory authority is relied on the court must see that the requirements of the statute are fully and completely fulfilled. I must reject the suggestion that, because I could make a finding of fact (as I think I could) that Mr. Nalder knew of the contents of this notice and knew precisely as much as the limited company knew, there has not been a failure to serve on him the notice which the Act of 1946 requires. That being so, it seems to me that there has been a failure on the part of the defendant corporation, in that one particular only, to show that they acted in complete compliance with their statutory rights in doing what they did in Apr. 24, 1947, in regard to these two premises, and these two premises only—Nos. 4 and 5; and I find, therefore, that there was a failure to establish that statutory defence on which alone reliance has been placed.

Finding, as I do, that the entry on these premises and the demolition of the walls of No. 4 and the garage of No. 5 is unjustified, the question of damages then arises. Damages are claimed by both the plaintiffs in respect of these two buildings. It is said (and rightly said) that the company has the right to immediate possession, and, therefore, is entitled to recover damages for trespass, and that the plaintiff, Mr. Nalder, is entitled to damages for the injury to the reversion which it is said is damaged. The way in which the damages are claimed is, I think, erroneous. It has been claimed that the plaintiffs or one or other of them should have the cost of reinstating the garage No. 5 and the walls of No. 4, but I think that is not the right measure of damages. Indeed, it would be a curious position if it were, because I am satisfied that the condition in which were these two structures was an infringement of the bye-laws, and it would be wrong to assess the damages as the cost of putting up once again a structure which would be the subject-matter of complaint. The true assessment of damage in this case, I think, would be the injury to the reversion or the diminution in value of the land, and of that I have no evidence. Another factor which bears on any claim for special damage is that, notwithstanding that I have found that by this omission to serve Mr. Nalder the notice was invalid and inoperative, the premises, nevertheless, were at any time within a period of five years likely, having regard to that condition, to be dealt with properly by the local authority, and the tenure of the company of those premises might have been very short. I think that on the evidence as it stands and the complete lack of any basis on which I can assess any special damages, I should not give any special damages at all. I think that no damage has been proved to my satisfaction. But this being a case of trespass, damages do flow and considerations have to be weighed as to what damages should be given or what is in a sense a technical trespass. I appreciate the intrusion on the rights of the parties, and that must not be permitted without full legal sanction and everything being done which ought to be done. I think that Mr. Nalder and the company were knowingly, and, perhaps, in war-time desirably, flouting the building regulations, but when the war was over that his and the company's attitude was not helpful on this matter and that the buildings were legitimately the cause of complaint by the corporation. In the circumstances I think that the right damages to award would be the sum of £25 to each of the plaintiffs for general damages for the wrong which the defendant corporation have committed by the omission which I have indicated, and there will be judgment accordingly.

Judgment for the defendants in respect of buildings Nos. 1, 2 and 3. Judgment for the plaintiffs for £25 each in respect of buildings Nos. 4 and 5. Plaintiffs to have half the taxed costs. Counterclaim dismissed without costs.

Criminal Law—Depositions—Evidence given in answer to leading questions—Validity of committal—Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (c. 42), s. 17.

The appellant was convicted at quarter sessions of robbery. He contended that before the examining justices the depositions had been taken as a result of the witnesses being asked leading questions, and that in consequence the committal was bad.

HELD: the evidence had been taken from the witnesses and put into writing as was required by the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 17, and, though the practice of obtaining the evidence by asking leading questions was undesirable, the fact that it had been followed in the present case did not invalidate the committal.

APPEAL against conviction at the Bolton Borough Quarter Sessions on a charge of robbery. The ground of appeal was that the depositions had been taken by means of leading questions and, therefore, the committal of the appellant for trial was bad. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Spafford for the appellant.

I. D. L. Glidewell for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted at Bolton Borough Quarter Sessions of robbery from a woman whom he accosted in the street as if she had been a prostitute. When she resented his behaviour, he stole her bag and ran off with it, but dropped it on being chased. The only ground of appeal is that there was a wrongful committal for trial because, the appellant says, the depositions were taken by means of leading questions put to the witnesses. As was pointed out by this court in R. v. Gee, R. v. Bibby, R. v. Dunscombe (1), as there are no longer grand juries (they having been abolished in 1933), it is important that the committal for trial should be regular because it really takes the place of the finding of the true bill by the grand jury.

The Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 17, under which examining justices sit and which prescribes their procedure, provides that in all cases where any person shall appear before any justices “... charged with any indictable offence ... such justice or justices, before he or they shall commit such accused person to prison for trial, or before he or they shall admit him to bail, shall, in the presence of such accused person, who shall be at liberty to put questions to any witness produced against him take the statement on oath or affirmation of those who shall know the facts and circumstances of the case, and shall put the same into writing, and such depositions shall be read over to and signed respectively by the witnesses who shall have been so examined, and shall be signed also by the justice or justices taking the same; and the justice or justices before whom any such witness shall appear to be examined as aforesaid shall, before such witness is examined, administer to such witness the usual oath or affirmation, which such justice or justices shall have full power and authority to do ...”

In R. v. Gee (1) no depositions were taken at all, but a statement was signed by the witness, who said it was before him and approved it, and it was handed in to the court. The justices thought, perhaps with some reason, that that was a convenient procedure, but we were obliged to hold that it did not comply with the statute. In the present case the recorder was satisfied, and evidence was given to show, that the witnesses here were asked questions. Whether they were asked leading questions or not does not matter for the purpose of the Act, because the Act does not say that they are not to be asked leading questions. There is no doubt that it would be very wrong for justices

A to allow a witness simply to be examined from a statement, the examining solicitor or counsel pausing now and again for him to say "yes" or "no." In this case, no doubt, the evidence was given in answer to leading questions because the appellant had made a statement beforehand in which he admitted all the facts. At the trial he asked the jury to draw other inferences than those suggested by the prosecution, but so far as the facts were concerned he admitted speaking to the woman, approaching her in an indecent manner in the street, and then taking her handbag from her. He set up the defence that he was trying to defend himself as she was attacking him with the handbag, but that is another matter.

B No injustice has been done, and we cannot possibly say that, because leading questions were put when the case was before the justices, that invalidates the whole committal. It does not. It may not be a desirable way of taking the evidence, but it is not a breach of the statute because under s. 17 the evidence is to be taken from the witnesses and put into writing, and that was done. We cannot hold that there has been a bad committal for trial, and, therefore, we cannot interfere with this conviction.

Appeal dismissed.

Re GREEN (deceased). LINDNER v. GREEN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), October 12, 16, 1950.]

E Will—Mutual wills—Identical terms—Husband and wife—Recital of agreement to make mutual wills—Each given absolute interest—In case of lapse, residuary estate divided into moiety, one moiety to be regarded as testator's personal moiety and the other as deceased spouse's moiety—Fresh will by husband after accepting benefit under wife's will—Implied trust in regard to wife's moiety of husband's residuary estate—Whether pecuniary legatees entitled to take as beneficiaries under trusts of wife's moiety and as legatees of similar legacies under second will.

F On Aug. 31, 1940, the testator and his first wife executed wills in identical form, mutatis mutandis. Clause 3 of each will recited that it was agreed between the spouses that, if the survivor of them had the use of the other's property during his or her lifetime, he or she would provide in his or her will for carrying out the wishes expressed in the will of the other. By G his will of Aug. 31, 1940, the testator gave his residuary estate, including his half share in their residence, to the first wife absolutely if she should survive him, but, if she should not survive him, he gave the house in its entirety to a certain hospital and directed that the remainder of his residuary estate should be divided into two equal shares, one moiety being considered as his own personal estate and the other moiety as the equivalent to any H benefit which he had received from the first wife by reason of her predeceasing him. By cl. 6 (b) he disposed of the half share which he regarded as his personal estate, and by cl. 6 (c) he disposed of the half share which he regarded as the first wife's moiety. The first wife died on Apr. 28, 1942, and, under the terms of her will, her residuary estate passed to the testator absolutely. On Sept. 25, 1945, the testator re-married, and on Dec. 19, 1946, he made a second will, whereby he gave certain pecuniary legacies, some of which were to beneficiaries to whom he had given pecuniary legacies

(though not in every case of an identical amount) by cl. 6 (c) of the will of Aug. 31, 1940. Subject to these and other legacies, he gave the whole of his residuary estate to his second wife. The testator died on Dec. 27, 1946, and the will of Dec. 19, 1946, was admitted to probate as his last will.

HELD: (i) as the testator's will of Aug. 31, 1940, and his first wife's will of the same date each contained a recital of the arrangement between them to make mutual wills and as the testator had approved the first wife's will by accepting her property thereunder, the provisions contained in his first will in regard to (a) the gift of the house to the hospital and (b) the disposition of the first wife's notional half share of the testator's residuary estate took effect as a trust, and, therefore, the executors of the last will held his estate on trust, first to give effect to the gift of the house to the hospital and then to carry into effect the provisions of cl. 6 (c) of the first will out of one half of the moiety of the residue, the other moiety passing under the provisions contained in the testator's last will.

Dufour v. Pereira (1769) (1 Dick. 419), applied.

(ii) as the pecuniary legacies given by the last will were not in every case identical with the pecuniary legacies given to the same legatees under cl. 6 (c) of the first will, the beneficiaries were entitled to take both a share in the trust fund under cl. 6 (c) and the legacies under the last will.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine inter alia whether the executors of the testator's last will held his estate on trust to give effect to all or any, and, if so, which, of the trusts contained in an earlier will, made by the testator under an arrangement with his first wife, and containing, mutatis mutandis, similar provisions to those in the first wife's will, executed on the same date as the testator's earlier will. The first wife predeceased the testator, and, under the terms of her will, he took an absolute interest in the residue of her estate. Later, he re-married and made a fresh will which was admitted to probate as his last will. The facts and the relevant provisions of the wills appear in the judgment.

VAISEY, J.: This summons raises a curious point which concerns the wills, which may be described as mutual or joint wills, of a husband and his wife, and the effect which those joint wills, or one of them, has in the events which have happened.

The testator, John Green, died on Dec. 27, 1946. He left a will, dated Dec. 19, 1946, which has been admitted to probate as his last will. That will was proved in March, 1947, and the estate which passed under it is of a value of £17,000, or thereabouts, with regard to personalty and a further £1,000 with regard to certain freehold property. The testator left a widow, Rosie Green, his second wife, the first defendant to this summons, whom he married on Sept. 25, 1945. His first wife, Ellen May Green, died on Apr. 28, 1942. The wills, in identical form, mutatis mutandis, which she and the testator made on Aug. 31, 1940, are the documents which give rise to the problem which it now falls to me to solve. I will call the testator's will of Dec. 19, 1946, which was admitted to probate, his second will, and the will which I am about to describe, his first will. I think that that document, combined with the corresponding document executed by the testator's first wife, contain all the evidence and information which is admissible and material in regard to the effect, if any, of those two documents.

In his first will, the testator, after appointing his first wife and his solicitor to be executors and trustees thereof, proceeded (in cl. 3) to recite as follows:

"Whereas my dear wife the said Ellen May Green has agreed with me that if she shall survive me and shall have the use of all my property during her lifetime without any liability to account she will provide in her will for the carrying out of my wishes as expressed in this my will for the event that I shall survive her and in consideration of such promise by me she has agreed to leave me all her property on my undertaking to provide for the carrying out of the terms of her will as expressed in her will of even date herewith for the event that she shall survive me and for that purpose I have provided as in cl. 6 (b) and (c) hereof below set out . . ."

He then referred to the fact that under the will of Mrs. Eleanor Hurst, who had died in 1939, the whole of her residuary estate had been given to him and his first wife absolutely, subject to the life interest therein of Mrs. Hurst's sister, Miss Bertha Nicoll. This gift was not to the husband and wife jointly, but to the husband and wife in equal shares, and, if only one of them should survive Mrs. Hurst it went to that one absolutely. The testator went on to recite as follows:

"... and whereas if either I the said John Green or my wife the said Ellen May Green shall have predeceased the said Bertha Nicoll the whole of the said residue will in consequence of the above provision pass to the survivor and whereas we the said John Green and Ellen May Green have agreed in that event to provide in our respective wills for the carrying out so far as applicable of the terms of each other's wills in so far as they shall be capable of being carried into effect just as if we had in any event both survived the said Bertha Nicoll and received half her estate and for that purpose I have provided as in cl. 6 (b) and (c) hereof below set out."

By cl. 4 the testator gave all his furniture and personal effects of every description to his wife:

"... but if I predecease her I direct that the same should be sold and the proceeds thereof be held upon trusts of my residuary estate."

By cl. 5 the testator gave all the rest of his property to his trustees on trust for sale and conversion, payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and then for investment. Clause 6 is sub-divided into heads (a), (b) and (c). By cl. 6 (a) the testator directed the trustees to stand possessed of the residuary estate on trust for the first wife if she should survive the testator, but, if she should not survive the testator, then:

"Upon trust as to the entirety of the said premises 141 Billy Lows Lane Potters Bar and all the household furniture therein for the Potters Bar Hospital absolutely . . ."

As the first wife did not survive the testator, the direction in this will as to the entirety of the premises, No. 141 Billy Lows Lane, Potters Bar, and the furniture therein, going to the Potters Bar Hospital absolutely would seem to have become effective. The testator then went on:

"... and as to the remainder of my residuary estate upon trust to divide into two equal moieties or half shares and to hold the respective half shares upon the trusts following that is to say: (b) (1) As to one such moiety or half share which shall be considered as my own personal estate as distinct from the other half share which shall be considered as equivalent to any benefit I have received by the previous death of my said wife or by reason of her predeceasing the said Bertha Nicoll my trustees shall hold such half share upon trust."

After providing for the payment of a number of legacies, he gave the residue of that moiety in equal shares to certain charitable institutions. Thus, cl. 6 (b) of the will is a complete testamentary disposition of property which the testator said was to be considered as his own personal estate. I call attention to that, because it may well be that the effect of this document on that moiety is entirely different from what is the case with regard to the other moiety. Clause 6 (c) deals with the other moiety or half share, which, as the testator says at the beginning of cl. 6 (c) (1),

"... shall be considered as the benefit I shall have received by virtue of my said dear wife having predeceased me ..."

Clause 6 (c) (1) continues:

"... in pursuance of the above recited premises my trustees shall hold the same upon trust."

Clause 6 (c) (2) contains directions to invest £2,000 free of legacy duty, to pay the net income therefrom by instalments to the first wife's brother, Ben Hinsley, and from and after his death to a certain hospital. Then there are a number of pecuniary legacies, and, finally, by cl. 6 (c) (5), the residue of that half share is to be divided in equal shares among certain charitable institutions.

I need not state with any great particularity the contents of the first wife's will, which is, mutatis mutandis, in terms which correspond very closely with the terms of the testator's will of Aug. 31, 1940. The first wife's will was duly proved by the testator and the solicitor, the two executors under the will, on Feb. 23, 1943. Her estate was of a value of about £1,500, including the half share of the premises, 141 Billy Lows Lane. Miss Bertha Nicoll, the tenant for life under the will of Mrs. Eleanor Hurst, died on Apr. 5, 1943, and thereupon the whole of Mrs. Hurst's residuary estate went to the testator as the survivor of himself and his first wife. This estate was of the approximate value of £15,400, with the result that, when the testator died, his estate was of the value which I have already mentioned, that is to say, far exceeding the value which attached to the first wife's estate. By his marriage to his second wife, on Sept. 25, 1945, the testator's first will, so far as it would take effect as a will, was, of course, revoked. By the second will, which he made after his second marriage, after appointing his second wife and two other persons to be his trustees, he gave a number of legacies, to which I shall call attention at a later stage, and then gave his residuary estate on trust for his second wife absolutely.

The first question is: Am I to ignore altogether the first will of the testator, or does the execution of that will contemporaneously with the corresponding will of his first wife operate by way of trust to any, and, if so, what, extent? There is some authority on the question of mutual or joint wills, but it does not afford me much assistance. The choice which is open to me is between three possibilities. First, it has been argued that, whatever may be the moral consequences of what was done, no one is entitled to claim anything under the testator's first will, and it can be regarded as revoked, first by his second marriage and again by his second will. Secondly, it has been argued that the whole of the first will has to be carried into effect, both as regards what the testator called the moiety which he regarded as his own personal property and as regards the other moiety which was to be considered as the benefit which he had received by virtue of the first wife having predeceased him. The third possibility is whether, having regard to the arrangement between the husband and the first wife—for arrangement undoubtedly it was, in view of the recital at the beginning of cl. 3—effect has to be given to that arrangement with regard only to the second moiety.

The authorities, in my opinion, are not very helpful. First there is Dufour v. Pereira (1), which was decided by LORD CAMDEN, L.C., on July 18, 1769. In HARGRAVE'S JURIDICAL ARGUMENTS, vol. II, p. 304, at the end of his opinion on "The Walpole Case of Mutual Wills," [Walpole (Lord) v. Orford (Lord) (2)], that learned lawyer refers to Dufour v. Pereira (1) and sets out at length the judgment of LORD CAMDEN, L.C., which he describes (ibid., p. 311) as "energetic and eloquent." It is clear, I think, from that judgment, that no reluctance was felt in saying that, when a will had been executed with a promise sufficiently definite and clear, and for a proper consideration, a trust could be raised quite apart from the character of the document. LORD CAMDEN, L.C., said (ibid., p. 310):

"The parties by the mutual will do each of them devise, upon the engagement of the other, that he will likewise devise in manner therein mentioned. The instrument itself is the evidence of the agreement; and he, that dies first, does by his death carry the agreement on his part into execution. If the other then refuses, he is guilty of a fraud, can never unbind himself, and becomes a trustee of course. For no man shall deceive another to his prejudice. By engaging to do something that is in his power, he is made a trustee for the performance, and transmits that trust to those who claim under him. This court is never deceived by the form of instruments. The actions of men here are stripped of their legal clothing, and appear in their first naked simplicity. Good faith and conscience are the rules, by which every transaction is judged in this court; and there is not an instance to be found since the jurisdiction was established, where one man has ever been released from his engagement, after the other has performed his part. I have perhaps given myself more trouble than was necessary upon this point; because, if it could be doubtful, whether after the husband's death his wife could be at liberty to revoke her part of the mutual will, it is most clear, that she has estopped herself to this defence, by an actual confirmation of the mutual will—not only by proving it, but by accepting and enjoying an interest under it. She receives this benefit, takes possession of all her husband's estates, submits to the mutual will as long as she lives, and then breaks the agreement after her death. In this view the case falls within the rule of Noys v. Mordaunt (3). She takes under the joint will and can take no otherwise."

Those observations, I think, are in point, and I confess that the only difficulty which I feel is whether effect should be given to the whole of the first will of the testator in the case now before me, or only to that part which relates to the moiety which he has allocated to and associated with his wife. Before I decide that question, I will refer to other cases dealing with this point. In Re Oldham (4), a decision of ASTBURY, J., the headnote is ([1925] Ch. 75):

"A husband and wife made mutual wills in the same form in pursuance of an agreement so to make them, but there was no evidence of any further agreement in the matter. Each gave his or her property to the other absolutely with the same alternative provisions in case of lapse. The wife having survived and accepted her husband's property under his mutual will subsequently married again, and made a fresh will ignoring the alternative provisions of her own mutual will:—Held, that in the circumstances there was no implied trust preventing the wife disposing of her property as she pleased.”

I would distinguish that case from the present because here the recitals, which are contained in similar form in the first will of the testator and in the will of his first wife, show a very definite bargain that, whoever died first, certain consequences were to follow, and it is those consequences to which, it is suggested, effect must be given.

Re Hagger (5), a decision of CLAUSON, J., is not dissimilar from the present case. The headnote to that case is ([1930] 2 Ch. 190):

“A husband and wife made a joint will, whereby they left certain property, which each possessed at the time of the death of the spouse first dying, to the survivor for life with certain absolute remainders over, and they agreed that the will should not be revoked without their mutual consent. The wife died first, and as from her death the husband received the income from the whole estate until his death:—Held, that from the death of the wife the property of which the husband was then possessed was subject to a trust under which the legatees in absolute remainder took vested interests subject to the life interest of the husband.”

The decision of LORD CAMDEN, L.C., in Dufour v. Pereira (1) was applied.

Finally, there is Stone v. Hoskins (6), a decision of SIR GORELL BARNES, P. The headnote starts with the proposition that ([1905] P. 194):

“Where two persons have made an arrangement as to the disposal of their property and executed mutual wills in pursuance of that arrangement, the one of them who predeceases the other dies with the implied promise of the survivor that the arrangement shall hold good; and if the survivor, after taking a benefit under the arrangement, alters his will, his personal representative takes the property upon trust to perform the contract, for the will of the one who has died first has, by the death, become irrevocable.”

The headnote then deals with the contrary position, i.e., the case where the one who dies first has departed from the bargain by executing a fresh will, which is not the case now before me. I would observe here that in the present case the husband approved the first wife's will, which contained provisions corresponding to those which I have indicated as appearing in the husband's will, and thereby one might say that he indicated in the clearest possible way his assent to the arrangement which the recitals in both wills appear to indicate.

On the whole, although it is a difficult point, I think that the arrangement was one which is binding in equity as regards what is called in both wills the wife's moiety, and, having regard to the form of cl. 6 (b) in the first will, I think that the testator's moiety was his own personal property to do as he liked with, and, if he chose after his second marriage to make other provisions as regards that moiety, he was at liberty to do so. It is not a very easy point, and it may be that I am not taking the right view when I hold that, as regards his own moiety, the testator was free to do what he liked. Nothing could prevent him revoking the will, which he had done by the act of his second marriage. The only question is over what property any subsequent will operates. In my view, it can only operate as regards one moiety which was under the testator's control at his death, and, with regard to the other moiety, i.e., the moiety which was notionally the property of his first wife, the pre-existing will must take effect, not as a will, but as evidence of a trust which is plainly to be discerned in the two wills, viz., the first will of the testator—which, of course, never became a will in the sense that it was a proved will—and the will of the first wife which was proved and under which the husband took an absolute interest in the residue.

The first question in the summons is:

"Whether the plaintiff and the defendant Charles William Townsend as the executors of the last will of the said testator hold the estate of the said testator or any and if so what part or parts thereof upon trust to give effect to all or any and if so which of the provisions contained in (a) the last will or (b) the earlier will of the said testator."

A In my judgment, one moiety of the estate must be held on the trusts declared by the first will. The other moiety passes under the provisions contained in the second will subject to this, that, before the moieties are ascertained, the first will is also operative so far as regards the property, 141 Billy Lows Lane, the entirety of which is, under cl. 6 (a) of the first will, to pass with the furniture therein to the successors in title, whoever they may be under the National Health Service Act, 1946, of the Potters Bar Hospital absolutely.

B As I have held that para. 6 (c) of the first will took effect in conscience—"compact" is the word LORD CAMDEN, L.C., used in Dufour v. Pereira (1)—giving rise to a trust, it follows, I think, that effect must be given to the various provisions under cl. 6 (c) out of the fund available for their implementation. In his second will, however, the testator left a number of pecuniary legacies to the same effect, although not always identical in amount, as those contained in para. 6 (c) of the first will. I have a shrewd suspicion that he probably did not intend these legatees to receive the legacies under the second will in addition to the corresponding legacies which they take by way of trust under para. 6 (c) of the first will, but I do not see how I can give effect to what, I think, was his intention. It might have been different if the legacies given by the second will had been precisely identical with those given by cl. 6 (c) of the first will, but there are variations. In particular, three legatees receive £250, £250 and £500, respectively, in what I have identified as a trust, and £100 each under the second will. It seems to me that, in giving legacies by the second will, the testator, whether or not intentionally, conferred by the second will fresh gifts in addition to those under the arrangement with his first wife. Therefore, I must hold that the beneficiaries take both the share in the trust fund and the legacies under the second will (the will which has been admitted to probate as the testator's last will).

(In liquidation).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), October 16, 1950.]

Company—Winding-up—Execution—Execution not completed until after order for winding-up—English winding-up ancillary to foreign winding-up—Rights of creditor—Discretion of court—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 325 (1) (c).

S., Ltd., a company incorporated in South Africa, became indebted to V., Ltd., in England in respect of certain aeroplanes and spare parts, for which, when S., Ltd., found difficulty in making payment, it was agreed that payment should be by instalments. S., Ltd., defaulted in payment of instalments, and V., Ltd., after certain correspondence had passed, issued a writ claiming the amount outstanding. On Dec. 7, 1949, on the application of V., Ltd., for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, S., Ltd., obtained leave to defend. On Dec. 31, 1949, unknown both to V., Ltd., and the London office of S., Ltd., a petition for the compulsory winding-up of S., Ltd., was presented in South Africa. On Jan. 13, 1950, the time reserved for the delivery of the defence of S., Ltd., to V., Ltd.'s, writ expired (no defence having been delivered), and on Jan. 14, 1950, V., Ltd., signed judgment. On Jan. 17, 1950, S., Ltd., took out a summons to set aside the judgment, and on Jan. 18, 1950, a provisional winding-up order was made against S., Ltd., in South Africa without the knowledge of the London office or of V., Ltd. On Jan. 20, 1950, the summons to set aside judgment was adjourned to Feb. 8, 1950, on the application of S., Ltd., to enable S., Ltd., to file further evidence in support of the summons. On Jan. 24, 1950, V., Ltd., heard of the winding-up proceedings, and on Jan. 31, 1950, issued writs of fiери facias. On Feb. 10, 1950, the summons to set aside judgment was dismissed (no further evidence having been filed), and on Feb. 14, 1950, a final winding-up order was made against S., Ltd., in South Africa. The sheriff seized certain aeroplane engines under one of the writs of fiери facias. On Feb. 24, 1950, the provisional liquidator claimed the engines, and the sheriff issued an interpleader summons. On Mar. 28, 1950, a petition for winding-up S., Ltd., in England was presented, and on Apr. 24, 1950, an order was made thereon. On Apr. 18, 1950, the liquidator's claim was barred in the interpleader proceedings. V., Ltd., now applied under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 325 (1) (c), for an order that V., Ltd., be entitled to retain against the liquidator the benefit of the two writs of fiери facias, the executions not having been completed before the commencement of the winding-up.

HELD: (i) section 325 (1) (c) gave the court jurisdiction to do what was right and fair, and in the circumstances of the case it was proper to make the order asked for.

Re Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 948), followed.

(ii) even though, according to the law of South Africa, an execution put in force after the date of the presentation of the petition would be void and although the English winding-up was ancillary to the South African winding-up, no obstacle to the exercise of the discretion of the court under s. 325 (1) (c) in favour of V., Ltd., was thereby constituted, because, in dealing with the assets of the South African company within its jurisdiction, the court administered only English law.

A ADJOURNED SUMMONS under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 325 (1) (c), for an order that Vickers-Armstrongs, Ltd., the creditors, were entitled to retain against the liquidator the benefit of two writs of fiery facias issued at the instance of the creditors on Jan. 31, 1950, and addressed to the sheriffs of the counties of London and Gloucester, each indorsed to levy £8,789 18s. 4d. against the Suidair International Airways, Ltd., executions under which writs were not completed before commencement of winding-up.

B R. E. Megarry for the applicants, Vickers-Armstrongs, Ltd.
K. W. Mackinnon for the liquidator.

C WYNN-PARRY, J.: This summons raises a not uninteresting question in the compulsory liquidation of Suidair International Airways, Ltd., which is a company incorporated in South Africa. The company became indebted to the applicants in connection with the sale by the applicants to the company of certain aeroplanes and spare parts. The full purchase price had not been paid by the summer of 1949, and the applicants were pressing for payment. On June 13, 1949, a meeting took place between representatives of the applicants and representatives of the company. From the report of that meeting it is clear that the representatives of the company admitted to the representatives of the applicants that the company was liable for the amount unpaid under the contract. D The burden of the company's representations was that the company had no desire to avoid payment, but was at the time in some difficulty as regards making immediate payment and required time and asked that the amount outstanding should be made by instalments. To this proposition the applicants agreed, and matters proceeded on that basis until the company defaulted in paying the agreed instalments. They were again pressed by the applicants, and on Aug. 3, E 1949, the then acting managing director of the company wrote a letter to the applicants in the course of which he said:

"I am keenly aware of the fact that your account has been outstanding for an extensive period and also that to date you have received nothing but promises and evasions. I want you to understand that there is no question of F denying the account, nor is there any desire on our part to avoid payment. The question that exists is merely how this can be accomplished."

After further correspondence, the applicants, having received no satisfaction, issued a writ in the King's Bench Division, specially indorsed, claiming the amount alleged to be outstanding under the contract. On the hearing of the summons for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, the company intimated its desire G to defend, and on Dec. 7, 1949, obtained leave to defend. The matter was referred to the official referee. A direction on the order for directions provided that the company should deliver its defence within twenty-eight days. That order was drawn up and there was no appeal.

H On Dec. 31, 1949, unknown both to the applicants and to the London office of the company, a petition for the compulsory winding-up of the company was presented by a creditor in South Africa. On Jan. 13, 1950, the time reserved by the order for directions for delivery of the company's defence expired and on the following day the applicants signed judgment in default of defence. On Jan. 17 the company took out a summons to set aside the judgment. On Jan. 18 a provisional winding-up order was made against the company in South Africa, an event which was known neither to the applicants nor to the London office of the company at the time, and a Mr. Vosloo was appointed provisional liquidator.

On Jan. 20, 1950, the summons to set aside the judgment was heard, and on the company's application was adjourned to Feb. 8 with a view to enabling the company to file further affidavit evidence in support of the summons. The company did not take advantage of that opportunity. On Jan. 24 the applicants first heard of the winding-up proceedings in South Africa from some extraneous source. The applicants took garnishee proceedings against the company's banking account, and, in addition, on Jan 31, 1950, they issued writs of fieri facias, and these were directed to the sheriffs of London and Gloucester. The summons to set aside the judgment was dismissed on Feb. 10. On Feb. 14 a final order for the winding-up of the company was made in South Africa. During this period the sheriff of Gloucester seized certain aeroplane engines estimated to be of the value of some £5,500—less than the amount claimed by the applicants. On Feb. 24 Mr. Vosloo, the provisional liquidator in South Africa, laid claim to these engines and this resulted in the sheriff issuing an interpleader summons.

On Mar. 28, 1950, the petition for the winding-up of the company in England was presented, and on that an order was made on Apr. 24. In the meantime, on Mar. 30, the interpleader summons was heard, and on Apr. 18 the liquidator's claim was barred. Finally, on Apr. 26, the present summons was issued by the applicants under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 325 (1) (c), asking that the applicants be entitled to retain against the liquidator the benefit of the two writs of fieri facias, each being indorsed to levy the sum of £8,789 18s. 4d., the amount claimed by the company and the amount for which judgment had been given in their favour.

Two points arise. First, it is said on behalf of the liquidator that, even assuming that the matter is to be judged entirely by English law, the applicants should not be entitled to the order for which they ask. My attention was called at an early stage, by counsel for the liquidator, to Re Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd. (1), a judgment of VAISEY, J., which counsel frankly admitted placed considerable difficulty in his way on this point. In that case a judgment creditor of the company, having issued, but failed to complete, execution before the date on which the company went into liquidation, took out a summons for an order that, pursuant to the Companies Act, 1948, s. 325 (1) (c), the amount of the judgment debt, together with interest thereon, be raised out of the proceeds of sale of the effects of the company and paid to the judgment creditor. VAISEY, J., made it clear in his judgment that the case raised no general question of principle, but he dealt with the construction of the section with which I am concerned and the question whether head (c) of the proviso had made any alteration in the existing law. He referred to Armorduct Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. General Incandescent Co., Ltd. (2), described that case as having always been regarded hitherto as the high-water mark of this jurisdiction, and went on to say ([1949] 2 All E.R. 949):

"I think that prior to the passing of the Companies Act, 1948, nothing short of a trick or some actual dishonesty would justify interference by the court. It is suggested that this new para. (c) of the proviso does no more than declare the law as it existed before the passing of the Act of 1948 and that I ought to proceed on the footing, as I should have proceeded before the Act of 1948 came into operation, that, in view of the decision in Armorduct Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. General Incandescent Co., Ltd. (2), nothing short of trickery would justify my interference, but when I look at the words of para. (c) it appears to me that I am given a wider jurisdiction. In my view, it enables me to defeat the rights conferred on the liquidator either wholly or partially because of the words 'to such extent' . . . Therefore, I hold that under this proviso I have a wider discretion than I should have had before that proviso became part of the statute law."

Counsel for the liquidator very properly desires to preserve his right to argue in a higher court the question whether or not the reasoning of VAISEY, J., and his conclusion were right in that case, but he is constrained to admit that he could not hope in this court to persuade me to differ on that point of construction from the judgment of VAISEY, J., and all I need say is that, as at present advised, I can see no ground on which I could be asked to differ from his conclusion.

The learned judge then gives the reasons why he came to his decision in that case. He says (ibid., 950):

A "I am not going through the facts of this case. I do not think anybody could say there was any trickery here, but I hold as a fact that the applicants, Bebb Industries, Ltd., were persuaded, or induced, or requested, to stay their hands in the matter of this execution. While I acquit the officers of Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd., of any kind of dishonesty or impropriety, I think that, but for their requests and the pressure they put on the applicants, this execution would have been completed before the commencement of the winding-up. I think that the rights of the liquidator must be set aside in favour of the applicants, and I so decide."

B He added ([1950] Ch. 65):

C "The section seems to give the court a free hand to do what is right and fair according to the circumstances of each case. It is just because the discretion is so wide and so uncontrolled, and because the words are so lacking in any sort of guidance, that the exercise of it is made so difficult. All I can say is that I have come to the conclusion that in this case the applicants, in all the circumstances, should succeed."

D My attention was called on behalf of the applicants to a number of authorities decided before the present Act, and, indeed, before 1911 when Armorduct Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. General Incandescent Co., Ltd. (2) was decided. In the view which I take of the matter, it is unnecessary for me to discuss those authorities on this occasion. I am proposing to accept the construction which VAISEY, J., has placed on the section, not merely because I feel bound in the circumstances which I have adumbrated to do so, but also because I find myself, with all respect, in agreement with him. I propose, therefore, to treat myself as having, to use the learned judge's words, "a free hand to do what is right and fair according to the circumstances of each case." On that view, I find no need to investigate, discuss and reconcile the authorities to which I was referred.

E So far as the present case is concerned, I think it also is a case in which I should intervene at the request of the applicants. The case, it is true, is not quite the same as that disclosed by the facts in Re Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd. (1). F There the inducement or request to the applicants to stay their hands appears to have been made after the judgment was obtained, and was directed to induce them to refrain from proceeding with the execution. This case appears to me to be, if anything, stronger. From the comparatively short review of the facts which I have made, it will have been observed that there was the clearest possible admission of liability in June, 1949, and a request acceded to by the applicants G that the company should be given the indulgence of being allowed to pay by instalments. An admission of the debt by the managing director is in his letter of Aug. 3, 1949, a letter in which he refers to the promises and evasions of his own concern. Nevertheless, when, in November of the same year, the applicants, who had been compelled to do so through the default of the company to provide even the instalments agreed on, started the action to which I have referred, the H company obtained leave to defend on an affidavit which categorically disputed the existence of any debt to the applicants and asserted that everything had been paid under the contract and, indeed, that it was the applicants who were at fault in not having supplied the company with proper information and statements of account. Thereafter, every possible obstacle was put in the way of the applicants, first, obtaining their judgment, and, secondly, obtaining any fruits from that judgment. In those circumstances it appears to me that it would be unjust if I were to exercise my jurisdiction otherwise than in favour of the applicants, because, in my view, the company has here less than no merits, and it would be quite wrong that other creditors should come in and, claiming through the company, deprive the applicants of the fruits of their judgment, fruits which they would have gathered in but for the conduct of the company to which I have referred.

That takes me to the second point which was put forward by counsel for the liquidator. He says that the company is incorporated in South Africa and, consequently, domiciled there; the main liquidation is the liquidation in South Africa; and, therefore, the English liquidation, which is also later in date, is to be regarded as an ancillary liquidation. Evidence, the correctness of which is not disputed by the applicants, has been put forward on behalf of the official receiver in this liquidation that, according to the law in the Union of South Africa, the execution which was put in force after the date of the presentation of the petition in the Union of South Africa would be void in South Africa and of no effect whatsoever; no leave, therefore, could be obtained to proceed therewith; and, in consequence, the goods against which the execution has been put in force would become available as part of the assets of the company for the benefit of all the creditors thereof. It is urged that, whatever be the view under English law, and even assuming that I was against the liquidator on the first point, as I am, yet, in view of that evidence, I ought to refuse to exercise my discretion in favour of the applicants and thus give effect to the South African law. On principle, I can see nothing whatsoever to recommend that proposition, but the matter does not stand entirely without authority.

In Re English, Scottish & Australian Chartered Bank (3), VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in the course of his judgment, says ([1893] 3 Ch. 394):

"... in construing the statute, one must bear in mind the principles upon which liquidations are conducted, in different countries and in different courts, of one concern. One knows that where there is a liquidation of one concern the general principle is—ascertain what is the domicile of the company in liquidation; let the court of the country of domicile act as the principal court to govern the liquidation; and let the other courts act as ancillary, as far as they can, to the principal liquidation. But although that is so, it has always been held that the desire to assist in the main liquidation—the desire to act as ancillary to the court where the main liquidation is going on—will not ever make the court give up the forensic rules which govern the conduct of its own liquidation."

With respect to the learned judge, it appears to me that that must be the common sense of the matter and that passage enunciates a principle which, so far as I know, has never been doubted.

It is said that all the passage refers to is questions of procedure, that s. 325 deals with a question of substantive law, and that, therefore, the passage, when properly regarded, does not constitute an obstacle to the adoption by the court of the argument put forward on behalf of the company. To that I would make two answers. The first is that I do not read VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., as confining himself to what, on a narrow view, may be said to be matters of procedure. I think that he intended his observations and the statement of the principle to apply to the decision of all questions arising in the ancillary liquidation. The second answer I would give is that, even if that passage could be read otherwise, I should be prepared, for myself, to say that I can see no sound reason for distinguishing between matters of procedure viewed in that narrow sense and matters of substantive rights. It appears to me that the simple principle is that this court sits to deal with the assets of the South African company which are within its jurisdiction, and for that purpose administers, and administers only, the relevant English law—that is, primarily the law as stated in the Companies Act, 1948, looked at in the light, where necessary, of the decided cases. If that principle be adhered to, no confusion will result. If it is departed from, I cannot see how any other result would follow than the utmost possible confusion. Who could lay down as a clear and exhaustive proposition where the court was to draw the line in any particular case between administering the English law and the law of the main liquidation? For those reasons, I am of opinion that this application succeeds, and it succeeds with costs.

Order accordingly.

R. v. MURRAY.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and McNair, JJ.), October 16, 1950.]

C

Criminal Law—Evidence—Confession—Allegation that confession improperly obtained—Ruling in absence of jury on admissibility—Right of counsel at trial again to cross-examine police and examine prisoner regarding circumstances in which confession obtained.

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Adverse report by Prison Commissioners.

D

On the trial of an indictment for felony the only evidence proposed to be offered against the appellant was a confession made by him to the police before his arrest. He alleged that the confession was not voluntary, having been made on a promise given to him by the police, and that it was untrue. In the absence of the jury the recorder heard evidence from the police and the appellant and held that the confession was admissible in evidence. Later, when evidence was being given before the jury at the trial, he ruled that counsel for the appellant could not again cross-examine the police or re-examine the appellant regarding the circumstances in which the confession had been made.

E

HELD: the weight and value to be given to the confession was a matter for the jury, and, in considering that matter, they were entitled to form their own opinion on the way in which it had been obtained, and, therefore, counsel for the appellant was within his rights in claiming that he should be allowed to examine and cross-examine to show, if he could, that the confession had been procured by means of a promise of favour.

F

Per curiam: Where the Prison Commissioners report that an accused person is unsuitable for a sentence of corrective training or preventive detention it is undesirable that a court should ignore their opinion and pass such a sentence.

H

Case referred to:

(1) R. v. Cohen and Bateman, [1909] 2 Cr. App. Rep. 197; 73 J.P. 352.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant was charged at Lincoln Quarter Sessions on an indictment containing two counts, the first alleging that he had broken and entered the offices of a club and the second that he had attempted to break into other premises. He pleaded Guilty on the second count, but Not Guilty on the first on which the only evidence offered for the prosecution was his own confession. At the trial he alleged that his confession had been improperly obtained. The recorder ruled it to be admissible evidence and later refused to permit counsel for the appellant to examine witnesses before the jury to show the circumstances in which the confession had been obtained. The appellant was convicted on the first count and sentenced on the whole indictment to four years' corrective training. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

J. R. T. Hooper for the appellant.

Miss Henderson for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was indicted originally at Lincolnshire Assizes for breaking and entering the offices of the Lincoln City football club and stealing money and, in a second count, for attempting to break and enter a shop with intent to commit a felony. He pleaded Guilty to the second count. Owing to lack of time, the learned judge ordered him to be tried on the first count at the quarter sessions for the city of Lincoln. The appellant is a thief and a criminal well known to the police, and his defence to the charge was, in substance: "You only picked me up because you knew me. You knew I was in Lincoln, and, therefore, you arrested me." That was true. The police, in trying to find out who had broken into the club, knowing that the appellant was in Lincoln, and knowing his character, interviewed him. According to the police, he then made a full confession that he had broken into the club. At the trial he denied that he had made this confession voluntarily, and said that he was induced to make it by the promise of the police that they would make it light for him. He also gave evidence that he was in another place at the material time, so raising the defence of alibi.

As the appellant denied his confession and alleged that it had not been obtained from him voluntarily, the recorder, at the request of counsel for the appellant, quite properly heard at the outset evidence on the issue whether the confession had been obtained voluntarily or not. It was not only convenient, but also proper, that that matter should be decided once and for all at the opening of the case because the confession was the only evidence against the appellant except the evidence of arrest. The recorder, having heard the evidence of the police and that of the appellant, came to the conclusion that the evidence of the confession was admissible. The appellant had signed the confession in two places. The police gave their account, which the recorder believed.

At the trial the appellant gave evidence before the jury that he was not in Lincoln at the time of the offence. He was cross-examined as to his confession, but when counsel for the appellant desired, in re-examination, to question him about the circumstances in which the confession was obtained, the recorder, who had already refused to allow counsel for the appellant to cross-examine the police on this matter, would not allow him to do so. The recorder ruled that it was a question entirely for him, and when he came to sum up to the jury he said:

"I ruled that there were no circumstances in this case which justified the suggestion that the confession which is now before you was improperly obtained. I ruled that that confession was a voluntary confession obtained from the prisoner and given by him without any duress, bribe or threat. That is my ruling, and you must take it from me in this court. If I am wrong, somebody else will correct me hereafter. Therefore, you must approach the matter on the footing that there was a confession properly obtained according to our very zealously guarded rules of evidence so that no unfairness was done in the matter. That is how the matter stands."

The recorder went on to elaborate to the jury the fact that, on the one hand, the appellant had confessed to the police, and, on the other hand, he now said that he was elsewhere, and he said that the jury must make up their minds which of those two stories was true.

A In our opinion, the recorder was wrong in the course he took. It was quite right for him to decide, in the absence of the jury and by hearing evidence, whether he could admit the confession. He had to rule on the admissibility of the terms of the confession, and, as he could find nothing in the evidence which was given before him to cause him to think that it had been improperly obtained, he admitted it, but the question of its weight and its value was for the jury, and in considering its weight and value, the jury were entitled to form their opinion on the way it had been obtained. Counsel for the appellant was entitled to cross-examine the police in the presence of the jury as to the circumstances in which the confession was obtained. At that time the confession was admissible in evidence, because the recorder had ruled so, but it was entirely within the right of the appellant or his counsel to cross-examine the police and to try again to show that the confession had been obtained by means of a promise of favour. B If counsel for the appellant could have persuaded the jury of that, he was entitled to invite them to disregard the confession.

C This point had better be settled once and for all. It has always, so far as this court is aware, in such a matter as this been the right of counsel for the defence to cross-examine again before the jury the witnesses who have already given evidence in the absence of the jury, because, if he can induce the jury to think that the confession has been obtained by some threat or promise, its value is enormously weakened. The weight of the evidence and the value of the evidence is always for the jury. The jury in this case were told that they were not to consider that question at all. That seems to the court to be a complete misdirection on a point of law. This court has always taken the view that, if a complete misdirection is given on a point of law, which goes to the root of the question, that must make the conviction bad because, as CHANNELL, J., pointed out many years ago in R. v. Cohen and Bateman (2 Cr. App. Rep. 207), if the law were otherwise the prisoner would be deprived of a chance of an acquittal by the jury which he might have. We, therefore, feel, though in this case there is not the least reason to doubt that the confession was true, that, as the jury were not given the opportunity of considering this matter, the conviction on the first count must be quashed. D E

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to the appellant's plea of Guilty to the charge contained in the second count of the indictment and the sentence of four years' corrective training imposed by the recorder on both the first and second counts, and continued:] This was the last case in which such a sentence should have been passed. If the recorder had imposed a sentence of preventive detention for seven or eight years, it might have been a very proper sentence, but the appellant is a man of thirty-three years of age who has been convicted on at least ten occasions, and when he has been convicted it has not been for one offence or two offences. F G In 1940 sixty-five cases of false pretences were taken into consideration; in 1941 six other cases; thirty-two other cases were considered when he was convicted of housebreaking at Nottingham; and so on. In the present case he asked for three other offences to be taken into consideration. He does not appeal against sentence, but we have to consider what sentence should be passed on the count which stands. What surprises this court is that not only did the recorder H think that corrective training was suitable for a man with this record, but he passed that sentence although the Prison Commissioners had reported that, in their opinion, he was unsuitable for corrective training. Because the Prison Commissioners report that a man is suitable for corrective training or preventive detention is not in itself a reason why the court should pass such a sentence, but if they report that he is not suitable for corrective training it is a very strong thing to disregard their opinion. It is undesirable to do so because, as we have pointed out ever since the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21, came into operation, if sentences of corrective training—the same is true of preventive detention, but corrective training comes before this court more frequently in this respect—are too freely passed, it will embarrass the Prison Commissioners who administer this new form of punishment because the places in the prisons assigned for this particular form of treatment will be filled with unsuitable cases. We have pointed out again and again that corrective training is really a sort of extended Borstal training. A man of thirty-three who is steeped in crime as is this appellant does not mean to go straight and he would be a proper subject for a long term of preventive detention. We think that the right thing to do in the circumstances is to pass the maximum sentence for an attempt, and that is two years' imprisonment.

Appeal allowed and conviction quashed on first count. Sentence varied on second count.

SMITH v. HAMILTON.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), October 16, 17, 1950.]

Sale of Land—Contract—Time of the essence—Failure to complete purchase—Time not initially of the essence—Subsequent introduction of term—"Impropriety" on part of purchaser—Request for delay—Right to forfeit deposit and re-sell—Damages when property wrongfully re-sold.

On Feb. 26, 1949, the purchaser signed a memorandum that she had on that day purchased a dwelling-house from the vendor at the price of £3,000, and that she had paid £300 to stakeholders as a deposit. The special conditions of sale adopted the National Conditions of Sale, 15th ed., so far as not inconsistent with the special conditions, and fixed Apr. 4, 1949, as the date for completion. Condition 25 (1) of the National Conditions provides: "If the purchaser shall neglect or fail to complete his purchase according to these conditions, his deposit shall thereupon be forfeited (unless the court otherwise directs) to the vendor . . . and the vendor may, with or without notice or without previously tendering a conveyance, re-sell the property at such time, in such manner and subject to such conditions as he shall think fit." The purchaser had difficulty in raising the balance of the purchase money, and on Mar. 29, 1949, the purchaser's solicitors wrote to the vendor's solicitors stating: "We understand that . . . it will not be possible to complete the purchase on the date fixed by the contract." The vendor thereupon instructed the estate agents that in the event of the purchaser's not completing by Apr. 19, 1949, they were to sell elsewhere, and by a letter dated Apr. 5, 1949, the vendor informed the purchaser that the vendor reserved all his rights under the contract, but was prepared without prejudice to delay exercising such rights until Apr. 19. By a letter dated Apr. 19, 1949, the purchaser was notified by the vendor's solicitors that "the deposit has become forfeited" and that the vendor was proposing to re-sell. On Apr. 21, 1949, the house was re-sold. On May 2, 1949, the purchaser offered to complete, then having the money available. The purchaser now claimed the return of her deposit and damages.

HELD: (i) as time was not initially of the essence of the contract as regards completion it was impossible for the vendor unilaterally to make it so in the absence of some impropriety on the part of the purchaser sufficient to entitle him so to do; the letter of Mar. 29, 1949, did not constitute such an impropriety, but, even if it did, it did not entitle the vendor to treat the contract as repudiated so soon as two weeks after the original date for completion.

Green v. Sevin (1879) (13 Ch.D. 589), applied.

(ii) the right to forfeit the deposit under Condition 25 did not arise until the purchaser had deprived himself of his equitable remedy of specific performance, and the purchaser had not so deprived herself by Apr. 5, and, therefore, the purported forfeiture was bad and the re-sale wrongful.

(iii) the purchaser was not entitled to recover as damages the expenses incurred in respect of fees of surveyors on behalf of building societies who were contemplated mortgagees.

ACTION.

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that she was entitled to have returned to her the deposit paid by her to stakeholders in connection with a contract between herself and the defendant for the sale to her of the defendant's dwelling-house. She also claimed damages for breach of the contract of sale. The defendant counterclaimed for damages for breach of the contract by the plaintiff and a declaration that the plaintiff was not entitled to the return of her deposit.

HARMAN, J.: This is an action for the return of a deposit and damages for breach of contract. It arises out of a contract whereby the purchaser agreed to purchase from the vendor a property known as Castle House, Parkhill, Bexley, Kent. The purchase price was £3,000, and the bargain was not completed on the day fixed by the contract. The vendor affected in substance to rescind and forfeit the deposit, round which the dispute centres. The property has been re-sold and no question of specific performance arises.

The vendor, the owner of the property, is a solicitor, retired from his practice, but still, at the time of these events, a member of the firm of Adler & Perowne, solicitors, of London Wall, and he had practised for many years as a solicitor.

In 1948 he was minded to dispose of the property, and he wanted to get £3,500 for it. He had disappointments, the purchaser for whom he looked did not materialise, and in the early part of 1949 he put the property into the hands of some estate agents, Relph & Sons, Ltd. He instructed them to sell it by auction, and they advertised it for that purpose. They prepared particulars advertising the sale on Mar. 3, 1949. Shortly before that date, the present purchaser came on the scene. She was a married woman, living in the vicinity, and had a small sum of money, £400 or so, which represented her life savings. She had another house in Hampshire, which had belonged to her mother, and she was minded to acquire the Castle House property as, I think, a kind of speculation. She approached the vendor and had an interview with him. The upshot was that the vendor, being, I think, doubtful whether she was good for the money, sent her to Relph & Sons, Ltd. As a result of an interview with a representative of that concern, the purchaser, on Feb. 26, 1949, signed a memorandum on the back of the auction particulars acknowledging that she had "this day purchased the property, subject to the attached conditions, at the price of £3,000" and that she had paid £300 by way of deposit to the auctioneers, and she agreed to pay the remainder and to complete according to the conditions of sale so far as they applied to a sale by private treaty. She, in fact, paid £300 to the auctioneers which they held as stakeholders. A

The conditions provided that vacant possession was to be given on completion of the purchase, and adopted the National Conditions, 15th ed., so far as not inconsistent with them, and fixed Apr. 4 as the date for completion. Completion is dealt with by Condition 3 of the National Conditions, which provides: B

"The day fixed for completion shall be the day mentioned for that purpose in the special conditions. On the day fixed for completion the purchaser shall pay the remainder of his purchase-money at the office of the vendor's solicitor . . ."

There is the usual provision about interest. Condition 25 (1) provides: C

"If the purchaser shall neglect or fail to complete his purchase according to these conditions, his deposit shall thereupon be forfeited (unless the court otherwise directs) to the vendor and the vendor may, with or without notice or without previously tendering a conveyance, re-sell the property at such time, in such manner and subject to such conditions as he shall think fit."

Condition 7 deals with the time for the delivery of the abstract, the requisitions and replies to answers, and Condition 7 (3) provides: D

"In respect of the delivery of objections, requisitions and replies, time shall be of the essence of the contract."

The inference is that in no other respect is time of the essence of the contract. E

Having entered into that contract, the purchaser set about what she had rather lightheartedly undertaken, namely, to find the purchase money, and she found it much more difficult than she had supposed. Building societies would not lend her ninety per cent. of the purchase money on a house of this sort without further security. In the meantime, the title was investigated in the normal way, that part of the formalities being completed well within the time allowed. On Mar. 29, 1949, an engrossment of the conveyance was sent by the purchaser's solicitors to the vendor's solicitors, and the covering letter with that document contained this statement: F

"We understand that our client has been in communication with your Mr. Hamilton [the vendor] and informed him that she has had some difficulty in connection with the proposed mortgage and that, therefore, it will not be possible to complete the purchase on the date fixed by the contract."

In my judgment, that letter cannot be read as a repudiation of the contract by the purchaser. It merely says that there is a difficulty in connection with the proposed mortgage, and that, therefore, it will not be possible for her to complete on the day fixed. In other words, it is a request for delay, or an explanation of an inability to come on Apr. 4 with the purchase money in hand. G

When the vendor heard of this, he seems immediately to have made up his mind that the purchaser would never find the money. Accordingly, he writes to the estate agents a letter, enclosing the keys of the house, and saying: H

"In the event of Mrs. Darrell Smith [the purchaser] not completing by Apr. 19, subject to my solicitors' advice you are at liberty to sell at best advantage."

A He reminds them that there is this other purchaser waiting with £2,750. That is practically an instruction to the agents, when Apr. 19 arrives, immediately to sell the property to the other purchaser at that price, which is, in fact, what they did.

On Apr. 5, in accordance with their instructions, Messrs. Adler & Perowne, the vendor's solicitors, wrote a letter to the purchaser's solicitors, saying:

B "With reference to your letter of Mar. 29 the vendor has instructed us that he cannot agree to an extension of time to complete and that he reserves all his rights under the contract of sale. He is, however, prepared without prejudice to delay exercising such rights until the 19th instant. We should be glad to hear from you with a date for completion forthwith."

C That is not an attempt in any way to rescind the contract. I think it must be a reference to Condition 25 of the National Conditions. In other words, it says: "We will not exercise our right to sell or forfeit the deposit until Apr. 19, but we reserve all our rights in that respect."

D The purchaser made efforts to raise the money in various directions. She wrote to the vendor and explained her difficulties and her plans, which were rather wild, for the re-sale of the property to some Americans. That seems to have frightened him even more, and he became more and more convinced that he never would get the money. On Apr. 7 he wrote to her in these terms:

"I have your letter of yesterday's date and am sorry that I cannot agree to any extension of the time for completing this contract. Nor can I consent to giving possession till the purchase price is paid. Even the present delay is causing me serious inconvenience."

E He does not mention what inconvenience, and he does not say he has suffered any damage. The purchaser entered into various negotiations with building societies in an effort to get them to put up the money, and on Apr. 13, the time not having expired, her solicitors wrote in these terms:

F "We understand that our client is now endeavouring to make other arrangements for raising the necessary finances, and we hope to be able to write to you further in this matter immediately after the Easter break."

This letter was written on the Wednesday before Easter, so that meant they wanted another week or so. Immediately after the Easter break, namely, on Easter Tuesday, Apr. 19, the vendors' solicitors wrote:

G "We observe that your client is still unable to offer a date for completion and in these circumstances we are instructed to notify you that as the purchaser has failed to complete her purchase the deposit has become forfeited to the vendor and the vendor is proposing to exercise his right of re-sale forthwith."

H The property was in fact re-sold on Apr. 21. That letter thoroughly frightened the purchaser, who did what she ought to have done before—she applied to her husband and he took a hand in the matter, and, as a result, on May 2, her solicitors were able to write to the vendor offering to complete the purchase. By May 4 she was in a position to complete, and the question is whether, having regard to the terms of this contract, the vendor was in a position on Apr. 19 to do what he affected to do—in substance to rescind the contract and forfeit the deposit.

This was a contract for the sale of land, and it goes without saying at this date that, unless there was something special, the time limited in the conditions of sale for completion was not a date which, in the words of the old law, was of the essence of the contract. In other words, the equitable view which now prevails in regard to all contracts and has prevailed for a very long time in the case of real estate is that the court looks to the substance of the matter and will not allow provisions relating to dates to control the general view that the contract, when made, is to be performed if it is just and equitable so to do, notwithstanding that time be over-run. There are, of course, circumstances in which time can be said to be of the essence of the contract from the beginning. Everybody knows, for instance, that on a sale of licensed premises, or a sale of a shop as a going concern, and, perhaps, the sale of animals in certain circumstances, time is of the essence because it necessarily must be so. Apart from that, however, it would need very special circumstances to make time of the essence of the contract on a sale of an ordinary private dwelling-house with vacant possession.

It is quite true that the negotiations of the parties before the contract is made may have the effect of making time of the essence, and I was referred by counsel to a case where LORD HALDANE, in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, made a number of illuminating observations on this subject. It was an Indian Appeal, Jamshed Khodaram Irani v. Burjorji Dhunjibhai (1), which turned on a provision in the Indian Code. LORD HALDANE said, after reading the section of the Code (32 T.L.R. 157):

“ Their Lordships did not think that that section laid down any principle which differed from those which obtained under the law of England as regarded contracts to sell land. Under that law equity, which governed the rights of the parties in cases of specific performance of contracts to sell real estate, looked not at the letter but at the substance of the agreement, to ascertain whether the parties, notwithstanding that they named a specific time within which completion was to take place, really and in substance intended no more than that it should take place within a reasonable time . . . The special jurisdiction of equity to disregard the letter of the contract in ascertaining what the parties to the contract were to be taken as having really and in substance intended as regards the time of its performance might be excluded by any plainly expressed stipulation. But to have that effect the language of the stipulation must show that the intention was to make the rights of the parties depend on the observance of the prescribed time limits in a fashion which was unmistakable. The language would have that effect if it plainly excluded the notion that those time limits were of merely secondary importance in the bargain, and that to disregard them would be to disregard nothing that lay at its foundation. Prima facie, equity treated the importance of such time limits as being subordinate to the main purpose of the parties, and would enjoin specific performance notwithstanding that from the point of view of a court of law the contract had not been literally performed by the plaintiff as regards the time limit specified. That was merely an illustration of that general principle of disregarding the letter for the substance which courts of equity applied when, for instance, they decreed specific performance with compensation for a non-essential deficiency in subject-matter. But equity would not assist where there had been undue delay on the part of one party to the contract and the other had given him reasonable notice that he must complete within a definite time. Nor would it exercise its jurisdiction when the character of the property or when other circumstances would render such exercise likely to result in injustice. In such cases, the circumstances themselves, apart from any question of expressed intention, excluded the jurisdiction. Equity would further infer an intention that time should be of the essence from what had passed between the parties before the signing of the contract."

I am invited here to say that what passed between these parties before the signing of this contract had that effect, but I am entirely unable to do so. Nothing took place between these parties which would not take place normally between the ordinary vendor of a private house and a purchaser. It is true that there were doubts expressed, perhaps, about the purchaser's ability to find the purchase money, but I cannot see that that would make time of the essence when it was not otherwise so. That is clear enough. Moreover, under the National Conditions of Sale time is not generally of the essence, as is shown by the special stipulation (No. 7) where that is desired.

If time be not of the essence of the contract initially, one party cannot, by his own motion, make it so, and to say that by writing a letter you can make time of the essence when it was not so before is quite inaccurate. That has been pointed out on many occasions, and, among others, by FRY, J., in Green v. Sevín (2). FRY, J., says (13 Ch.D. 599):

"What right then had one party to limit a particular time within which an act was to be done by the other? It appears to me that he had no right so to do, unless there had been such delay on the part of the other contracting party as to render it fair that, if steps were not immediately taken to complete, the person giving the notice should be relieved from his contract. It has been argued that there is a right in either party to a contract by notice so to engraft time as to make it of the essence of the contract where it has not originally been of the essence, independently of delay on the part of him to whom the notice is given. In my view there is no such right. It is plain on principle, as it appears to me, that there can be no such right. That which is not of the essence of the original contract is not to be made so by the volition of one of the parties, unless the other has done something which gives a right to the other to make it so. You cannot make a new contract at the will of one of the contracting parties. There must have been such improper conduct on the part of the other as to justify the rescission of the contract sub modo, that is, if a reasonable notice be not complied with. That this is the law appears to me abundantly plain."

Time being, in my judgment, not of the essence in the present case, the vendor could not, by his own volition, make it so unless there had been some impropriety by the purchaser. The day for completion being Apr. 4, it is clear that the vendor could not, on Apr. 5, the day after that date, serve a notice on the footing that there had been such an impropriety on the part of the purchaser as entitled him, as it were, to engraft time into the contract, and I do not think it was really suggested that there would be such a right apart from Condition 25 of the National Conditions of Sale, to which I have referred. It is suggested, however, that the vendor in this case had the right, because of the letter written to him on Mar. 29, 1949, in which the purchaser gave him notice that she would not be able to complete on the fixed day. If in that letter she had said: "I shall not complete," or "I cannot complete," or "Heaven knows when I may be able to complete," it may be that that would have amounted to something which would have entitled the vendor to deliver an ultimatum—and the letter of Apr. 5, 1949, really is an ultimatum. In my judgment, however, the letter of Mar. 29, which merely says: "We are very sorry we cannot complete just at the moment," is very far from being an anticipatory breach of the contract or anything which amounted to the kind of impropriety to which FRY, J., alludes in the case which I have cited. It does not entitle the vendor, as that learned judge said, to rescind the contract sub modo, i.e., to introduce into it a new term which was not there before, viz., that it must be completed within the next fortnight. Therefore, in my judgment, there was not—apart, as I have said, from Condition 25, to which I shall refer in a moment—introduced a right by the letter of Apr. 5 to alter the contract in any way. When one looks at the letter of Apr. 5, it does not do any more than say: “We stand on our contractual rights, but we will not seek to exercise them until Apr. 19.” It has no effect to alter the contract in any way or to make time an essential part of it if it was not so before. That being so, I do not think the letter was seeking to make time the essence, to use an inaccurate expression. It merely was saying: A “We rely on our contractual rights.”

Supposing I am wrong about that and that the letter declining to complete on Apr. 4, 1949, did entitle the vendor to issue a kind of ultimatum, then the question arises: Was that a proper one to issue? In other words, was it a long enough time to give the purchaser? Could it be said that a delay of fifteen days after the date fixed for completion was sufficient to entitle the vendor to B say: “I treat you as having broken the contract and I claim the deposit accordingly”? It seems to me that the test of that may be: What would have been the position if, on Apr. 20, the purchaser had issued a writ for specific performance of the contract. Would it have been a good defence for the vendor to say: C “The purchaser is not entitled to specific performance because she has repudiated the contract. I accepted her repudiation before the writ was issued, and, therefore, she has no rights”? It would be surprising if it were so. I can find no instance where so short a delay as one of a fortnight has been held to entitle either a vendor or a purchaser to rescind. It would be something entirely new to hold that within so short a time, there having been no repudiation of the contract by the purchaser, the vendor could resist specific performance. Consequently, even if the letter of Apr. 5, 1949, did make time of the essence, it failed D with regard to the time it indicated.

Taking it for what it really is, viz., a declaration that the vendor intends to stand on his rights, but not to exercise them for fourteen days, what were his rights at the end of those fourteen days? It depends, in my judgment, on Condition 25. That point seems to have been left open expressly by FRY, L.J., in Houie v. Smith (3), which is always cited with regard to deposits. In that case, E there was this somewhat similar clause (27 Ch.D. 90):

“... it was further agreed (cl. 8) that if the purchaser should fail to comply with this agreement the vendor should be at liberty to re-sell the premises in any manner, and the deficiency on such second sale thereof, with all expenses attending the same, should be made good by the defaulter at this present sale, and be recoverable as liquidated damages.” F

There was nothing about forfeiting the deposit there, but FRY, L.J., when dealing with that point, says (ibid., 105):

“Whether a clause such as the 8th in the present contract gives the vendor a power of re-sale for a default in performance on the very day named, it is not now necessary to inquire.” G

Where you have in the special conditions a provision which, on the face of it, entitles the vendor to forfeit the deposit and to re-sell—without notice, be it observed—can that right be exercised on the day after that fixed for completion, or, as here, a fortnight later, the vendor having said that though his rights were rights to forfeit at once he would wait a fortnight and not exercise them? The condition which has to be satisfied is that the purchaser shall neglect or fail to complete his purchase according to those conditions. One of the conditions is that the purchase shall be completed on the day named in the special condition, i.e., Apr. 4, 1949, but, as I have already said, everybody agrees that that date, unless in special circumstances, is not an essential part of the contract, and, therefore, the condition really is, I think—and I accept H

the argument of counsel for the purchaser on this point—that the purchase shall be completed on Apr. 4 or within a reasonable time thereafter. Therefore, when you get to Condition 25, the right to forfeit and re-sell does not seem to me to accrue until there has been a default by the purchaser in completing either on the day fixed or within a reasonable time. That right does not arise, I think, until the purchaser has deprived himself of the equitable remedy of specific performance by his delay or default or by a repudiation, express or implied, of the contract. Therefore, it does not seem to me that in this case the vendor can rely on Condition 25. If that be so, the purported forfeiture of the deposit is bad and the re-sale was wrongful. No question of specific performance has been raised here. The action is for the return of the deposit, and, in my judgment, the purchaser is entitled to have the deposit returned, but the stakeholder who is holding the deposit is not a party to this suit, and, therefore, I can make no order to that effect in this action. All I can do is to declare that the purchaser is entitled to give a good receipt for the deposit to the stakeholder. I shall order the vendor to pay interest at the rate of four per cent. on the amount of the stake until it is released. The stakeholder, of course, is not bound to pay interest. He puts the interest earned by the stake into his pocket. That is his reward for holding the stake.

The purchaser also asks for damages for breach of contract, and it may well be in a proper case that she would obtain those damages. General damages she could have, but, in this case, admittedly she has entirely failed to prove what they would be. She has made vague hints, but that is not enough. The special damages claimed are for certain survey expenses which were incurred by building societies who were contemplated mortgagees. Those, in my judgment, the purchaser cannot recover, because you cannot recover as damages for breach of contract expenses incurred in trying to raise money to fulfil the contract. I think such damage is too remote. It is no part of the bargain to complete the purchase of a house that the purchaser must necessarily incur the expense of mortgagees' surveyors.

Declaration that the purchaser was entitled to give to the stakeholder a good receipt for the amount of the deposit. Order that the vendor pays to the purchaser interest on the deposit at four per cent. from Feb. 26, 1949, until receipt of the deposit. Vendor to pay costs. Counterclaim dismissed with costs.

PARKINSON v. BARCLAYS BANK, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), October 9, 10, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Determination—Power for landlords to determine twenty-one years' lease at end of fourteen years if landlords "shall require the premises for the purpose of the business carried on by them"—Premises not required immediately at end of fourteen years—Only part of premises required.

The landlords carried on business in the lower part of premises owned by them and let the upper part to the tenant under a lease for twenty-one years. The lease contained a clause permitting the landlords to determine the lease at the end of the fourteenth year by six months' notice "if they shall require the premises hereby demised for the purpose of the business carried on by them." This clause, unlike various other clauses in the lease, did not refer to the premises "or any part thereof." The fourteen years expired on Mar. 25, 1948, and on May 27, 1947, the landlords served on the tenant a notice to quit and to deliver up possession on that date. The landlords intended to use part of the demised premises for the purpose of their business at some time during the last seven years of the term, but when they gave notice to quit admittedly they did not know the exact date when they would need to enter into occupation.

HELD: (i) on a proper construction of the lease, although the landlords did not require the premises for their business immediately at the end of the fourteenth year, they were entitled to determine the lease at that date as they would require the premises at some time during the last seven years of the term; (ii) the power to determine was exercisable notwithstanding that the landlords required part only of the premises for the purpose of their business.

[AS TO OPTION TO DETERMINE LEASE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 69-71, paras. 77-79; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 31, pp. 535-540, Nos. 6805-6847.]

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of SELLERS, J., made on Apr. 24, 1950, dismissing the tenant's claim for damages for breach of contract. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Beney, K.C., and Dare for the tenant.

Heathcote-Williams, K.C., and Winn for the landlords.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the tenant from a decision of SELLERS, J., which turns on the construction of a clause in a lease made on Mar. 28, 1934, between the landlords, Barclays Bank, Ltd., and the tenant, Mr. Parkinson, a dental surgeon. The lease was for twenty-one years, at a rent of £200 a year, and the demised premises were situated on the upper floor of a building known as 355 Station Road, Harrow, in the lower part of which the bank carried on its business.

By cl. 6 of the lease:

"Provided always and it is hereby agreed that if the lessee shall be desirous of determining this present lease at the expiration of the first fourteen years of the term hereby granted and of such his desire shall give six months previous notice in writing to the lessors or leave the same at or send the same by registered post to their registered office for the time being and shall pay all the rent and perform and observe all the covenants hereinbefore reserved and contained and on the part of the lessee to be paid performed and observed up to such determination or if the lessors shall be desirous of determining this present lease at the expiration of the first fourteen years of the term hereby granted and of such their desire shall give six calendar months previous notice in writing to the lessee or leave the same for him on any part of the demised premises then and in either of the said cases immediately after the expiration of the said term of fourteen years this present demise and everything herein contained shall cease and be void but without prejudice to any claim by the lessors against the lessee in respect of any antecedent breach of any covenant or condition herein contained but notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained the lessors shall only be at liberty to determine the said term hereby created at the expiration of the first fourteen years thereof if they shall require the premises hereby demised for the purpose of the business carried on by them."

A On May 27, 1947, the landlords served on the tenant a notice to quit and to deliver up possession on Mar. 25, 1948. It was made clear to the tenant that the landlords did not want the rooms at once. They offered him a lease, subject to a six months' notice on the basis that they would want the premises some time within the next seven years. There was a discussion whether the tenant could let them have one room. The tenant, having regard to the uncertainties of the lease, obtained other premises and moved there with his partner. In the present proceedings he claims that, on the facts proved and found by the learned judge, the landlords had no right to terminate the lease at the end of fourteen years because they did not require the premises demised for the purpose of the business carried on by them within the meaning of cl. 6.

B C The contention of counsel for the tenant is that for the landlords to come within the words of this clause the premises must be required for occupation for the purpose of the landlords' business on the date when the notice expires, that is, at the end of the fourteen years. He went on to submit that what the landlords had succeeded in establishing here, which admittedly falls short of that, did not justify the learned judge's finding. The findings of fact of the learned judge are not directly challenged. A witness for the bank whose evidence was accepted, stated that no definite date could be given as to the occupation by the landlords and that the tenant might be able to remain in occupation as long as two or three years, but sooner or later the landlords would have to go in. There was a question of mechanising the operations of the bank, which would involve obtaining machines from America, and at the date when the notice was drawn up it was not possible to calculate when such machines would be available. The learned judge sums it up in this way, and this summary must be taken subject to the findings to which I have referred:

D E "On the evidence I find that it has been established that the bank did require the premises at the time of the notice to quit so that they could use them during the remaining period of the lease. If no notice had been given, the bank could not have used them for seven years, and I am satisfied the bank intended and still intend to use them within a reasonable time, and long before the tenancy would have expired."

F G In some documents words with reference to requiring premises for a certain purpose may have the meaning for which counsel for the tenant contends. I would say that that would be the prima facie meaning if the provision could be operated at any time. If, for example, here the lease provided that the bank could give notice at any time during the whole of the twenty-one years if they required the premises for their business, there would be great force in saying "That means require them for occupation at the moment." There would be no justification for saying that notice could be given in 1950 when the premises were not required until 1951, but we have to construe these words in their context. The preceding words of cl. 6 give the landlords a right to determine the lease, as the tenant has the right, at the end of fourteen years. They have a right to take back to themselves at the end of fourteen years what they have granted, subject to a limitation that that right shall be exercised only if they require the premises for the purpose of the business carried on by them. In my view, the natural meaning of the words is that the landlords are entitled to possession if they require the premises for the purpose of the business carried on by them during the period which is being dealt with by the proviso, i.e., during the last seven years for which they will otherwise be deprived of possession of their property. The landlords are saying: "We let you have the premises for fourteen years, because we do not foresee wanting them over that period, but with regard to the other seven years if we want them over that period then we reserve the right to give notice." It would be absurd if the construction was that the landlords had no right to terminate the tenancy at the end of the fourteen years, although it might be clear that they would want the premises for their own purposes in a year or so, but could not say that they wanted to occupy them forthwith.

The first argument of counsel for the tenant was that the landlords would have no power to exercise their right of terminating the lease, because they could not say when they actually wanted to move into the rooms. On this point I agree with the learned judge. The second point taken was that on the evidence the landlords did not establish that they would require all the rooms, and I think that is right, but I do not think it right to say that the evidence shows that they only required one room. The evidence is that in their efforts to meet the tenant they said: "If we can have one room that might satisfy us for a great deal of the period, and we will do our best to delay our wanting the other rooms as long as possible." I accept that the evidence fell short of proving that they intended to use all the rooms within the seven years. The argument is that the clause did not say "require the premises or any part thereof," whereas in other parts of the lease there is an express reference to part. It is said that, that being so, this clause cannot be operated until the landlords require the whole of these premises for the purpose of their business. I do not take that view. It is a very short point and it does not admit of much elaboration. The learned judge said:

"It seems to me that if the bank genuinely and bona fide require part of the premises, that is quite sufficient to fulfil the requirements of this clause, because they could not, of course, use any part of the premises unless a notice was given. I think that is all that is contemplated in this particular part of the lease."

That seems to me the natural construction of the words as they appear in this agreement. For these reasons I think the learned judge was right on both points and the appeal should be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. On the last point with which my Lord has dealt I do not desire to add anything to what he has said. On the first point, namely, the question whether or not the bank can be said in the circumstances to require the premises for the purpose of the business carried on by them, counsel for the tenant pressed us with the maxim that a deed must be construed contra proferentem. If, however, applying the ordinary principles of construction, we arrive at a clear conclusion as to what the parties meant by the language they used, I do not think the maxim on which counsel rely comes into action. Among the principles of construction is the rule that if of two constructions one gives business efficacy to a document, while the other leads to an improbable conclusion, the court must prefer the former. I think that this is essentially a case where that rule applies, and I think the learned judge arrived at the right conclusion. Let me imagine that at a meeting held on May 26, 1947, the day before the notice to quit, the landlords had to consider whether or not they required the premises comprised in the demise for the purpose of the business carried on by them and so were justified in giving the notice. I think that on the facts found by the learned judge a board of business men could only answer that question in the affirmative. On the facts set out in the correspondence and proved in evidence, it seems plain that they must have thought that they would require part of the premises for the purpose of mechanisation, quite apart from any question of expansion of the business. It seems to me that in those circumstances it would be taking a very narrow view of the clause to say that they did not require the premises for the purpose of the business carried on by them because, having regard to the delivery date of the machines and so on, they could not fix the exact date at which the occupation might become a practical proposition. It is clear from the evidence that the landlords contemplated that it would become a practical proposition at some time within the seven years period. The fact that they have not yet occupied the premises and have granted a tenancy of them for a period of five years terminable on six months' notice to other tenants has nothing to do with the matter. Anybody considering the matter from a business point of view could only conclude that the premises were required for the purpose of the business carried on by them on Mar. 25, 1948, notwithstanding that they could not actually fix the date on which they could enter into immediate occupation. For these reasons, as well as for the reasons given by my Lord and the learned judge in the court below, I think the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree.

J. F. PERROTT & CO., LTD. v. COHEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Cohen and Denning, L.J.J.), October 11, 12, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Encroachment by tenant on property of landlord adjoining demised premises, but not included in lease—Tenant claiming possession under lease—Acquiescence by landlords in de facto possession—Claim for cost of repairs.

Property was demised to a tenant by a lease which was made in 1936 and expired in 1948. From the commencement of the term the tenant took possession of certain lavatories which belonged to the landlords and adjoined the demised premises, but were not included in the lease. In 1943 the landlords wrote to the tenant, pointing out that the lavatories were not included in the lease and requiring him to come to an arrangement with them if he wished to continue to use them. The tenant refused to come to any arrangement, claiming that the lavatories were included in the lease, and he continued to use them until the end of the term without further opposition from the landlords. At the end of the lease the landlords brought proceedings against the tenant for damages for breaches of the tenant's repairing covenants in the lease, and they included in their claim for damages items in respect of non-repair of the lavatories.

HELD: as the tenant was claiming throughout the term of the lease to occupy the lavatories as part of the demised premises, and, except for their protest in 1943, the landlords had acquiesced in the de facto position, the lavatories should be treated as part of the demised premises and the tenant was liable in damages for not repairing them.

APPEAL by the tenant from a judgment of BIRKETT, J., dated May 11, 1950, awarding damages to the landlords for breaches of the tenant's repairing covenants in a lease of certain property. The lease, which was dated Aug. 5, 1936, expired in June, 1948, and the action was brought by the landlords on the determination of the tenancy thereunder. The breaches alleged related not only to the property demised by the lease, but also to certain lavatories which belonged to the landlords and adjoined the property demised, but which were not included in the lease. The tenant contended inter alia that, as the lavatories were not included in the lease, the repairing covenants did not apply to them. BIRKETT, J., found that the tenant had been in possession of the lavatories throughout the whole period of the lease and had asserted that his possession was under the lease. The learned judge held that it would be inequitable to allow the tenant now to repudiate his claim, and, therefore, he was liable in damages for not repairing the lavatories. The decision of the Court of Appeal is reported only on this point. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Wooll, K.C., and Lester for the tenant.

Elwes, K.C., and Dennis Thompson for the landlords.

SOMERVELL, L.J., after stating the facts and finding for the landlords on the issue of liability for the alleged breaches of the repairing covenants in relation to the property demised by the lease, continued: There is a separate part of the case. Some of the items in the claim were in respect of the cost of repairs to lavatories. It is argued on behalf of the tenant that the lavatories were outside the lease, and that, therefore, dilapidations cannot be claimed in respect of them. It is true that the lavatories were in a building marked "D" on the plan and the lease [which was dated Aug. 5, 1936, and expired in June, 1948] does not include "D."

The question arose first in 1943. The landlords came to the conclusion that they might want these lavatories. It came to their knowledge that the tenant was claiming them under the lease, and on Aug. 12, 1943, a letter was written to the tenant on behalf of the landlords by their solicitor. In that letter, the landlords' solicitor said that he did not agree with the tenant's claim, and he ended the letter in this way:

"I may say that my clients are quite prepared to come to some arrangement with Mr. Cohen [the tenant] with reference to the future use of the lavatories . . . but when your company claims that they have a legal right to the use of the three lavatories under their lease or otherwise, my clients must repudiate any such claim, and the question of the future use of these lavatories, or any of them, must be settled at once and the terms reduced to writing. It will materially assist in arriving at a satisfactory arrangement if your company will write to me withdrawing any claim to the use of the lavatories without the permission of my clients, and if this is done by return and Mr. Cohen cares to see me to discuss what arrangements shall be made for the future, I shall be glad to see him for that purpose, if you will be good enough to make an appointment."

The tenant replied on Aug. 18, 1943, under the name of the company which he had then formed, saying:

"When the premises at Size Yard were leased to Mr. Henry Cohen, the lavatories in question were definitely included, and not until a week or so ago has Mr. Farrington, presumably on behalf of Messrs. J. F. Perrott & Co. [the landlords], verbally disputed our right to them."

Then he said that the lavatories had been white washed at his expense when the tenancy commenced in 1936 and again in 1938, that the keys had always been in his possession, and that Mr. Farrington [secretary and director of the landlords] had always been allowed the use of one of the lavatories. In reply to that letter the landlords' solicitor wrote another letter, saying:

"I note that your letter is signed by Mr. Henry Cohen, who is my clients' lessee, and when I am in a position to make any proposition with regard to the lavatories I will communicate with him."

At the trial of the action, this letter was put to Mr. Farrington, who was asked:

"Q.—Will you tell my Lord what happened after that with regard to those lavatories. Did Mr. Cohen and the Jubilee Coffee Roasting Co., Ltd. continue to use them or not? A.—Most certainly.

Q.—Was there any change in the position? A.—No change at all until the end of our lease."

Then Mr. Barry, who gave evidence for the tenant, was pressed to say that the lavatories were included:

"Q.—Does it not follow that in 1948 you were instructing Mr. Bieber [the tenant's solicitor] that the lavatories were yours? A.—Yes.

Q.—And that he must have got it from you that you regarded them as in the letting. He could not have got it from anybody else, could he? A.—It was an arrangement subsequent to the letting.

Q.—Precisely. A.—Because the first building had one lavatory. Under the Factories Act we must have lavatories."

Then a point, which was really a point of law, was put to him, and he admitted that he had asserted that they were included under the lease. In view of the tenant's conduct, extending over the whole period of the lease, the learned judge, basing himself on the equitable principle laid down in Berry v. Berry (1), held that the tenant was liable for the sum claimed in respect of the lavatories, although they were not included in the document of Aug. 5, 1936.

Counsel for the landlords cited to us Tabor v. Godfrey (2), where CHARLES, J., laid down this principle (64 L.J.Q.B. 247):

"The principle is that a man who gets in by reason of being tenant must take land as under his original take."

I need not go into the facts of that case in detail, but the tenant had occupied some land belonging to the landlord and adjoining the demised premises, but not included in the original demise. The learned judge said (ibid.):

"From first to last the lessee of [the demised premises] has occupied the strip just as if it were included in the demise, and so also the inside of the wall. [Counsel for the landlord] says it is no matter, as twelve years have not elapsed. But I think twelve years have elapsed of occupation of this strip of land inconsistent with the user of it as a right of way; and I should, apart from the legal question here, have to hold, certainly as to the strip, that the [tenant] had acquired a right to the freehold under the statute. But that is not the true inference, nor do I think the Statute of Limitations has anything to do with the case. But I do think that in the events which have happened, both the landlord and the tenant have treated this strip as part of the land demised."

In the case now before us, I think that, on the evidence which I have read, the learned judge would have been justified in coming to the conclusion—and, if we dealt with it on this basis, we should come to the conclusion—that from the beginning both the landlords and the tenant treated these lavatories as part of the land demised. Counsel for the tenant has said (I think rightly) that there is nothing in Tabor v. Godfrey (2) which corresponds to the letter of protest written on behalf of the landlords, and that is the reason which makes the problem a difficult one. I think, however, that, having regard to the complete acquiescence of the landlords after that date in the de facto position, the only conclusion to which I can come is that the lavatories have been occupied throughout by the tenant as if they were part of the property demised. The attention of the landlords was drawn to the fact that the tenant was claiming them under the lease, and it is true that they then wrote a letter objecting to his claim, but that is all that they did, and, there having been one or two exchanges, they left the matter exactly where it was. I think that in those circumstances it is right to treat the lavatories as part of the demised premises and that the tenant—who at one time wanted them so treated—cannot now adopt the other position and say: “Although I have occupied them and treated them as part of the demised premises as against my landlords when they suggested that they were not part thereof, I shall now change my ground.” For those reasons, I think that the question in regard to the lavatories was rightly decided by the learned judge.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion, and I only desire to add a word on the question of the lavatories. At one time I felt great doubt on that question. My doubt was whether the equitable principle on which the judge arrived at his decision was really applicable to the facts as he found them. Fortunately, I am not compelled to reach a conclusion on that point because counsel for the landlords called our attention to Tabor v. Godfrey (2), to which SOMERVELL, L.J., has referred, and which was explained by the Divisional Court in Lord Hastings v. Saddler (3). As thus explained, Tabor v. Godfrey (2) seems to me to amount to this. Where a tenant has occupied land of the landlord's not included in the demised premises according to the terms of the demise, but adjoining thereto, and after the tenancy has determined the landlord seeks to eject his former tenant therefrom, but the tenant relies on the Statute of Limitations [in that case, the Real Property Limitation Acts, 1833 and 1874], the proper question for the judge to put to the jury, or to decide himself if there is no jury, is, as stated by LORD RUSSELL, C.J. (79 L.T. 356) in Lord Hastings v. Saddler (3):

“Do you think the land was occupied by the tenant as a mere extension of the locus of his tenancy? If you do you should find a verdict for the landlord. If you think the tenant took possession not as tenant, but with the object or desire simply of benefiting him himself, and so as to acquire the ownership of the land occupied under the Statute of Limitations, you should find for the tenant.”

If that be so, it seems to me, the proper conclusion on the facts of this case must be that the tenant was purporting to occupy the lavatories as part of the demised premises. He says so in his letter, and, though it is true, as SOMERVELL, L.J., has pointed out, that his right to do so was disputed in writing by the solicitor to the landlords, none the less it is common ground that he continued to occupy the lavatories in exactly the same way as before, allowing Mr. Farrington the use of one of the lavatories down to the end of the tenancy. In those circumstances, it seems to me that the only proper answer to the question is that the occupation of the tenant was on the basis that the lavatories were part of the demised premises. For these reasons, as well as for the reasons given by SOMERVELL, L.J., I think that the decision of the learned judge was right on all points and that the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: I fully agree with the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., and I, too, only wish to say a few words regarding the lavatories. It raises a question which has not hitherto been before this court, and it is this. If a lessee encroaches on property of the lessor which adjoins the demised premises, does the lessee become liable to repair the property on which he has encroached just as if it was included under the covenants to repair contained in the lease?

The principle underlying the cases on encroachment is not, perhaps, strictly an estoppel, but it is akin to it. If a tenant takes possession of adjoining property and by his conduct represents that he is holding it under the demise, then, if the landlord acts on that representation by allowing the tenant to remain in possession, the tenant cannot afterwards assert that he is holding it on any other footing. The tenant cannot, for instance, claim that he is holding it adversely to the landlord so as to acquire a title under the Limitation Act, 1939, nor can he claim that he is only a licensee who has all the benefits of occupation but none of the burdens of the lease. The reason is because he has by his conduct made a representation that was intended to be binding, intended to be acted on, and was, in fact, acted on, and he cannot be allowed to go back on it. The representation was, in effect, a promise or assurance that the terms of the lease should apply to the adjoining piece of which he was in possession, and it is binding on the principle which I endeavoured to state in Central London Property Trust, Ltd. v. High Trees House, Ltd. (4). Conversely, if a landlord should allow a tenant to occupy adjoining property, and by his conduct represents to the tenant that it is included in the demise, and the tenant acts on the representation by using the adjoining property as part of the demised premises, the landlord cannot afterwards turn round and eject the tenant from it during the term of the lease. That was decided in Tabor v. Godfrey (2).

Applying these principles to this case, I agree that these lavatories should be treated as part of the demised premises and that the tenant is liable in damages for not repairing them. Counsel for the tenant said there was no consensus ad idem because the landlords wrote a letter showing they did not agree to the use of the lavatories by the tenant, and, therefore, there was no contract between them, but the answer to that argument is that it does not lie in the tenant's mouth to say it. He has successfully asserted all these years that the lavatories were included in the lease and he cannot now be allowed to go back on it. I know that this looks like treating an estoppel almost as if it were a cause of action, but it is habitually done in cases of waiver, see Rickards (Charles), Ltd. v. Oppenheim (5) ([1950] 1 All E.R. 423), and I see no reason why we should not do the same here. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

EAST END DWELLINGS CO., LTD. v. FINSBURY BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Singleton and Birkett, L.J.J.), October 3, 4, 20, 1950.]

Compulsory Purchase—Compensation—Interest in war-damaged hereditament—Flats subject to Rent Acts demolished by enemy action—Cost of works payment—Whether compensation to be assessed on the basis that rents controlled—War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), s. 14 (1)—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 53 (1) (a).

Before 1944 the claimants owned certain property consisting of fifty-five flats which were subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts. On June 24, 1944, the flats were completely demolished by enemy action, and a cost of works payment in respect of the damage was determined to be appropriate. The vacant site was compulsorily acquired by the local authority, and, since none of the damage had been made good before the date of acquisition, the costs of works payment was, by virtue of s. 14 (1) of the War Damage Act, 1943, to be converted into a value payment. The question arose of the amount of compensation payable to the claimants, having regard to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 53 (1) (a), which provides that the value of the interest for the purposes of assessment of compensation shall be taken to be the value which it would have if the whole of the damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat.

HELD (SINGLETON, L.J., dissentiente): by the combined effect of s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1943 and s. 53 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947 the basis of compensation was the value of the property immediately before the damage was suffered, and, consequently, compensation ought to be assessed on the assumption that the rents of the notionally new building would be restricted to the amount of the former standard rents.

Case referred to:

- (1) Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman, [1948] 1 All E.R. 44; [1948] 1 K.B. 653; [1948] L.J.R. 929; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by Finsbury Borough Council from an order of DEVLIN, J., dated May 8, 1950, and reported p. 81, ante, whereby he upheld the award of an arbitrator assessing at £32,000 the amount of compensation payable to the claimants by the borough council in respect of certain war-damaged land which they had compulsorily acquired.

The claimants were owners of land in the borough of Finsbury on which, before the war, there were fifty-five flats which were subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. On June 24, 1944, these flats were completely demolished as a result of enemy action and had not been re-built. On Dec. 6, 1947, the Minister of Health confirmed a compulsory purchase order by which Finsbury Borough Council were to acquire the land on which the flats had been situate, and on July 28, 1948, the borough council served a notice to treat on the claimants. On May 9, 1949, the War Damage Commission determined that the appropriate payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, in respect of the damage suffered would, apart from the compulsory purchase order, be a cost of works payment. In assessing the compensation payable in respect of the compulsory acquisition of the land in question, the official arbitrator appointed under s. 110 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, purported to proceed on the assumption prescribed by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 53 (1) (a), that the whole of the war damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat. On this basis he had assumed that the rents legally recoverable in respect of the notionally new dwelling-houses would not have been subject to the statutory limits imposed by Rent Restrictions Acts on the rents up to the date of the demolition. The local authority contended that this basis of assessment was wrong, since the words "made good" in s. 53 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947 showed that the intention of the enactment was that the old building should retain its identity even after it had been reconstructed and that, consequently, the old restrictions on rents would continue to apply. It was agreed between the parties that, if this contention was right, then the amount of compensation should be £20,000. DEVLIN, J., held that, although the words "made good" in s. 53 (1) (a) were apt to include re-building the premises in substantially the same form as the previous building, nevertheless, on the authority of Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman (1), the notional new building would be free from the rental limits attaching to the previous building and compensation ought to be assessed on that basis.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 20. The following judgments were read.

A BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal from the judgment of DEVLIN, J., in which he decided that an award by an official arbitrator made on Feb. 14, 1950, was not wrong in law. The material facts are clearly set out in the award and I merely make a summary of them.

B The claimants are the freeholders of certain property in the borough of Finsbury, including a piece of land on which were some dwellings known as Winton Houses. These dwellings consisted of fifty-five working-class flats and were let to weekly tenants, and by reason of their rateable values were subject to the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts. On June 24, 1944, these dwellings were completely demolished as a result of enemy action. On Dec. 6, 1947, the Minister of Health confirmed a compulsory purchase order by which Finsbury C
Borough Council were to acquire the land on which the dwellings had been situate, and on July 28, 1948, the borough council served a notice to treat on the claimants. None of the damage to Winton Houses had been made good by that time. On May 9, 1949, the War Damage Commission determined that the appropriate payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, in respect of this war damage would, apart from the compulsory purchase order, be a payment of D cost of works. The official arbitrator then dealt with the compensation payable to the claimants by the borough council. The claimants argued before him that the compensation should be £32,000, but the borough council argued that the sum should be only £20,000. Broadly speaking, the difference between these two sums depended on a decision of the question whether the property was to be valued with dwellings whose rents had been fixed by the Rent Restrictions Acts or not.

E The award of the arbitrator was as follows:

"I assess the compensation payable in respect of the said land on the assumption that, if the whole of the said war damage had been made good before the date of the said notice to treat, the rents legally recoverable in respect of the said dwellings would not be subject to the statutory limits imposed by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, at the sum of £32,000."

F The borough council then moved the High Court to set aside or remit the award for further consideration on the ground that the arbitrator was wrong in law in his basis of the assessment of compensation. On appeal DEVLIN, J., affirmed the award, and it is from his judgment that this appeal is made.

G As I see it, the question in dispute turns almost entirely on the proper interpretation of s. 53 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The relevant words of that section are as follows:

H "Where an interest in land the value of which is to be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of s. 51 of this Act is an interest in a hereditament . . . which has sustained war damage, and any of that damage has not been made good at the date of the notice to treat, then if the appropriate payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, would, apart from the compulsory purchase . . . be a payment of cost of works—(a) the value of the interest for the purposes of the compensation payable in respect of the compulsory purchase shall . . . be taken to be the value which it would have if the whole of the damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat . . ."

The critical words, therefore, in the sub-section are "the value which it [the interest in land] would have if the whole of the damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat."

DEVLIN, J., based his decision on the ground that, if the whole of the damage had been made good, new dwelling-houses would have been built similar to those which had been demolished. On the authority of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman (1) these new buildings would be free from the rental limits which had attached to their predecessors, the demolished buildings. Therefore, the landlord in all probability could have let the new buildings at a higher rent than the standard rents of the demolished buildings, and to that extent the value of the new buildings, which is determined mainly by their rent-earning capacity, would have been more than if the old restrictions as to rent had attached to them.

Counsel for the Finsbury Borough Council argued that this basis of assessment was wrong, because the words "made good" which were used in s. 53 (1) (a) show that the intention of Parliament was that the old building should retain its identity after it had been repaired or reinstated. In other words, the dwelling must be considered as rising from its ashes, and its identity should be preserved by keeping its old standard rent. I think that this question is difficult to answer. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Sisman's case (1) was given in December, 1947, four months after the Act of 1947 had received the Royal Assent, and I doubt whether s. 53 (1) (a) was intended to deal with the problem what meaning the words "made good" were to have in the case of a demolished house of which a replica is made on a cost of works basis. We have, therefore, to apply the words of the section as best we can, being guided in the main by the natural meaning of the words, and at the same time not giving to them a meaning which would be plainly unreasonable or contrary to the general spirit of the appropriate legislation. I think that the strongest argument on behalf of the claimants was that the Act of 1947 enacts that the compensation is to be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of s. 51. These are the relevant words of s. 51:

"(1) Any compensation payable in respect of the compulsory acquisition of an interest in land by . . . a local or public authority within the meaning of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, in pursuance of a notice to treat . . . shall be assessed in accordance with the provisions of that Act as modified by the provisions of this and the three next following sections."

One has now to look, therefore, at the Act of 1919 to see what those provisions were. Section 2 of that Act enacts that :

"In assessing compensation, an official arbitrator shall act in accordance with the following rules . . . (2) The value of land shall, subject as hereinafter provided, be taken to be the amount which the land if sold in the open market by a willing seller might be expected to realise . . ."

Counsel on behalf of the claimants argued that this test must be applied when interpreting the words "the value of the interest" in s. 53 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947. What, then, he asked, would have been the market value of the land if the whole of the damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat in 1948? On the authority of Sisman's case (1) it clearly would have been the value of a dwelling which was not already fettered by a standard rent.

In Sisman's case (1) the material facts were that a house within the Rent Restrictions Acts was so extensively damaged by enemy action in 1941 that it was demolished by the local authority. The defendant was the tenant of the house, and, after the damage had occurred, he ceased paying rent. After the war the landlords proceeded to erect on the site another house similar in all respects to that which had been demolished. Before it was completed or fit for habitation they terminated the contractual tenancy of the tenant by notice to quit. They then started an action in which they claimed declarations to the effect that the tenant had no rights in respect of the new building. The tenant resisted this claim and claimed a statutory tenancy in respect of it on determination of his contractual tenancy. The Court of Appeal (TUCKER and COHEN, L.J.J., and JENKINS, J.) held that the tenant could not claim the protection of the Rent Acts in respect of the plot of land on which the house stood. The house had been destroyed, and with its destruction had gone the rights of the tenant in it under the Rent Restrictions Acts. TUCKER, L.J., in the course of his judgment said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 46):

"... on the facts, which were undisputed, ... it is impossible to say that the house in the course of erection was the same house as that which had been damaged by enemy action. It clearly was not. The original house had been pulled down and had ceased to exist and an entirely new, though, no doubt, similar, house was in the course of erection."

Later the lord justice said (ibid., 47):

"Therefore, the original house having ceased to exist and the tenant not being entitled to claim that the protection of the Acts throughout attached to the plot of land, he has also failed in his contention that the building in the course of erection on these premises was at the material date a dwelling-house let as a separate dwelling. That being so, he has no claim to occupy these premises now or at any future time."

Counsel for the claimants argued that this decision applied to the present case; that, since the old dwelling had been "completely demolished," the new notional dwelling, which ex hypothesi had taken its place before the notice to treat was given, would be free from the restriction of the old standard rents, and to that extent the dwelling, being a free house and not a rent controlled house, would naturally command a higher value in the market because it would have a higher rent-earning capacity. DEVLIN, J., accepted this argument. The learned judge said (ante, p. 82):

"All the dwellings were, by reason of the rateable values ... subject to the provisions of [the Rent Restrictions Acts] and they were, therefore, let at rents which did not exceed the standard rents ... That being the position, if the claimants, as owners of the building, had re-built the premises with the aid of a cost of works payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, or out of their own resources, they would not have been required to let the flats so re-built at the 1939 standard rents."

Counsel for the borough council, on the other hand, argued that the decision in Sisman's case (1) had no bearing on the proper meaning to be given to the words in s. 53 (1)(a), and that the words "as if the damage had been made good" postulate the continued existence of the old building. It is unreasonable, he argued, to talk about "making good" something which has been completely demolished. In the case of a ship sunk in mid-ocean by enemy action, would any reasonable person talk of "making good the damage to the ship?" On the other hand, in the case of a demolished building it was not unreasonable to consider it as continuing to exist in a sense, because the foundations at any rate would remain and its location could be fixed.

After anxious reflection on the point, in the course of which my opinion has leaned towards one side and then towards the other, I think that the argument of the borough council is right, and that what seems to me to be the plain intention of s. 53 (1) should not be affected by the decision in Sisman's case (1) which was dealing with a different legal result of a similar set of facts. It seems to me that the cardinal principle of the War Damage Act, 1943, was to compensate the loser by war damage for what he has actually lost, to give him no more and no less. Whether he gets what is called in the Act a cost of works payment or whether he gets what is called in the Act a value payment, this principle is applicable in every case. If the War Damage Commission had decided that the compensation to the owners was to be met by a value payment, he would, I think, clearly have got compensation on the basis that the value of his property was already controlled by a standard rent. A value payment is defined by s. 6 (1) (a) of the Act of 1943 as being a payment of an amount determined by reference to the depreciation in the value of the hereditament caused by the damage, as provided by s. 10. By s. 10 (1) the amount of a value payment is to be an amount equal to the amount of the depreciation in the value of the hereditament caused by the damage, that is, the amount by which the value of the dwelling in the state in which it was immediately after the damage is less than its value in the state in which it was immediately before the damage. Clearly, therefore, if the War Damage Commission had decided that compensation was to be based on a value payment, the value of the hereditament would be affected by the limitation on its rent-earning capacity, and I do not see why this factor should not also operate if the commission determines that compensation shall be on a cost of works basis. This cardinal principle seems to emerge clearly from a perusal of s. 7 and s. 8 of the War Damage Act, 1943. Section 7 declares, in effect, that the question whether a payment under the Act is to be a payment of cost of works or a value payment is to be determined as follows: The payment shall be a payment of cost of works unless the war damage involves total loss. War damage is deemed to involve total loss only if the cost of reinstating the building in the form in which it existed immediately before the occurrence of the damage would be likely to be more than the difference between its market value after its reinstatement and its market value with the damage not made good. Again, the effect of s. 8 (2) is that war damage is to be made good by reinstating the building in the form in which it existed immediately before the damage, and the amount of the payment is to equal the proper cost of the works executed for making good the damage.

Section 14 of the War Damage Act, 1943, which has not been repealed by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, deals with partially damaged land which has been acquired compulsorily and enacts:

"(1) Where the appropriate payment in respect of war damage to a hereditament would apart from this provision be a payment of cost of works, if land . . . is acquired compulsorily . . . then . . . (a) the commission shall make a payment . . . in respect of the damage so far as made good before the date of the acquisition . . . of cost of works, and, in respect of the damage so far as not made good before that date, a value payment . . ."

The words of s. 53 (1) which we have to consider must, I think, be interpreted with s. 14 of the Act of 1943 in mind. Reading these two sections together it appears to me reasonably clear that in all cases where a house has received war damage, whether it has been totally demolished or not, the basis for the compensation is to be the value of the house as it was immediately before the damage was done. I do not think the fair reading of s. 53 (1) of the Act of 1947 coupled with s. 14 of the Act of 1943 is that an entirely new and, so to speak, "free" house is to be valued, but the value is to be that of the original house as it stood before the war damage. The alternative interpretation adopted by the arbitrator appears to me to lead to at least two results, neither of which, I venture to think, Parliament intended when passing these Acts. (i) The owners of a house which is partially damaged and then compulsorily acquired will receive compensation on the value of that house with the whole of its damage made good, but, nevertheless, still with its rental value controlled by its standard rent fixed under the Rent Restrictions Acts. On the other hand, if the house is completely demolished, the owner will receive his compensation on the basis that the notional repairs done to "make good" the damage and to reinstate the house as before has produced a house which is free from the control of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and, therefore, more valuable than the damaged house when reinstated. This seems to be unreasonable, and one should not impose an unreasonable interpretation on the words of a statute unless forced to do so because there is no other possible and reasonable interpretation. (ii) The second objection which I see to the interpretation put on the section by the arbitrator is that it tends to defeat the salutary object of the Rent Restrictions Acts which is to restrict the increase of rents of small dwelling-houses. Such an interpretation would have this result, if in a thickly populated area such as Dockland (an attractive target for enemy bombs) one might very well have hundreds of small houses demolished, and when reinstated their successors would be no longer controlled by the standard rents of their immediate predecessors. To that extent in that area the main object of the Rent Restrictions Acts would be stultified. It may be said that these effects will result if the owner were voluntarily to re-build his house after being damaged to such an extent as to make it necessary to do so, and to construct what was in effect a new house. Under the authority of Sisman's case (1) he will then presumably be entitled to claim a rent not limited by the standard rent of the old house. That may be so, but I do not think that the point which we have to decide was considered at all by the Court of Appeal in Sisman's case (1). The sole question which we have to decide is the amount which the State has to pay for the acquisition of land. While I sympathise with the owner who is deprived of his property by enemy action and think it fair that the State should compensate him for his loss, I do not see why he should make a profit out of the transaction at the expense of the State. The houses were worth £20,000 before the bomb fell. I think the owner should receive as compensation £20,000, not £32,000.

I, therefore, am of opinion in this difficult and important case that the appeal should be allowed and the case remitted to the arbitrator for further consideration.

SINGLETON, L.J.: Compensation for the land acquired by the borough council, the acquiring authority, under the Finsbury (Killick Street) Compulsory Purchase Order, 1947, is to be assessed as at the date of the notice to treat, namely, July 28, 1948. At that date there were no buildings on the land. Some form of bomb damage occurring on June 24, 1944, had resulted in the complete demolition of the dwelling-houses which had been known as Winton Houses, and which, with the land, had belonged to the claimants. There had been fifty-five separately let dwelling-houses, and they were subject to the provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. Forty-two of the tenancies were statutory tenancies and thirteen were contractual tenancies. No notice to quit had been served on any of the tenants after the demolition of the premises; indeed it may be said that the claimants contemplated re-housing them, or some of them, in the event of their re-building the premises. It was not suggested in argument that this affects the legal position.

The principles on which compensation is to be assessed are to be found in s. 51 and s. 53 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The former section provides that in a case such as the present, compensation is to be assessed in accordance with the provisions of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, as modified by s. 52, s. 53 and s. 54 of the Act of 1947. By s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1919 the value of the land is to be taken as the amount which the land, if sold in the open market by a willing seller, might be expected to realise. Section 53 of the Act of 1947 deals with compensation to be paid in the case of a hereditament which has sustained war damage (any of which has not been made good at the date of the notice to treat) if the appropriate payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, would, apart from the compulsory purchase or apart from any direction given by the Treasury under s. 20 (2) (b) of that Act be a payment of cost of works. This case falls under s. 53. Apart from the compulsory purchase order the appropriate payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, in respect of war damage would, by virtue of a determination of the War Damage Commission dated May 9, 1949, be a payment of cost of works. None of the war damage had been made good at the date of the notice to treat. In the events which have happened the cost of works payment becomes a value payment and is payable to the acquiring authority: s. 14 of the War Damage Act, 1943. Thus, under s. 53 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947 the value of the interest for the purposes of the compensation payable in respect of the compulsory purchase is to be taken to be the value which it would have if the whole of the damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat.

If there had not been any bomb damage and the borough council had taken the necessary steps to acquire the land and the dwelling-houses on it, compensation would have been assessed on the basis that the rents of the dwelling-houses were controlled, for that was a factor by which a willing seller (and a prospective purchaser) would have been influenced. The question which arises in the present case is whether the compensation is to be assessed on the basis that the rents are subject to the control of the Rent Restrictions Acts or not. It is obvious that, if the basis is freedom from control of the Acts, the claimants will receive a much higher figure than they would get otherwise: the comparative figures are £32,000 and £20,000. The official arbitrator awarded the claimants the sum of £32,000 on the assumption that, if the whole of the war damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat, the rents legally recoverable in respect of the dwellings would not be subject to the statutory limits imposed by the Rent Restrictions Acts. DEVLIN, J., upheld the award of the arbitrator, and in this appeal it is sought by the acquiring authority to reverse his judgment and to have it declared that the award is bad in law by reason of the assumption which the official arbitrator made on the question as to control of rents. It is said, and said with force, that it cannot be right that the owners of the property should be paid by the acquiring authority £12,000 more than they would have received if the bomb or bombs had not fallen on it. The position is not quite so extraordinary as it sounds at first, if it be right to say (a) that if the claimants had obtained a cost of works payment and re-built the houses they would be free from control under the Rent Restrictions Acts (though, of course, re-building takes time), and (b) that if the re-building is done by the acquiring authority they will have a property free from control of the Acts and thus of greater value than would have been the case if there had been no war damage.

The Act of 1947 received the Royal Assent on Aug. 6, 1947. On Dec. 12, 1947, judgment was given in the Court of Appeal in Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman (1), and on the decision in that case DEVLIN, J., based his judgment. Though other points were raised the basis of the decision in Sisman's case (1) was that the house had ceased to exist and the tenant was not entitled to claim that the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts attached to the plot of land on which the house formerly stood. Equally in the present case the dwelling-houses which constituted Winton Houses were completely demolished in June, 1944. As I read the judgments of TUCKER and COHEN, L.JJ., in Sisman's case (1) none of those who had been tenants could at any time after the demolition of the property establish a claim to occupy any part of the premises, for each of the dwelling-houses had ceased to exist. At the date of the notice to treat no one could have established such a claim.

Turning again to s. 53 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947, compensation is to be assessed according to the value which the interest of the claimants would have if the whole of the damage had been made good the day before the date of the notice to treat. The notional making good seems to me to cover a case in which there had been complete destruction or demolition, and the only point appears to be whether, as one has to imagine that the damage has been made good, one ought also to consider it as made good subject to the control as to rents which attached to the hereditament before it suffered war damage. I do not see my way to read this into the section. No doubt the point was not present to the minds of the framers of the section or it might well have been covered. It is not for the court to re-write the section or to insert into it words which it thinks ought to be there, or which might have been there if this point had been considered by Parliament. The section pre-supposes damage (which may entail demolition), and at some time thereafter a notional making good of that damage. It does not provide, as it might have done, that the value of the interest is to be that which it would have had if the hereditament had never suffered war damage at all. It seems to me that in view of the decision in Sisman's case (1) the claimants are right on the strict wording of the section, and compensation falls to be assessed on the basis of the assumption made by the official arbitrator. For these reasons, I am of the opinion that the judgment of DEVLIN, J., is right and that the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: This was an appeal by the metropolitan borough of Finsbury, hereinafter called the acquiring authority, against a decision of DEVLIN, J., made on May 8, 1950. The learned judge had dismissed a motion made on behalf of the acquiring authority for an order that the award of the official arbitrator selected by the Reference Committee to hear and determine a reference between the claimants, the East End Dwellings Co., Ltd., and the acquiring authority, dated Feb. 14, 1950, should be set aside or remitted to the official arbitrator for re-consideration on the grounds that the arbitrator was wrong in law in the assessment of the compensation.

The claimants are the owners of certain freehold land in Collier Street and Killick Street in the metropolitan borough of Finsbury. A compulsory purchase order was made by the acquiring authority, and the order was confirmed by the Minister of Health on Dec. 6, 1947. On July 28, 1948, a notice to treat was served on the claimants by the acquiring authority. A portion of the land owned by the claimants which was the subject of the compulsory order was the site of fifty-five dwelling-houses and certain detached sheds, and these houses were completely demolished on June 24, 1944, as a result of enemy action. None of the damage had been made good at the date of the notice to treat. On May 9, 1949, the War Damage Commission determined that the appropriate payment under the provisions of the War Damage Act, 1943, would, apart from the compulsory purchase order, be a payment of cost of works. Before the total demolition of the houses on June 24, 1944, all the fifty-five houses were let to tenants at weekly rents to which the provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, applied. It appears to have been agreed between the claimants and the acquiring authority that, if the official arbitrator should value and assess the compensation to be paid on a certain basis, the sum to be paid should be £20,000, and, if he should assess it on another basis, the sum should be £32,000. The decision of the official arbitrator was that the sum should be £32,000, and DEVLIN, J., upheld the decision of the official arbitrator. The question at issue before DEVLIN, J., and before this court is whether the official arbitrator, in making his award of £32,000, was wrong in law in basing his assessment on an assumption that he was not entitled in law to make. The assumption appears in para. 1 of the award and reads:

"I assess the compensation payable in respect of the said land on the assumption that, if the whole of the said war damage had been made good before the date of the said notice to treat, the rents legally recoverable in respect of the said dwellings would not be subject to the statutory limits imposed by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, at the sum of £32,000."

Now this court is not concerned with the figures. If the official arbitrator was entitled to make the assumption which he did, it is agreed that his figure is correct; if he was not so entitled then the figure is to be £20,000.

The question turns on the construction of s. 53 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, but the provisions of the War Damage Act, 1943, must also be considered. It is important to remember that the question before the official arbitrator was not the assessment of war damage, but the assessment of compensation for war damage. The official arbitrator found that the houses owned by the claimants had been completely demolished. It is clear from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman (1) that if and when new buildings were erected to replace the old buildings formerly on the site, no previous statutory tenant would be able to say that his statutory tenancy continued in the newly-erected building, and, accordingly, the Rent Restrictions Acts would not apply. It is true that the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, might apply, but, in any event, the rents the landlord could obtain would be higher than the rents obtainable in 1939.

The War Damage Act, 1943, must be first considered, and particularly s. 6, s. 8, s. 10, s. 13 and s. 14, but in view of the earlier judgments in this case I need not take up time by reciting them. Section 53 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947 is the governing provision:

"The value of the interest for the purposes of the compensation payable in respect of the compulsory purchase shall . . . be taken to be the value which it would have if the whole of the damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat."

In the present case (i) There had been war damage suffered. (ii) None of the damage had been made good at the date of the notice to treat. (iii) The appropriate payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, was a cost of works payment. Accordingly, by the combined effect of s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1943 and s. 53 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947, the cost of works payment is converted into a value payment and goes to the acquiring authority, and the land is to be valued on the footing that the war damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat.

There are obviously two views which can be taken on the construction of s. 53 (1) (a). One is the view taken by the official arbitrator and the learned judge that one should regard the damage as having actually been made good at the date of the notice to treat and that you should assess the compensation on that basis. That means in the present case that a property is in being at the date of the notice to treat to which the decision in Sisman's case (1) applies, and, therefore, the rents to be obtained are not subject to the previously existing statutory limits. The other view is that the statute contemplates, not an actual making good of the damage suffered, but a notional making good of the damaged property before the date of the notice to treat as the basis of the compensation. The words "shall be taken to be the value" support the view that what is being done is to assume that the damaged property has been made good, so that as far as possible the actual damage suffered no longer exists. In other words, the section contemplates a state of affairs in which the claimant is put back into the position he was in before the damage occurred.

All forms of damage are within the section, whether the damage be slight or severe or, as in the present case, a total demolition. In the case of slight damage to a dwelling-house "the whole of the damage had been made good" would mean that the house was now as it was before the war damage occurred, and I think that the interpretation of these words is the same whatever the extent of the damage. I cannot think that it was the intention of Parliament, nor indeed is it a state of affairs that one could view with any approval, that an owner should be placed in a better position, so far as compensation is concerned, if his house is wholly destroyed than he would be if his house suffered slighter damage. The principle on which compensation is assessed must remain the same in both cases, however much the amounts may differ. I think that the words of the statute "shall be taken to be the value which it would have if the whole of the damage had been made good before the date of the notice to treat" mean that the basis of the compensation in cases of war damage of this kind is to be the value of the property before the injury or damage was suffered. The decision in Sisman's case (1), in my opinion, is irrelevant to the question this court has to decide. In my view, s. 53 is dealing with a notional state of affairs and not the actual one. The learned judge, with the greatest respect to him, fell into error when he based his decision on a supposed actual re-building by the owner before the date of the notice to treat and then felt bound to follow the decision of the Court of Appeal in Sisman's case and apply it to the newly-constructed building he had postulated. Part V of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, provides a code of compensation, and s. 53 is a part of that code and deals with all cases whatever the extent of the damage where compensation is to be based on a cost of works payment. The words "if the whole of the damage had been made good," in my opinion, mean a restoration to the state existing before the damage was suffered. When one "makes good" one wipes out the damage suffered, and the property is to be valued as though the original property was in existence at the date of the notice to treat with all the damage made good, and as though the property was in being as it was before the bomb fell. The careful argument of counsel for the claimants, based on considerations arising from the words of s. 51 of the Act of 1947 and s. 10, s. 13 and s. 14 of the Act of 1943, cannot, I think, affect the true construction of s. 53 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947.

I am of opinion that the official arbitrator was wrong in law in making the assumption stated in the award, and I think the learned judge was wrong in sustaining it. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed and the matter referred back to the official arbitrator to decide the value of the compensation leaving out of account the assumption on which his original award was based.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Re GLASS' WILL TRUSTS. PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. SOUTH-WEST MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL MANAGEMENT COMMITTEE AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), May 23, 1950.]

Will—Legacy—Destruction of object—Gift to hospital—Vesting of hospital in Minister of Health after date of will but before death of testator—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6.

National Health Service—Legacy to hospital—Destruction of object—Vesting of hospital in Minister of Health after date of will but before death of testator—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 3 (a), for the determination (inter alia) of the question whether a legacy of £250 free of duty by the will of Thomas Waterworth Glass bequeathed to the King Edward VII Memorial Hospital, Ealing, was, in the events which had happened, payable to the South West Middlesex Hospital Management Committee, or how otherwise the said sum ought to be applied.

By his will, dated July 2, 1948, Thomas Waterworth Glass, who died on Jan. 21, 1949, appointed the Public Trustee to be executor and trustee thereof and provided (inter alia):

"I bequeath the following pecuniary legacies namely ... £250 to the King Edward VII Memorial Hospital Ealing ... and I declare that the receipt of the treasurer or other proper officer ... shall be a sufficient discharge to my executor. I direct that every legacy ... bequeathed by this my will shall be paid free of legacy duty."

Probate of the will was granted to the Public Trustee on June 14, 1949. The King Edward VII Memorial Hospital, Ealing, was founded in 1871 under the name of Ealing Cottage Hospital, and was re-named in 1911. On July 5, 1948, the hospital vested in the Minister of Health under the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6, as a voluntary hospital, and the management committee was established pursuant to s. 11. Immediately before July 5, 1948, the hospital was an unincorporated body administered by a committee of management which was not dissolved by s. 78 of the Act as it retained certain functions in respect of a "Samaritan Fund" connected with the hospital. All the activities of the hospital prior to July 5, 1948, continued to be carried on thereafter.

The attention of the court was drawn to the decision of ROXBURGH, J., in Re Morgan's Will Trusts ([1950] 1 All E.R. 1097) where a similar bequest was made "for the benefit of" a certain hospital. ROXBURGH, J., there said (ibid., 1098) that the gift "... is not 'to' anybody; it is 'for the benefit of' the Liskeard Cottage Hospital ... the gift is to supplement the funds available for carrying on the work of the Liskeard Cottage Hospital."

VAISEY, J.: It seems to me that this is a simple case of a gift of a sum of money to a named hospital, the identity of which seems to be beyond dispute, by a will dated before the National Health Service Act, 1946, came into operation and having effect at the death of the testator after that date. I have been referred to the decision of ROXBURGH, J., in Re Morgan's Will Trusts (1) where the words were very similar and the facts wholly indistinguishable. The words in that case were a gift "for the benefit" of the named hospital. Here we have a gift direct "to" the named hospital, and, following the decision of ROXBURGH, J., not only because I feel bound to do so in any case, but also because it is, in my opinion, deserving of being followed, I propose, in answer to the first question raised by the summons, to say that this legacy should be paid to the South-West Middlesex Hospital Management Committee (that being the appropriate regional committee for the area in which the hospital in this case is situate), and that it should be paid to that committee to be applied by them for the purposes of the King Edward VII Memorial Hospital at Ealing.

Order accordingly.

Re WILSON'S WILL TRUSTS. TRYON v. BROMLEY-WILSON AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.JJ.),
October 18, 19, 20, 1950.]

Will—Shifting clause—Validity—Uncertainty.

A By her will, dated July 4, 1890, a testatrix, who died on Jan. 23, 1892, devised her D. estate to the use of M. (the second son of H.B.) for life with remainder to his first and every other son in tail male, with remainder to his first and every other son in tail general, with remainder to his first and every other daughter in tail general. There followed similar limitations to B A. (the third son of H.B.) for life, with remainders to his issue, and to H.
(the fourth son of H.B.) for life with remainders to his issue. The D. estate was further limited on trusts (inoperative in the events which happened) in favour of the first and every other son of H.B., and, finally, to the use of the first and every other daughter of H.B. in tail general. The will proceeded: " Provided always and I hereby declare that if any son daughter or other issue of the said [H.B.] within the scope of the limitations herein-before contained shall by any means whatsoever become actually entitled C to the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits of the family estate of [Sir H.] the father of the said [H.B.] meaning thereby the [S. estate] . . . or the bulk thereof whether consisting of the same premises as that estate now consists of or in any manner altered in the way of addition substitution diminution or otherwise . . . then and so often as the same shall happen and thereupon every estate hereinbefore limited for life or in tail male or in D tail to the son or daughter of the said [H.B.] who or any of whose issue shall so become entitled and as to such son or daughter to whom an estate for life is hereinbefore limited to the first and other sons and the first and other daughters successively of such son or daughter shall absolutely determine and the said premises hereinbefore devised shall go and remain to the uses upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers provisos and E declarations to upon with and subject to which the same premises would have stood limited and settled by virtue of this my will if such son or daughter had died and there had been a general failure of his or her issue
But nevertheless without prejudice as to any son or daughter of the said [H.B.] to whom an estate for life is hereinbefore limited to any jointure yearly rentcharge or portions which may have been charged by such son F or daughter under the respective powers for those purposes hereinafter contained before such son or daughter shall have become entitled in possession to the said [S. estate] as aforesaid and without prejudice to any powers remedies or terms of years for securing or raising any such jointure or portions respectively."

G In 1897 the S. estate was re-settled as a result of which re-settlement the
S. estate was held for H.B. for life (he died in 1905), then for R. (H.B.'s eldest son) for life with remainder to his sons in tail male, remainder to M. for life with remainder to his sons in tail male, remainder to A. for life with remainder to his sons in tail male, remainder to H. (who died a bachelor in 1915) for life with remainder to his sons in tail male. There followed remainders in tail general to daughters of the sons, and ultimately to E.
H (the daughter of H.B.) and her issue. On May 13, 1906, R. the life tenant in possession of the S. estate under the re-settlement, died without issue male. On July 19, 1906, M., who was then life tenant in possession of the D. estate under the will and, in the event, the next entitled to the S. estate on the death of R., disclaimed his life interest under the re-settlement in order to avoid the operation of the shifting clause in the will. A result of M.'s disclaimer was that A. became entitled to the S. estate, subject to defeasance on the birth of issue to M., and the question arose whether the defeasance clause in the will had so been brought into operation as to defeat the interests of A. and his issue in the D. estate.

HELD: (i) the validity of the form of the defeasance clause was so well settled by practice and had been accepted by the court and by conveyancers for so long that it would be wrong for the court now to pronounce the clause to be so uncertain as to be inoperative.

Re Hinckes ([1921] 1 Ch. 475), considered.

(ii) on the true construction of the defeasance clause, inasmuch as A. had become actually entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the S. estate, the D. estate stood limited under the will as if A. had died and there had been a general failure of his issue, and it was not necessary, for the defeasance to operate in respect of any individual, that that person should have come into actual possession of his or her interest in the D. estate.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of HARMAN, J., dated May 5, 1950.

HARMAN, J., held that, as a matter of construction, the effect of a shifting clause in the will of Gertrude Sophia Wilson deceased was not, in the events which had happened, to deprive Sir Arthur Bromley and his issue of their interests in the Dallam Tower estate, which formed part of the estate of the testatrix. On appeal it was further argued that the shifting clause was so uncertain in its terms as to be invalid.

Harold Christie, K.C., and A. F. M. Berkeley for the third, fourth, fifth and sixth defendants, Sir Arthur Bromley and certain of his issue.

Ungoed-Thomas, K.C., and Hillaby for the seventh and eighth defendants, other issue of Sir Arthur Bromley.

J. H. Lazarus for the second defendant, one of the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, of the Dallam Tower estate.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I will ask JENKINS, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of HARMAN, J., dated May 5, 1950, on a question concerning the effect of a provision of the class known to conveyancers as a shifting clause, contained in the will of Miss Gertrude Sophia Wilson, the testatrix. The will is dated as long ago as July 4, 1890. The testatrix died on Jan. 23, 1892, and her will was proved on Apr. 20, 1892.

The question which we now have to consider arises in this way. Subject to certain prior interests, which are not now material, the testatrix was entitled to a landed estate known as the Dallam Tower estate in the counties of Westmor-

A land and Lancaster. She was a connection of Sir Henry Bromley, the fourth holder of the title. Settled in the Bromley family was a landed estate at Newark, in the county of Nottingham, known as the Stoke Hall estate. It seems the testatrix was minded to settle her Dallam Tower estate, to put it very shortly, on the grandchildren and remoter issue of Sir Henry (the fourth baronet) in such a manner as to ensure that, if any such grandchild or his issue became entitled to the Stoke Hall estate, then such grandchild and such issue should lose their interest in the Dallam Tower estate under the testatrix's disposition. That, very broadly and imperfectly, expresses her general object. At the date of the testatrix's death the position seems to have been that the Stoke Hall estate stood limited to Sir Henry, the fourth baronet, for life with remainder to the fifth baronet (also named Henry) for life with remainder to the eldest son of the fifth baronet, namely, Robert Bromley, who afterwards became Sir Robert Bromley, in tail male with remainders over. It was, no doubt, in the contemplation of the testatrix that, in due course, in accordance with the usual practice, there would be a disentailing and a re-settlement of that estate.

B In those circumstances the testatrix disposed of her Dallam Tower estate. The limitations of the will, so far as material, are of this nature. She devised the property, subject to certain prior interests, which, as I have said, are no longer material, to the use of Maurice Bromley, the second son of Henry Bromley (the fifth baronet), for life with remainder to his first and every other son in tail male, with remainder to his first and every other son in tail general, with remainder to his first and every other daughter in tail general. Then there are similar limitations to the third son of Henry Bromley, namely, Arthur Bromley, for life with remainders to his issue, and similar limitations in favour of the fourth son, Herbert Bromley, for life with remainders to his issue. Then there was a limitation which, in the events which happened, never took effect, in favour of the first and every other son of Henry Bromley, and, finally, a remainder to the use of the first and every other daughter of Henry Bromley in tail general. There was the usual provision cutting down estates tail to life interests in the case of persons born in the lifetime of the testatrix. The testatrix added a name and arms clause on which nothing turns for the present purpose. Then comes the proviso which has given rise to the present difficulty and I should read that proviso in extenso:

F “ Provided always and I hereby declare that if any son daughter or other issue of the said Henry Bromley within the scope of the limitations hereinbefore contained shall by any means whatsoever become actually entitled to the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits of the family estate of Sir Henry Bromley the father of the said Henry Bromley meaning thereby the Stoke Hall estate near Newark in the county of Nottingham or the bulk thereof whether consisting of the same premises as that estate now consists of or in any manner altered in the way of addition substitution diminution or otherwise and so that this proviso shall not be rendered inoperative by reason of such estate or any part or parts thereof being subjected to any charges or incumbrances whatsoever then and so often as the same shall happen and thereupon every estate hereinbefore limited for life or in tail male or in tail to the son or daughter of the said Henry Bromley who or any of whose issue shall so become entitled and as to such son or daughter to whom an estate for life is hereinbefore limited to the first and other sons and the first and other daughters successively of such son or daughter shall absolutely determine and the said premises hereinbefore devised shall go and remain to the uses upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers provisos and declarations to upon with and subject to which the same premises would have stood limited and settled by virtue of this my will if such son or daughter had died and there had been a general failure of his or her issue But nevertheless without prejudice as to any son or daughter of the said Henry Bromley to whom an estate for life is hereinbefore limited to any jointure yearly rentcharge or portions which may have been charged by such son or daughter under the respective powers for those purposes hereinafter contained before such son or daughter shall have become entitled in possession to the said Stoke Hall estate as aforesaid and without prejudice to any powers remedies or terms of years for securing or raising any such jointure or portions respectively."

I should, finally, refer to the provisions as to charging jointures and portions, as a point was made of them in argument in conjunction with the provision I have just read saving jointures or portions charged by sons or daughters of Henry Bromley against whom the shifting clause might afterwards operate. The provisions as to charging jointures and portions empowers any person made tenant for life of the Dallam Tower estate, either before or after he or she becomes entitled to possession or receipt of the rents and profits, to charge a jointure and portions as therein mentioned. Then there is a provision to the effect that, if any tenant for life exercises the power of appointing a jointure or of charging portions before he or she becomes entitled to possession,

"the rentcharge or sum of money charged for portions under such exercise of the said power shall not be a lien or charge [on the property charged] until the person by whom the same shall have been charged or some issue of his or hers shall or if of full age would have become entitled to such possession or receipt as aforesaid."

The testatrix having died in 1892, in 1897 there was the usual re-settlement of the Stoke Hall property. The effect of that re-settlement was that the Stoke Hall property was held for Henry Bromley, who had by then become Sir Henry, the fifth baronet, for life—he died in 1905—then for Sir Robert, his eldest son, for life with remainder to his sons in tail male, remainder to Sir Maurice, the second son, for life with remainder to his sons in tail male, remainder to Rear-Admiral Sir Arthur Bromley for life with remainder to his sons in tail male, and a remainder similarly for life with remainder to his sons in tail male to Herbert Bromley who died a bachelor in 1915. Then there were remainders in tail general to daughters of the sons, and, ultimately, there was a limitation in favour of Esther and her issue, she being the daughter of Sir Henry, the fifth baronet. On the death of the testatrix, Sir Maurice, who is still alive, aged seventy-five years or thereabouts, and has had no issue, became entitled to the first life interest in the Dallam Tower estate. He was also entitled in default of male issue of Sir Robert, to the next life interest under the re-settlement of the Stoke Hall estate. Sir Robert, the life tenant in possession under that re-settlement, died without issue male on May 13, 1906, and this raised at once an immediate question under the shifting clause contained in the testatrix's will, for, if Sir Maurice became actually entitled to possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall property, the shifting clause would operate against him and his issue. To avoid that result, on July 19, 1906, i.e., within three months or thereabouts of Sir Robert's death, he disclaimed his life interest under the re-settlement of the Stoke Hall property, so, if that disclaimer was effective, he never became actually entitled to possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall property and the effect of the shifting clause was avoided. The result, however, of that disclaimer was that Sir Arthur did become actually entitled to possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall property, his interest being accelerated by Sir Maurice's disclaimer. It was, no doubt, defeasable in the event of the birth of issue to Sir Maurice, but nevertheless was unquestionably an interest under which he became actually entitled to possession or to receipt of the rents and profits.

A question was raised as to the effect of Sir Maurice's disclaimer. That question came before NEVILLE, J., in 1911. He held that the disclaimer was effective, but he also held that Sir Maurice's interest in the Dallam Tower estate was liable to be defeated in the event of the birth to him of issue who became actually entitled under the limitations of the re-settlement to possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall property. It is to be observed that the matter was argued before NEVILLE, J., on the footing that the shifting clause was a perfectly valid clause.

A There has been no material change, I think, in the facts necessary to be stated, but for reasons which, no doubt, appear to the parties good and sufficient the question has now been raised whether the interests of Sir Arthur and his issue in the Dallam Tower estate have been defeated under the shifting clause by reason of the fact that, by the joint effect of the re-settlement and of Sir Maurice's disclaimer, Sir Arthur did become, and has been since 1906, actually entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall estate. That is strictly a future question, but, owing to the importance to the parties of knowing where they stand as regards these assets, we have thought it proper, B as the learned judge, HARMAN, J., did, to deal with it now.

C The case assumes a rather different form before us from that which it took before HARMAN, J. Two points were raised before us—first, the question of the effect of the shifting clause on the footing that it was a valid clause, which was debated before HARMAN, J., and, secondly, the new point whether the event on which the defeasance provided for by the shifting clause was expressed to take effect was not couched in such uncertain language as to make the defeasance wholly invalid. If the latter question were to be answered in the sense that the shifting clause is wholly invalid, the result would be to destroy the foundation of all argument as to the effect of the clause, and, indeed, to make that argument nugatory. I, therefore, think it right to deal with the second and new point first.

D The elaborate shifting clause which I have read is no new clause. It was not new in 1890 when the testatrix's will was prepared. It is a recognised clause well known to conveyancers which appears in DAVIDSON'S PRECEDENTS AND FORMS IN CONVEYANCING, I think for all practical purposes ipsissimis verbis, certainly in the 1864 edition (p. 516), and it may be that it appears in still earlier editions. It also finds a place in KEY AND ELPHINSTONE'S CONVEYANCING PRECEDENTS, 11th ed., which was published in 1923. It there appears with some variations, but the essentials of it are to be found in vol. 2, pp. 748, 749. It is a clause, moreover, which has been before the courts on at least one previous occasion. We have been referred to Re Hinckes (1), where the Court of Appeal, on appeal from ASTBURY, J., had to consider a settlement containing a clause which in all material respects is verbatim the same as the clause in the will of this testatrix. The question before ASTBURY, J., and the Court of Appeal in that case E was not whether this clause was valid or not. None of the very eminent counsel concerned in the case ever thought of suggesting that it was invalid. The matter which had to be decided was whether an ingenious document executed by a person who would otherwise have been entitled to the actual possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the relevant property had had the effect of giving this individual the best of two worlds by entitling him through the medium of a G trust to an annual sum substantially exhausting the income of the property in question, but which by its terms gave possession to the trustees and to the trustees alone. The Court of Appeal came to the conclusion, affirming ASTBURY, J., that the person concerned had not become entitled to the actual possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the property within the meaning of the shifting clause, and, therefore, that the shifting clause did not operate. There H was, as I have said, no express decision one way or the other as to the validity of the clause because that matter was not raised, but it does seem to me to be of the greatest significance that some conveyancer or conveyancers of the greatest ingenuity should have evolved this elaborate trust scheme to get rid of the effect of the shifting clause, that there should have been an elaborate argument before the judge of first instance and the Court of Appeal on the effect of this ingenious device, and that its effect should have been determined by ASTBURY, J., and the Court of Appeal without anyone ever suggesting that there was any other way out of the operation of the shifting clause than the device which had been adopted. It was very much in the interest of the individual concerned to argue, if there was any reasonable prospect of success, that the clause was actually invalid so that it did not matter a straw whether his ingenious trust document was effective or not, but nobody thought of raising that point.

In those circumstances, in my judgment, it would not now be right for this court to hold that a time-honoured clause, which has the authority of conveyancing text-books of the first rank and has had such authority for a matter of more than eighty years and has been dealt with in this court on the footing that it is a valid clause, is, in truth, invalid because its terms are so uncertain that the court will not regard them as a proper basis for a defeasance. This aspect of the case has been the subject of ingenious argument and we have been pressed with this or that hypothetical combination of circumstances, in which the veriest Solomon of a judge could not possibly tell whether the individual concerned had become entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall estate within the meaning of the will or not. In my judgment, it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to embark on any discussion of those hypothetical examples. If and when situations of the kind do actually arise it may become necessary for the court to determine in a particular case or cases whether the shifting clause has been brought into operation or not. For the present purpose, for my part I would dispose of this part of the case by saying that the validity of this clause is so well settled by practice that it would be wrong for this court, especially in view of the implied sanction which the clause received in Re Hinckes (1), now to hold that it is other than a perfectly valid shifting clause which has the effect it is expressed to have in those cases in which a beneficiary brings himself within its terms.

There remains the construction of the clause on the footing that it is a valid clause. The questions really are: (i) Has Sir Arthur Bromley become entitled to the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall estate, and (ii) If so, does the clause on its true construction take away the interests of himself and his issue in the Dallam Tower estate? As regards the first question the answer is: Yes. Beyond a peradventure Sir Arthur has been entitled to actual possession or receipt, and has been, as I understand it, in actual possession or receipt, of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall estate ever since 1906. That being so, does the clause on its true construction operate to defeat the interests of himself and his issue in the Dallam Tower estate? It seems to me, there can only be one answer. In my view, this clause says in the clearest possible terms, applying it to the events which have happened, that, inasmuch as Sir Arthur has become actually entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall estate, every estate in the will limited for life or in tail male or in tail to Sir Arthur, and, inasmuch as the interest is a life interest, to the first and other sons and the first and other daughters successively of Sir Arthur are absolutely determined, and the premises must go, to put it shortly, as if he had died and there had been a general failure of his issue. I find it impossible to extract any other meaning from this clause on any reasonable construction of it.

HARMAN, J., who was pressed with the possible difficulties and injustices to which this construction of the clause might give rise, felt himself able to hold the contrary on the ground that this construction of the clause made election impossible as between the Stoke Hall estate and the Dallam Tower estate, but, so far as I am able to discern, it is not a clause which gives rise to any question of election at all. The testatrix, for reasons which, no doubt, seemed sufficient to her, provided that a person becoming actually entitled to possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall estate should thereby lose his interest in the Dallam Tower estate, and that the interests of his issue should in like manner be defeated. Possibly it might have been more reasonable for her to provide that there should be no defeasance unless and until the party concerned came into actual possession of both properties and that in such case the party should be able to choose between the two, but the short answer to that is that the testatrix did not so provide. The only relevant event prescribed by the testatrix is actual entitlement to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall estate. There is not a word to suggest that, in addition to that, the person against whom the defeasance is to operate must come into actual possession of his or her interest in the Dallam Tower estate.

A It was suggested to us that there were words on which such a further requirement could be imported into the conditions of the defeasance. First, it will be remembered that the clause begins with these words:

“ I hereby declare that if any son daughter or other issue of the said Henry Bromley within the scope of the limitations hereinbefore contained shall . . . become actually entitled to the possession ”

B of the Stoke Hall estate. It is suggested that the words “ any son daughter or other issue of the said Henry Bromley within the scope of the limitations hereinbefore contained ” mean “ if any child or other issue of the said Henry Bromley becomes entitled in possession under the limitations hereinbefore contained.” I find myself unable to place that construction on the words. C “ Within the scope of the limitations hereinbefore contained ”, in my judgment, means no more than “ being an object of the limitations hereinbefore contained ” or “ to whom the property is limited under the limitations hereinbefore contained.” It is a phrase which, it seems to me, clearly excludes the idea of actual possession as a determining factor. It refers to interest and not to possession at all. That seems to me to become even plainer when one reads the immediately adjacent words with their reference to actual entitlement in D possession. Where the testatrix means to refer to actual entitlement to possession she has no doubt as to the proper words to use. So, I should say the words relied on are not only incapable in themselves of bearing the meaning suggested, but, even if there was any doubt about their meaning taken alone, in their context it is abundantly plain that they have no reference to actual possession at all.

E Next it was pointed out that the defeasance is in the form that “ every estate hereinbefore limited . . . shall absolutely determine . . . ” It was argued with ingenuity that an interest cannot determine until it has begun, and that an interest cannot begin until it takes effect in possession, and from these premises the conclusion was adduced that the interests which were to determine under the shifting clause must be only and exclusively interests in possession. In my judgment, no such inference can be drawn from the use of the word F “ determine.” There is one very good reason. By definition from the terms of the clause itself the interests which are to determine are all the interests of the son or daughter and his or her issue. They all determine uno flatu and at once. Obviously of those interests only one could be an interest in possession in any event; all the others must ex necessitate be interests in remainder or reversion. Therefore, if the use of the word “ determine ” introduces any ambiguity of the kind suggested, the testatrix had made herself her own dictionary and showed G that in her view, at all events, an interest in expectancy can “ determine.” If corroboration of that view be needed, some slight support is to be found in the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, which contains an exemption from death duties with respect to certain expectant interests. Section 5 (3) of that Act provides:

H “ In the case of settled property, where the interest of any person under the settlement fails or determines by reason of his death before it becomes an interest in possession, and subsequent limitations under the settlement continue to subsist, the property shall not be deemed to pass on his death.”

There is thus, at all events, statutory authority, if authority be needed, for the view that an interest can be accurately described as “ determining ” if it fails while it is yet reversionary in character.

Finally, reliance was placed on the provision saving jointures. It was said that, inasmuch as, by the terms of the settlement, a jointure, though it could be charged by a prospective life tenant, should not become a lien or charge until the life tenant should become entitled to possession, therefore the defeasance clause must be confined in its operation to persons attaining interests in possession in the Dallam Tower estate. That seems to me to be a non sequitur. The defeasance clause would operate in a proper case to defeat an interest in possession in the Dallam Tower property, and to meet such a case it would be quite appropriate to provide that the jointure should remain unaffected, but it by no means follows from that that the defeasance clause operates only and exclusively in cases in which the interest to be defeated is an interest in possession. I, therefore, reject that argument also.

We were referred to a number of authorities about the effect of divesting clauses made to depend on entitlement to property, and it was pointed out that the court will always construe such references to entitlement, where it is reasonably possible to do so, as meaning actual entitlement in possession. I will not refer to those cases, for the principle is well settled, but that principle does not advance the case here sought to be established. The event here admittedly and expressly made the occasion of the defeasance is becoming actually entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the Stoke Hall estate. That is not in question, and it is not in question that in the present instance this event has happened, but there is nothing in the principle to constrain the court to read into the clause a further condition, which cannot be found in it on any reasonable construction, to the effect that the estate to be divested must itself also be an interest in possession.

For these reasons, in my judgment, this appeal should be allowed, and for the relevant declaration made by HARMAN, J., there should be substituted a declaration to the effect that in the events which have happened the shifting clause has operated with respect to all the interests of Sir Arthur and his issue in the Dallam Tower estate.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I am of the same opinion. My brother has stated so cogently the reasons which have influenced him that I will, out of respect to the different opinion entertained by the learned judge and to the argument put before the court, state only briefly the points which most have impressed me.

As JENKINS, L.J., has observed, HARMAN, J., was influenced by thinking that there should be found here, or was found here, an election. He says:

"I cannot but think that this defeasance was not intended to take effect unless and until both estates were vested or were about to vest in possession, because it is only then that the person put to election can properly be called on to say: 'I shall have this one, or I shall have the other one.' It seems to me to be so unlikely that she intended to put the thing irrevocably beyond the reach of Sir Arthur and the whole of his issue by an event which happened something like fifty years before the chance of Dallam Tower vesting in possession occurs that I am inclined to adopt what is, perhaps, not a very easy construction of the words in order to effect what I think must have been the intention."

With all respect, I think the premise is not well founded. I do not think that any question of election arises. When I turn to the relevant clause it is, I think, apparent that, unless it can be found that Sir Arthur Bromley at the relevant date was not within the description of "a son . . . or other issue of the said Henry Bromley within the scope of the limitations hereinbefore contained," the result contended for by the plaintiffs must have happened, for the clause provides that if such a person “shall by any means whatsoever become actually entitled to the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits of the [Stoke Hall estate] then . . . and thereupon every estate ”

A shall determine. “Then and thereupon ” are words of emphasis, and they must refer to the event of becoming actually entitled to possession of the Stoke Hall estate. Sir Arthur Bromley admittedly did so become entitled. Therefore, the defeasance must have operated unless it could be said that at that date, in 1906, he was not a person “within the scope of the limitations ”, etc. I think, for reasons which have already been stated, that it is impossible to import into that formula “within the scope of the limitations ” qualifying words limiting its effect to persons taking an interest in possession under the limitations. The words mean precisely what they say. Sir Arthur Bromley was a person “within the scope of the limitations ” of Miss Wilson’s will, for he took an interest under those limitations dependent on the failure or defeasance of prior limitations.

C There only remain the words to which attention has been already directed—“determine ” and “go and remain ” and the reference to the jointuring power. It is said that they are more apt in relation to interests in possession than to vested interests not in possession. For the reasons already given, I do not agree. I should be guilty of mere repetition if I traversed again the ground which JENKINS, L.J., has already covered. The considerations mentioned would, in any event, to my mind, have to be extremely strong—not merely causing doubt, D but of compelling force—if their effect was to necessitate the construction of the phrase “within the scope of the limitations hereinbefore contained ” so as to be confined to persons taking interests in possession.

E That covers the matter which was argued in the court below, but I should add also a reference to the point already mentioned, to which our attention was directed by junior counsel for the plaintiffs, viz., the point that where actual possession is required by the testatrix as a necessary test or qualification it is clearly so expressed, but in the relevant part of the clause there is a marked absence of the phrasing used in reference to Stoke Hall in respect to which actual possession was required. Perhaps if the word “entitled ” had appeared in the relevant part of the clause it might have been possible to say on the authority of such cases as Monypenny v. Dering (2) that “entitled ” in such a clause as F this ought to be construed as “entitled to possession.” But even that word (which appears in reference to the Stoke Hall estate) is not to be found in the relevant language referable to the Dallam Towers’ case.

G On the other point which was debated in this court, the question whether the clause is so uncertain in effect as to be wholly void, I also agree with what has fallen from JENKINS, L.J. It is, no doubt, true that a defeasance clause is construed with some strictness. The language of LORD CRANWORTH in Clavering v. Ellison (3) (7 H.L. Cas. 725), quoted in Re Exmouth (Viscount) (4) by FRY, J., is (23 Ch.D. 165):

“ I consider that, from the earliest times, one of the cardinal rules on the subject has been this: that where a vested estate is to be defeated by a condition on a contingency that is to happen afterwards, that condition must be such that the court can see from the beginning, precisely and distinctly, upon the happening of what event it was that the preceding vested estate was to determine ’.”

H But, as pointed out by RUSSELL, J., in the Lanyon case (5) this language must be closely analysed. There is a distinction between uncertainty in expression and uncertainty in operation. In the Exmouth case (4), though the meaning of the words used was clear enough, still it was uncertain whether or not the event defined by the words had happened. Given in this case that it would be uncertain, though the words were clear, whether any person or more than one person might be indicated at any one time, then I think there might be a case for saying that the clause was uncertain in operation, and, therefore, ought not to be treated as valid. But I am far from satisfied that in this case there is any ground for supposing that the words are such that in operation they might be found applicable to more than one person at one and the same time. No doubt, this elaborate formula is not easy in some respects to construe, but to say that a document is difficult of construction is not the same thing as saying that it is so vague and obscure as to be unintelligible, and, therefore, unenforceable. It is a common event for these courts to have to construe provisions in wills and settlements, and it could not surely be said that a clause such as this failed in effect if it raised a point of construction such that it was thought desirable to take on it the opinion of the court. Nor would it be sensible to say that it failed if the court thought the point was a difficult rather than an easy point of construction. It is, no doubt, a matter which may some day have to be determined whether the phrase "if by any means whatsoever" has the effect of comprehending within the formula a person who took his title, not under any settlement or re-settlement of the estates as they now stand, but by ordinary purchase in the market. It may be a question which some court will be asked to decide whether the clause will operate if there is at some date the purchase of a wholly new and different landed estate in substitution for the old estate at Newark, or whether the clause will operate in the case that, there being no landed estate, the person entitled under the settlement or re-settlement is a person entitled to the income of capital moneys only. It would be wrong for the court now to express an opinion about these points, for if they do arise for determination the parties interested in the argument may be quite different from those who are now before the court. Suffice it for me to say that I am not satisfied that those points are of such obscurity that a court would be forced to say that the clause is so uncertain in expression as to be ineffective. I am strongly moved to that conclusion for the reasons which my brother has already mentioned, namely, the long and respectable ancestry which this particular clause has, deriving its origin from the early precedent of Mr. DAVIDSON. Not only that, but NEVILLE, J., when he considered this very case in 1911, expressed his opinion that he could find no ambiguity in this clause. True this particular point was not argued, but obviously the whole clause was studied. Equally, in Re Hinckes (1) this court expressed itself as clear in thinking that a provision substantially identical with this clause was not open to any attack on the ground of ambiguity. WARRINGTON, L.J., for example, said ([1921] 1 Ch. 487) that the particular phrase "if by any means whatsoever" presented no difficulty at all, though he did not in fact state his view of its effect. LORD STERNDALÉ, M.R., said that the clause was not only grammatically unambiguous, but also artistically admirable. In these circumstances, I think it would be wrong for this court now to hold that a clause of this character was wholly void or wholly ineffective because of uncertainty in expression or operation. For these reasons, I think that the appeal should be allowed.

I should add to what has fallen from my brother on the facts that in December, 1949, there was executed a release by Sir Maurice Bromley-Wilson of his life interest in a sum of £1,000 being capital of the Dallam Tower estate so that, quoad that particular sum, there is, of course, a present question, but the substance of the case is a present question only in the sense that the parties concerned, for reasons which have appeared to be good and sufficient to them, desire, and, I think, reasonably desire, to have their rights determined by the court. But, of course, the particular event which would give rise immediately to the operation of the clause has not yet happened and may not happen for many years. I say that because, as I have already indicated, my present inclination is that it would not be right to make in this case any representation order which would have the effect of concluding the matter against parties who are either not now before the court or who are not yet born at all.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I cannot possibly add to the judgments delivered by my Lords with which I entirely agree.

APPEAL against sentence.

H The appellant pleaded Guilty at Lewes Assizes to a count in an indictment charging him with conspiracy to evade Customs duties, and HALLETT, J., sentenced him to four years' imprisonment. The ground of appeal was that the learned judge had no power to pass a sentence of more than two years' imprisonment. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Briant for the appellant.

M. J. Morris for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was indicted at Lewes Assizes before HALLETT, J., on two counts, the first charging him with conspiring between May 1, 1949, and Dec. 19, 1949, with three other persons (who do not appeal) and other persons unknown fraudulently to evade Customs duties on the importation of 10,116 foreign manufactured watches. A second count charged him with being knowingly concerned on Dec. 19, 1949, "in a fraudulent attempt at evasion of duties of Customs payable on the importation of 10,116 foreign watches." It was in evidence that the duty and the purchase tax together amounted to something over £9,000. The appellant pleaded Guilty to the first count and Not Guilty to the second. The prosecution, believing that the court could deal satisfactorily with him on the first count, did not ask that the second charge should be tried and a formal verdict of Not Guilty was returned. HALLETT, J., regarding the appellant as the head and fount of the conspiracy, said that, in his opinion, a sentence of two years was not sufficient, and he sentenced him to four years' imprisonment and ordered him to pay £200 for costs. The case is one of considerable public importance and HALLETT, J., has done a public service in passing the sentence he did so that it could be considered by this court, because there has been a widespread opinion that no sentence of more than two years can be passed for a common law misdemeanour.

This appeal raises two questions. First, whether the sentence is a lawful sentence, and, secondly, if it is a lawful sentence, whether or not it is too severe in the circumstances. To deal with the first point, at common law there were comparatively few felonies—murder, rape, arson, burglary and larceny were all common law felonies and so was the offence of mayhem—nor were there a great number of common law misdemeanours, so the judges always claimed to have the right of defining certain acts as misdemeanours, although they never attempted to do so in the case of felonies. The punishment for felony was always death till the reign of George IV. For misdemeanour the punishment prescribed was always imprisonment or a fine, or both imprisonment and fine. An examination of the history of the matter makes it abundantly clear that the imprisonment and fine were always at the discretion of the court. Magna Carta contained a clause providing that penalties should not be excessive, and in the Bill of Rights, 1688, it was also provided that excessive fines should not be imposed nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. SIR JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN, the great writer on criminal law in the last century, considered that the provision in the Bill of Rights was introduced because of the floggings inflicted on Titus Oates, Bedloe, and those concerned in the Popish Plot, which were considered too severe, and also because a fine of £40,000 had been inflicted on John Hampden the younger for his part in the Rye House plot, but there is no doubt, and it was recognised in R. v. Castro (1), that it was lawful for the court to impose imprisonment and fine at its discretion. Until 1816 the further penalty of the pillory could be imposed for any misdemeanour, but in that year the pillory was abolished for all offences except perjury. Later on, it was abolished altogether.

Of late years the courts have been very reluctant to impose a more severe penalty than two years' imprisonment, but that has been because during the latter part of the nineteenth century, and before the recent reforms were effected, imprisonment was a very severe punishment. In the days when shot drill, crank drill and the treadmill were everyday accompaniments of imprisonment, especially imprisonment with hard labour, a sentence of two years' imprisonment was regarded as very severe, and for any sentence over two years the law provided a sentence of penal servitude. Penal servitude was served in convict establishments. The discipline was different, the work was different, and the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 1 (2), provided that where a court was empowered to pass a sentence of penal servitude a sentence of imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years could be given instead of it. That is why courts often passed sentences of imprisonment for offences for which sentences of penal servitude for fourteen years or for life could be given, but, though that practice existed, the law remained the same as it had been, namely, that misdemeanours could be punished by imprisonment at discretion. No statute has taken that power from the court. The only alteration which has been made in the history of penal punishment was in 1926, after, in R. v. Roberts and Morriss (2), where grave offences under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, were charged, one of the prisoners was sentenced by AVORY, J., to three years' imprisonment, two years on one count of the indictment and one year on another count, the two sentences to run consecutively. For the offences in question a sentence of penal servitude could not be given. Such an offence was only punishable by two years' imprisonment, but the learned judge thought it such a gross case that he imposed a sentence of three years' imprisonment. That led to the passing of the Penal Servitude Act, 1926, which provided that where a person was convicted of two or more offences in respect of which he was liable to be sentenced to terms of imprisonment amounting in the aggregate to a period of not less than three years, the court might, instead of sentencing him to imprisonment, sentence him to penal servitude for a term not exceeding the aggregate period for which he might have been sentenced to imprisonment. Long before 1948 prison discipline had become of a less rigorous character in regard to the tasks allotted to prisoners. The treadmill and shot drill had disappeared. Prisoners sentenced to hard labour were only required to sleep on a plank bed for the first fortnight of their sentence and in time that hardship disappeared altogether, with the result that the rigours of a sentence of imprisonment which had existed at the time when CHARLES READE wrote in the mid-Victorian days had disappeared. There became very little difference, if any, between a sentence of hard labour and one without hard labour, and when Parliament began to consider the Bill which is now the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, there was no substantial difference between the treatment meted out to prisoners sentenced to imprisonment and those sentenced to penal servitude. The Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 1 (1) and (2), has abolished penal servitude and hard labour, and substituted imprisonment for the various forms of imprisonment which had hitherto been imposed. Section 1 (3) did away with the old first division and second division and made the sentence of imprisonment the only sentence to be given in all cases.

It, therefore, follows that the reasons which led courts to confine their sentences to two years when imposing a sentence of imprisonment in the ordinary way have disappeared. Now no sentence except one of imprisonment can be passed, and it is still the law—and it is just as well that it should be laid down and understood—that for common law misdemeanours, that is to say, any offences for which a statute has not prescribed any particular period of imprisonment, the law is, and always has been, that the court can pass a sentence of imprisonment and impose a fine at its discretion, provided that it does not impose an inordinate sentence. In the present case, HALLETT, J., having called attention in passing sentence to what, as we hold, he rightly thought was the law, passed a sentence of four years' imprisonment. It is said that that is too severe a sentence. It has often occurred to me that for some of the offences we have had to deal with since the war—black market offences and conspiracy to steal rationed goods—two years' imprisonment is a wholly inadequate sentence. A prisoner who behaves himself in prison nowadays gets one-third of his sentence remitted, and if a sentence of two years' imprisonment were passed for a particularly insidious and dangerous conspiracy, the prisoner might only serve for sixteen months. The present appellant was engaged in what can only be described as wholesale smuggling, a serious offence.

The main point put forward on behalf of the appellant is that under the Acts which deal with this matter the maximum sentence was two years' imprisonment.

The charge of conspiracy relates to an offence under the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, and that provides that if any person "... shall be in any way knowingly concerned in any fraudulent evasion or attempt at evasion of any duties of Customs ... [he] shall for each such offence forfeit either treble the value of the goods, including the duty payable thereon, or £100, at the election of the Commissioners of Customs; and the offender may either be detained or proceeded against by summons."

That was not the only sanction which was imposed because by s. 53 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts were made applicable to offences under the Customs Acts, and, therefore, if the penalties were not paid there was provision for sentences to be passed. Those sentences, however, were not so long as the sentences which can be imposed under the Finance Act, 1935, s. 15, which provides:

"Where a person is convicted of an offence under s. 186 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (which relates to evasions of duties of customs and of the laws and restrictions of the Customs relating to the importation, unshipping, landing and delivery of goods) the court may, if it thinks fit, in lieu of ordering him to pay a penalty, order him to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding two years."

Until the financial policy of the country altered in the nineteen thirties and duties were re-imposed on many articles of commerce, smuggling was a rare offence, because it did not pay. Very few articles—for example, tobacco and spirits—were subject to duty: It is, perhaps, significant that Parliament imposed this more severe penalty in the Finance Act, 1935, which extended the range of articles subject to duty. The Finance Act, 1943, s. 12 (1), provided that the offender could be sentenced to imprisonment as well as ordered to pay a penalty.

Counsel for the appellant argued that it is not right to impose on a man, under the guise of a sentence for conspiracy, a longer sentence than could be imposed for the substantive offence he conspired to commit. At first sight that appears a very attractive argument. If, it is said, a man conspires to commit an offence for which the maximum sentence is limited by statute to two years, it is not right, if he is convicted of the common law offence of conspiracy to commit the offence, to pass a sentence of imprisonment at discretion. In many cases, especially if the evidence showed that the defendant had been concerned in only one offence it would obviously be wrong to impose, on his conviction of conspiracy, a longer sentence than he could have received if he had been merely convicted of the substantive offence. When, however, it is found, as in this case, that the defendant has been engaged in smuggling on a very extensive scale over a period of many months the same considerations do not apply. Although it is customary when a man charged with smuggling is found in possession of a dozen or twenty or fifty watches to make one charge against him, there can be no doubt that he is endeavouring to evade the duty on each watch, so that each item he smuggles could be made the subject of a charge. For the purpose of the penalties the duty on each watch can be taken and multiplied by three. HALLETT, J., came to the conclusion on the evidence before him that the appellant had been engaged for a period of eight months either in preparing to smuggle or in actually smuggling. In the opinion of the court, it was a case which deserved severe punishment. The sentence of four years' imprisonment was a lawful sentence, and, in the opinion of the court, it was well deserved and this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

FINDLAY v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Cohen and Denning, L.J.J.), October 24, 1950.]

Costs—Payment into court—Sum awarded less than sum paid into court—Right of defendants to costs after date of payment in—Discretion of court—R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 6.

A In an action for damages, brought by the plaintiff in respect of personal injuries which she had suffered in a railway accident, the defendants admitted liability and paid money into court. At the trial the plaintiff recovered a less amount than had been paid in. The judge gave the plaintiff the costs, notwithstanding the payment into court of a sum in excess of the amount of damages awarded. He gave no reason for penalising the defendants in costs, considering that the matter was in his absolute discretion. On appeal,

B HELD: a defendant who has paid money into court which exceeds the sum awarded to the plaintiff is a "successful party" within the meaning of the principle laid down by VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in *Campbell (Donald) & Co. v. E APPEAL by the defendants from an order of BYRNE, J., made on Apr. 27, 1950, awarding the plaintiff costs against the defendants. The defendants had admitted liability and had paid into court an amount in excess of the amount eventually awarded as damages. The facts are set out in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Berryman, K.C., and W. G. Wingate for the defendants.

F C. G. Cowan for the plaintiffs.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of BYRNE, J., in an action for damages for personal injuries. The appeal concerns costs only, and is made by leave of the judge.

J The proceedings were brought in respect of injuries suffered by the plaintiff in a railway accident on Oct. 24, 1947. It is clear from the correspondence that from some time before Feb. 25, 1948, the defendants were admitting liability. The defence was delivered on Mar. 23, 1948, and is in these terms:

"The defendants admit that they were negligent, but do not admit that the plaintiff suffered personal injuries, damage, or pecuniary loss, as alleged or at all."

I I construe that pleading as indicating that the only issue left was the quantum of damages, based on the extent of the personal injuries which the plaintiff could prove if the matter went to trial. Later, the plaintiff was being examined by her medical advisers and also by those of the defendants. There was a report in March, 1949, and on June 22, 1949, the defendants paid £920 into court under the ordinary procedure. That money was not taken out of court, and the case came on for trial on Apr. 27, 1950. Special damage, apart from the fees which had already been paid, had been agreed at £117 5s. 1d., and the learned judge awarded £750 general damages, making in all a sum of £867 5s. 1d. That was less than the amount paid into court, and counsel for the defendants asked for costs. Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the matter was entirely one within the learned judge's discretion and he asked for costs. The learned judge gave the plaintiff the costs, i.e., he made exactly the same order as if there had never been a payment in in excess of the sum awarded. It is against that order that this appeal is brought to this court.
